1. The restoration movement was launched by men who were dissatisfied with the status quo. They were not “at ease in Zion” nor were they “settled on their lees.” Thomas Campbell wrote in the Declaration and Address that they were “tired and sick of the bitter warrings and janglings of a party spirit.” He declared that they despaired of finding rest “by continuing amid the diversity and rancor of party contentions, the veering uncertainty and clashings of human opinions.” Alexander Campbell wrote of an abiding impression relative to “the forms and ceremonies, the speculations and conjectures, the feuds and bickerings of sects and schisms.” No restoration worthy of the name will be undertaken by those who feel that they have attained perfection or who deceive themselves into thinking that what they have is the ideal state. Those who ask what there is to restore will never restore anything! Restoration results from the restless conscience!

2. Restoration must always be preceded by reformation. In its infancy restoration is not a movement of the masses but a dream in the heart of an individual or, at the most, a few individuals. Any individual who seeks to further this ideal must have his own Damascus Road experience. He must be stricken to the dust. He must be made to see the futility of his past life and his present actions. He must be stripped of pride and arrogance. He must be deprived of his trust in all the world counts of value. He must say of his life as did Paul, “I count it so much garbage, for the sake of gaining Christ and finding myself incorporate in him, with no righteousness of my own, no legal rectitude, but the righteousness which comes from faith in Christ, given by God in response to faith” (New English Bible Translation).

Like Daniel he must set his “face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes.” And like Daniel he must begin by admitting, “We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts and from thy judgments.”

He who would help to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem must say like Nehemiah, “I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven.” And like Nehemiah he must speak thus to the Lord: “Let thine ear now be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayest hear the prayer of thy servant which I pray before thee now, day and night . . . and confess the sins . . . which we have sinned against thee: both I and my father’s house have sinned.” It is useless for one to attempt to promote the unity of all believers while defending the sectarian divisions created by his fathers, or while apologizing for his own partisan attachment.

Men who change things and rescue God’s children from exile in Babylon must conduct themselves like Ezra. “I arose up from my heaviness, and having rent my garment and my mantle, I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the Lord my God, and said, O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up into the heavens. Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day.” One does not deserve to walk with Jesus who is not willing to accompany him to Gethsemane. We dare not ask to share the blessing of his presence if we desert him amidst the olive trees of the garden of weeping!

3. The spirit of restoration must be kindled by wholehearted commitment to a search for truth and an unreserved dedication to follow where it leads. This requires a willingness to alter one's thinking and to amend one's practice to "keep abreast of truth." When the Campbells cut loose from their moorings and resolved to be guided by the pole star of restoration they little knew where it would lead them. "They went out, not knowing whither they went." Thirty years later Alexander Campbell wrote:

None of us who either got up or sustained that project, was then aware of what havoc that said principle, if faithfully applied, would have made of our views and practices on various favorite points. The application of the principle already stated trimmed us so naked, that we strongly inclined to suspect its fallacy, and had well nigh abandoned it as a deceitful speculation. Time, however, that great teacher, and Experience, that great critic, have fully assured us that the principle is a salutary one; and that although we seemingly lose much by its application, our loss consists only of barren opinions, fruitless speculations, and useless traditions, that only cumber the ground and choke the word, so that it is in a good measure unfruitful.

No man can further the cause of reformation while striving to be consistent with his past. He must walk in light of increasing knowledge. He dare not stumble at the noonday as he did in the mists and shadows of the dawn. It is a frequent resort of narrow partisans to publish the earlier writings of a reformer to contrast them with his current productions. No greater honor can be bestowed upon a man than to demonstrate that he had the courage to alter his thinking as he grew in knowledge of the truth. Only the densely ignorant or grossly prejudiced boast they have made no changes with the passing decades. Those who say such should hide their heads in shame for their wasted years. All of the gains that have been made in any field of human experience and endeavor have been made by men who dared to rise above the blind conformity of the age in which they lived.

The heretics of yesterday are always the heroes of today!

One who stops to ask what will be the consequences if he accepts truth is unworthy of truth. To such a person truth becomes merely a policy-making instrument to be accepted or rejected upon the basis of what it will do for him or to him. He is not a free man. His life is conditioned and ruled by other men. His course is determined before he discovers truth—the path of least resistance!

4. The reformer must labor for the approval of God and steel himself against the reproaches of men. No one will be hated more intensely by bitter partisans than the man who refuses to be one. It is an indication of the party spirit that it seeks always to capture the free spirit and to clip its wings so that it cannot fly over the restrictive barriers. It is a difficult thing to be just a Christian and not to allow oneself to be allied with or used by some faction or group to further its own selfish interests. The sectarian attitude is rife in our land. It works in subtle and devious ways. None of us is ever wholly free from its blighting influence. We encounter it at every step. It manifests itself in the policies and programs of those with whom we are closely associated. Often it is the price we must pay for continuing friendship but it is too great a price.

One who strives to rise above the sordid spectacle of sectarianism should read often and meditate much upon those passages which encourage to faithfulness regardless of external pressures. “Blessed are you when men revile you and persecute you and utter all kinds of evil against you falsely on my account. Rejoice and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven, for so men persecuted the prophets who were before you.” “For as we share abundantly in Christ’s sufferings, so through Christ we share abundantly in comfort too.” “For we cannot do anything against the truth, but only for the truth.”

5. The heart of him who pleads for restoration must be filled with love for mankind. This is not the same as love for a particular kind of man. It is universal and all-embracing. It is the love that God had for the world when He sent Jesus to die for all. It is the love that was commended unto us while we were yet sinners. It is not a love for those who are worthy, but for those who are unworthy; not for the lovable but for the unlovable, not for the hopeful but for the hopeless. Much of what passes for love in these days is very selfish. It is a narrow patriotism or partisan feeling, a regard based upon race, face or place. Such an attitude will contribute nothing worthwhile to the welfare of mankind.

It is time that the scattered fragments of the Restoration movement be gathered together. We have been shattered, splintered and severed too long. Hearts have been saddened, family ties broken, communities rent asunder, and congregations torn to bits by explosive passions. The glorious concept of brotherhood must once again be recaptured, the ideal must be re-affirmed and the hearts of all stirred into action leading toward peace. The bugle call of destiny sounds again and those who have been sleeping in their party bivouacs must arouse themselves and form an unbroken army to march against the common foe. We shall gain nothing for our age by perpetuating the feuds of our fathers. If in their search for truth they were split and riven, in our continued search for truth let us find the nobler path of unity.

They have rights who dare maintain them;

we are traitors to our sires,

Smothering in their holy ashes

Freedom's new-lit altar fires;

Shall we make their creeds our jailer?

Shall we in our haste to slay,

From the tombs of the old prophets steal the funeral lamps away

To light up the martyr-fagots round the prophets of today?

Adventures in Religion (1)

Mission Messenger (September 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

All who love the Lord Jesus desire above everything else to be loyal to His cause. No one who has “set to his seal that God is true” would deliberately and maliciously offend the Father. But we have become so factional in these days and division is so rife, that we tend to mistake loyalty to the party for allegiance to Christ. We have become the victims of so many pressure groups that we seldom stop to determine how Jesus would react to our complex problems. Many of us do not really know him as a person, although we know a number of things about him. There is a great difference!

Of course none of us can be sure of just how our Lord would deal with some of the situations which confront us. He has left us no detailed bill of particulars and has given us no legal code with all the contingencies spelled out in fine print. We do not even have a biography providing a complete story of his life. Matthew, Mark, Luke and John had no intention of giving us a history of his career. They merely set forth those events that would prove that he was the Son of God. The latter admitted that Jesus did many things which he did not chronicle and said, “If they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written.”

God does not deal with us in these last days as with children. He has not supplied us a rule book with footnotes in which every phase of spiritual activity is meticulously covered. We must ascertain those principles which governed our Lord and apply them as best we can in the Jet Age which is far removed from the days of Herod and Pontius Pilate. Fortunately those principles have never been abrogated by heaven nor superseded by any superior wisdom of mankind. We can by a proper study of the greatest life ever to bless this earth learn that personal philosophy which will be best for us during our brief life span. I should like to suggest a few things which appear to me to have relevance for our day.

1. Jesus did not recognize every command of God as of equal weight and significance. He knew there were certain requirements that were central to our relationship while others were peripheral. When a lawyer asked him which was the great commandment in the law Jesus did not say there was no such thing. Instead he recited the command to love God. He said, "This is the first and great commandment." He then gave the second and said, "On these two hang all the law and the prophets."

This is a forceful statement because it shows that love for God and neighbor is basic. From these two every other thing required is suspended. One might break the formal and ritualistic requirements and while he would be held accountable for these infractions the relationship would remain intact, but if he rejected or violated the foundational requirements the whole structure would tumble in disarray. The lawyer was discerning enough to see this. He replied, "Master, you have spoken the truth . . . to love God . . . and to love your neighbor as yourself—is far more than any burnt offerings or sacrifices." The record says, "When Jesus saw how sensibly he answered, he said to him, 'You are not far from the kingdom of God.'"

The converse of this must be that when a man regards ritual and ceremonial requirements as being on par with personal relationship to God and his brethren he is a long way from the kingdom. One nears the kingdom, according to Jesus, when he sensibly approaches the problem of our relationship as contrasted with legal demands. Yet most of our divisions have been caused by some aspect of tragic error at this juncture. Jesus knew that the law was given by God but he knew there were “weightier matters” than some of the keen points of distinction which had been arrived at by the scrupulous legalistic minds of the scribes.

2. Jesus evaluated the relationship with a brother as taking precedence over a formal act of religious service. “If you are offering your gift at the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar and go; first be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift.” The altar was ordained of God. It was the very center of national worship. The most important religious ritual was to be interrupted to establish proper relationship with a brother. Jesus would never have considered that a thing was settled so long as division existed between brethren. He would never have callously remarked when a brother was driven forth, “It is good riddance of bad rubbish!” He taught that reconciliation with an offended brother was to be the constant endeavor of those who love His instruction. Actually Jesus associated with “the rubbish.”

3. Jesus recognized that man was not made for religion, but religion was made for man, and the ultimate expression of religion was doing good to needy mankind. One sabbath while they were going through the grainfields, the disciples plucked off heads of grain, rubbed off the husks between their palms, and ate the grain. The Pharisees immediately called to the attention of Jesus that his followers were doing what was not lawful on the sabbath. Jesus went to the very heart of the matter. He recalled that when David “was in need and was hungry” he entered the very precincts of the house of God and there ate the bread of the Presence, which it was not lawful for any but the priests to eat.

This teaching was revolutionary to the legalists of that day. All legalism sacrifices human need to ceremonial observance. The life, or even the soul, of a man is worthless compared with “obeying the law.” Let the law be upheld at all costs, regardless of human suffering or inner turmoil. Men are but machines, mere robots, to perform stated acts. This reasoning was directly contradicted by Jesus when he declared, “The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath.” The goal of religion is to develop one in all his faculties and potentials to the highest possible degree. It is to encourage and assist him in the arrival at that place where his personality fulfils the divine responsibility which is his to bear. When religion becomes destructive of the finer virtues, when it engenders hatred, animosity and carping criticism, when it drives apart those who claim to love Jesus instead of drawing them closer together it is prostituted to the baser elements of our earthbound existence.

It is a sad error to mistake being loyal to the party or to partisan traditions with being loyal to Jesus and the ideals which he espoused and for which he died. It is possible that nothing in our day so militantly stands in the way of real Christian living as party prejudices. We need men who will rise above such narrow concepts of brotherhood and restore to our aching hearts the real Jesus, in all the glory and majesty of that divine love which sent him to an unworthy world filled with sinners. True Christianity has not been tried and found wanting— it has just not been tried in our generation!

4. Jesus intimated that the ability to love may be in proportion to a recognition of the need for forgiveness. One who feels that he is so good that he requires little mercy from God will have but meager compassion for others. Such a person lavishes all of his love upon himself and has but a small surplus to share with anyone else. This was exemplified when a prostitute came in from the street while Jesus was dining with a rich Pharisee. The woman stood behind Jesus crying, letting her tears fall on his feet and then drying them with her hair. She kissed his feet and anointed them with expensive perfume, an action which made the host indignant. This elicited one of the most pointed parables which Jesus concluded with the remark, "But the man who has little to be forgiven has only a little love to give." If we would develop a love to share we must begin with a sense of our own need. He who comes short of recognizing his shortcomings will come up short in bestowing love.

Restoration Astray

Mission Messenger (October 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

The task of a faithful historian is never an easy one. Human nature being what it is no cause involving men, regardless of the high ideals with which it began, can long continue uncorrupted. The true recorder of events must not allow his personal bias to influence him to the extent that he will unduly emphasize the gains and successes and withhold from the reader the less flattering aspects. It is in such an attitude that we undertake our current series of investigations. Only time and our finished product can reveal whether we will be able to maintain that degree of objectivity with which we begin.

Most of those who read this little journal are the heirs of a noble religious experiment which was launched about the beginning of the nineteenth century. It was described by one of its chief advocates as “a project to unite the Christians in all sects.” In previous issues we have sought to trace the roots of this worthy endeavor. We have explored the background, character and other factors in the lives of the men who were motivated to inaugurate such a majestic program.

We regret that our task is not completed. It would be pleasant to halt our narrative on the high plane of idealism with which the Restoration movement began. Unfortunately, that movement has now degenerated into the most divided one in the contemporary religious scene. In addition to the major cleavage occasioned by introduction of instrumental music, there are now some two dozen segments of the non-instrument group alone. We propose to examine the underlying causes contributing to the rise of factionalism and determine if possible when the disciple brotherhood abandoned its original aim. Our purpose is not to be merely critical of past attitudes but to personally profit by the mistakes of our predecessors. Certainly we can better get the Restoration movement back on the main track if we know at what point it was derailed.

In developing this phase of the subject it is impossible to write as a disinterested observer or an outsider. The writer, after leaving the Lutheran communion at an early age, virtually grew up in one of the parties resulting from disintegration of the Restoration movement. The members of this splinter group regarded it as the church of God on earth. It alone constituted the kingdom of heaven, and its constituents were the only faithful children of God. All others were looked upon as aliens or errorists whose only hope of eternal life lay in locating and formally attaching themselves to one of the “loyal” congregations, a term used to designate those local units which met the party tests.

I freely confess that I was factional in my outlook. I conformed without question to the traditions of the party fathers. Everyone who did not conform I regarded as either a sectarian or a hobbyist. When one altered his views and could no longer endorse our position fully I looked upon him as a traitor to Jesus and an apostate from the faith. I either joined in verbally “stoning” him or figuratively held the coats of those who did so. I helped to drive from us those whose only guilt was that they were too honest to allow us to continue to think that they condoned our interpretation on every point.

When I write about the factional spirit I write from experience. I know the extent to which one may deceive himself into believing that a party is the one body, and that no one can be joined unto Jesus who is not an adherent of the party. I know how sincerely men may labor under this delusion to make the sacred scriptures a factional oracle and interpret each passage as if it were written solely to advocate the party platform. I know what it means to search the word of God as a favorite debater and recognized champion to find those passages which can be used to gain a victory over the chosen gladiator of a rival party. I can say truthfully that I never doubted when I engaged in any debate that I alone represented the church of God on earth and that my opponent was deceived, if not actually a deceiver.

Now I am saddened by my past disposition of intolerance and lack of charity. It only contributed to greater dissension and gendered more strife in a world already too filled with that unwholesome commodity. We gain nothing for the cause of our Lord by selfishness and bigotry. While most of us had little to do with the creation of those factions with which we are allied, our perpetuation of them only serves to add to the confusion and distress of the religious realm. No segment, group, or faction growing out of the Restoration movement is the church of Christ to the exclusion of all others. Not even “The Church of Christ” as a separate organization listed in the United States Census is the church of God exclusively. The census bureau can number, list and catalogue the members of an organization, but only God knows the names of all who are in the divine organism— the one body.

A Forsaken Goal

The Restoration movement was not inaugurated to launch another “church” yet it has resulted in a number of warring groups being started. It is not unfair to say that those who started out to bring peace to a divided church are now the most antagonistic of all the current religious segments. Their bitter attacks upon each other by radio, newspaper, and other mass media, have made any plea for unity by them a laughing-stock among thinking people. The movement has actually ceased to “move” and has crystallized into a sect. The various parties look upon accessions from each other as “conversions” and report in partisan journals with great glee the defection of a preacher from another party to their own.

Certainly when the Restoration movement ceased to be a means to an end and became the end, it then and there became merely another religious organization among many others. It can never be restored to its original aim and purpose until its members are made to realize that the work of restoration was never completed. Only when these disciples are ready to assume the task of seeking to “unite the Christians in all the sects” can it truly be said that we have resumed where our fathers left off. We must regard the interim as a mere interlude and the structure (or structures) we have erected as but temporary at best, in many cases unnecessary and in some cases detrimental to the cause of our Lord. It will be difficult indeed for most of us to attain to this plane of thought but unless we do we can only look forward to other divisions in the future. We will cumber the ground instead of bearing fruit and God may order that we be cut down.

In this study of causes we shall attempt to be factual and practical. Our aim will not be to find fault or to assess guilt but to study those factors which operated in the lives of men at certain stages of the Restoration movement contributing to its present state. Men live but a few decades at most. Their lives and convictions are shaped by their environment and training. They seldom accumulate a great deal of knowledge of the past. They cannot peer into the future and determine the ultimate consequences of their acts. They can only practice and perform in the light available unto them. Perhaps in the same circumstances we would proceed exactly as they did. We will not help the present by being bitterly censorious of those who preceded us nor arrogantly self-righteous about our own attitudes or abilities. If our fathers slew the prophets we need not garnish their tombs.

A Forgotten Task

It is necessary to re-state again and again for this generation the basis upon which the pioneers of restoration hoped to answer the prayer of Jesus for unity. Not only have they forsaken it but they have forgotten it! Thomas Campbell early learned that the foundation of the Christian system was faith in a person. He observed that the divisions existing among the believers had been caused by exalting opinions and he rightly saw that there could never be unity upon such grounds. It remained for Alexander Campbell to distinguish so aptly between faith, knowledge and opinion, and to demonstrate clearly that God had predicated unity upon the first because it was absolutely impossible to achieve upon the basis of the other two.

The creeds of men were regarded as statements of crystallized opinion, divisive in their very nature because they demanded conformity in the realm of opinion and proscribed all who could not in good conscience conform. They were not rejected merely because they were creeds, that is statements of belief, but because they all created a false basis of acceptance and justification by setting up agreement in irrelevant matters as the ground of salvation. It was proposed to offset and eliminate the baneful effects of these by a re-affirmation of the divine creed, belief that Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ and the Son of God.

This was deemed the central fact of the whole Christian system. It was the hub which joined all of the spokes together and while these might appear to be far apart at the perimeter they were held together in a unified whole by the rim of love, that circumferential tie which maintained a unity in diversity.

Those who were joined to Christ might differ about many matters of opinion and interpretation but these were to be subjects for discussion and not occasions for division. Nothing was to be regarded of the same importance as the recognition of the Sonship of Jesus for upon this fact the salvation of the whole world depended. It was primary while matters of doctrinal growth were secondary. Faith was to hold a man to Christ while opinions were held by men in Christ.

A Factual Example

The restoration movement began to disintegrate only when men forsook its original premise. It was wrecked on the rocks of creedalism although these were unseen dangers since they were unwritten creeds. In its inception the opinions of men were never allowed to become tests of fellowship. One of the best examples of this is found in the treatment accorded Aylette Raines.

Aylette Raines was born in Spottsylvania county, Virginia, January 22, 1798, and was sprinkled in the Episcopal Church when four years old. When he was 13 years old the family moved to Kentucky where he later began teaching at the age of 18, continuing for three years. He then moved to Crawford county, Indiana, and here fell under the powerful influence of a sect of the Universalists. Being a young man of brilliance and unlimited courage he began proclaiming the final holiness, happiness and salvation of all men. He was joined in this endeavor by a good friend and fellow-worker, E. Williams. They called themselves "Restorationists" because of their belief that all men would be restored to original purity and perfection.

Raines carried his message into Ohio where he learned that Walter Scott was making a tremendous impact upon the thinking of the people. Convinced of the rightness of his position, and ready to meet any who challenged it, Raines went to hear Scott. The first message made a profound impression upon him and he returned only to have his initial impressions strengthened. The conviction took hold of him that he had not been proclaiming the gospel at all. The philosophy he had been announcing, whether it was true or false, could not save a man from sin. If one believed it there was nothing in it to save him, if he disbelieved it there was nothing in it to damn him. He began to preach the Good News that Jesus was the Messiah and God's Son and that justification from past sins was achieved through faith in this fact. Meanwhile he still retained his philosophy called "Restorationism."

The change in his presentation brought Raines into conflict with his former colleagues. After much discussion with Williams the latter also became convinced of the rightness of the gospel plea. He and Raines went down into the water and Williams immersed Raines into Christ, whereupon Raines reciprocated by immersing Williams. Mr. Raines then made application to be received into the Mahoning Association and this provided the first real test of the principle that men can be united in the faith while holding to divergent opinions about speculative matters. Of this occasion one historian who was later intimately associated with Aylette Raines writes as follows:

It was at this point that the first great danger arose to try the nerves and test the wisdom of the pioneers in this cause, and put to the proof the principles which they had espoused, and upon which they had launched their enterprise. It was the question whose solution was to determine the fate of the Restoration. If the disciples could not be united in faith and have fellowship with each other, while holding contrary opinions as respects matters lying outside the circle of faith, then the movement was doomed to dismal failure. But if they could do these two things, the success of their plea could not be thwarted. Thus the most momentous interests were placed in the balance.

Fortunately at the next meeting of the Mahoning Association both Thomas and Alexander Campbell, as well as

Walter Scott, were present. Jacob Orsborne introduced the matter and asked for a definite settlement of the question whether a man holding the views of Aylette Raines should be accepted. Thomas Campbell was the first to speak on the subject. He expressed regret that such questions should even be introduced or that a man's opinion should be held to be a subject for discussion. He said, “Brother Raines has been with me during the last several months and we have fully unbosomed ourselves to each other. He is philosophically a Restorationist and I am a Calvinist, but notwithstanding this difference of opinion between us, I would put my right hand into the fire and have it burned off, before I would hold up my hands against him. And from all I know of Brother Raines, if I were Paul, I would have him in preference to any young man of my acquaintance to be my Timothy.”

Alexander Campbell spoke next. He reviewed what he had said so often about the distinction between faith and opinion. He asserted that if a man held to and proclaimed the everlasting gospel of Christ large liberty should be allowed him in the domain of private opinion. He proposed that Mr. Raines give assurance that he would proclaim the gospel as did the apostles and retain his opinions as private property. Walter Scott concurred with the Campbells and Raines expressed his intention to pursue the course suggested. The question was then put to the Association. “Whether there be any law of Christ by which a brother could be condemned who deported himself as Mr. Raines proposed to do.” The Association voted by a large majority that there was no scriptural ground for rejecting such a person and he was received with full accord.

The sequel to this account is found in this statement published by Aylette Raines near the close of his long and eventful career in the service of Christ:

The great kindness and magnanimity with which the Campbells and Walter Scott treated me after my baptism, and before I was convinced of the erroneousness of my restorationist philosophy. They used to say to me, 'It is a mere philosophy like Calvinism and Arminianism, and no part of the gospel.' They made these isms of but little value and therefore not worth contending for, and they did not put themselves in conflict with my philosophy, but rather urged me to preach the gospel in matter and form as did the apostles. This all appeared to me to be reasonable, and I did it; and one of the consequences was, that the philosophy within me became extinct, having no longer the coals of contention by which to warm or the crumbs of sectarian righteousness upon which to feed.

A Further Achievement

A demonstration of the spirit of reform which rose above all factional tendencies is found in the union effected between the forces gathered by the proclamation of Barton W. Stone and those which rallied behind the Campbells. When it was learned that there was great similarity in the pleas made by each of these groups there naturally arose an interest in trying to promote a unified effort. It was aptly pointed out that if the principle espoused was not great enough to weld together those who were so close in their ideals it was hopeless to try to unite the rest of the religious world.

There existed some grave differences in the position of Stone and Campbell. Although both had grown up in the Presbyterian communion their backgrounds were divergent. When Stone became convinced as early as 1804 that immersion was the apostolic practice he did not see the relation of baptism for the remission of sins. He would not consent to join the Baptist party and no Baptist preacher would immerse him unless he did, so he was immersed by a Presbyterian. After Campbell was immersed the Brush Run congregation (in 1813) made application to be received into the Redstone Baptist Association and acceptance was granted. Alexander Campbell believed that among the Baptists there could be accomplished a work of reformation unparalleled on earth. In 1825 he wrote:

In one thing the Baptists may appear, in time to come, proudly singular and preeminently distinguished. Their historian in the year 1900 may say, We are the only people who ever did tolerate any person to continue as a reformer or restorer among us. While other Sects excluded all who would have enlarged their views or exalted their virtues, while every Jerusalem in Christendom stoned its own prophets and exiled its own best friends and compelled them to set up for themselves, we (Baptists) constituted the only exception of this kind in the annals of Christianity— nay, in the annals of the world.

This statement proved too optimistic and the union with the forces of Stone established the breach with the Baptists. An outstanding Baptist leader said, “The Campbellites have made the gulf between us impassable by throwing themselves into the arms of the Arians.” The uniting of the two forces striving for restoration was not easy but finally accomplished by the utter crucifixion of the party spirit. There were two main areas of difference which had to be resolved. One had to do with the name by which the saints should be designated, the other with the nature of Jesus Christ or the doctrine of “the Trinity.”

Stone had long contended that the reformers should be styled Christians, while Alexander Campbell held out for the word disciples. He advanced his reasons for his position in well prepared essays as was his custom on any controversial issue. It was here the basic principle of the restoration exhibited its utility and the question was resolved by refusing to bind upon the brethren either position in a dogmatic fashion. J. B. Briney wrote of their agreement as follows:

As religious names the early restorers saw that the only thing essential to unity was to discard all human and unscriptural names, and wear only such as are approved by the scriptures— any of them or all of them. It was discovered that a single name was not necessary to unity, for it was noticed that the primitive church was united, although the members were known by various names, such as disciples, Christians, saints, brethren, etc. In this matter and within New Testament limits the followers of Christ are free.

The other problem was more difficult. Stone rejected the speculative Trinitarian formula which was written into the orthodox creeds. Since all creeds are regarded by their adherents as being merely statements summarizing the doctrine of God, to reject the language of the creed as they look at it is to reject the word of God. Accordingly the Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists of that day concluded that any man who refused to be designated a Trinitarian must be a Unitarian. In vain Stone tried to tell them that he was neither and in an attempt to explain his position he made statements which were twisted and stretched by his opponents into apparent denial of the deity of Jesus. The preachers of the various sects placed their interpretations on what Stone said and forthwith attacked those interpretations as representing his position. The battle waxed great.

It was in this instance that the distinction between faith and opinion saved the day. Those who were allied with both the “Christians” and the “disciples” believed in and proclaimed the facts of the gospel. All acknowledged that Jesus of Nazareth was the only begotten Son of God, that he was made flesh and dwelled among men, that he died for our sins, was buried, and rose again on the third day for our justification. All agreed that we are cleansed from our sins by his blood and that he ever lives to make intercession for us. All recognized him as the great high priest residing at the right hand of God. They agreed to proclaim these things in the language of the Spirit and to insist upon no special theory or view of his pre-incarnate nature. Each man might retain his personal opinion as to the mode of divine existence but to advocate such an opinion was distinct from preaching the word. Consequently they agreed to give themselves to proclaiming the gospel while retaining their opinions to themselves. Again we quote from J. B. Briney:

But happily they soon came to see that it was wholly a speculative matter that did not pertain either to human salvation or Christian living, and that it should not be made a test of fellowship among disciples of Christ, nor of controversy among brethren— that it should be relegated to the realm of opinion and every individual left free to hold such opinions on the subject as might seem to each one to be most in accord with Scripture teaching and human reason.

A Fatal Error

What has happened to the heirs of this noble project inaugurated “to unite the Christians in all the sects”? They have become fractured into more than two dozen warring factions representing the most divided religious movement on the American scene today. Having abandoned the fundamental principles of the Restoration movement they have allowed themselves to degenerate into narrow parties, each with its own unwritten creed as a test of fellowship and communion. The philosophy they have espoused can only lead to more division in the future. It is prompted by “the will to divide” and nurtured by a misconception of certain elemental truths related to our relationship together in Christ Jesus. Actually legalism has been substituted for love and dogmatism has displaced liberty in the Lord.

Under the guise of upholding the authority of God’s word the representatives of each faction put forward their own interpretations and opinions and these are made the criteria of judgement. The honest soul who cannot in good conscience conform is branded as a heretic and expelled from the party.

There are as many standards of authority as there are factions and each faction protests that it alone is “loyal” and all of the rest are traitors and apostates. The least deviation from a traditional procedure is regarded as an excuse to destroy all brotherly relationship and becomes the occasion of another division. Nothing is so cheap, nothing so little valued among members of “The Church of Christ” as brotherhood. It can be strangled or crucified at a moment’s notice and over the most trivial matters.

Although each faction still pays lip service to the distinction between matters of faith and opinion, no two groups are agreed on what things belong in either of these categories. What is considered a matter of faith by one group is recognized as a matter of opinion by others, and vice versa. Almost without exception they have lost the distinction between the gospel of Christ and the apostolic doctrine and have made the tragic mistake of concluding that all of the new covenant writings are a part of the gospel. This is the weak spot in the armor, the Achilles’ heel, which must some day doom the movement to extinction unless corrected! So long as this fallacy is maintained there can be predicted a dire future of division and strife in which blinded partisans will bite and devour one another until the inevitable fate of such conduct overtakes them.

Many of the current divisions could never have occurred if men had been true to the principles which sparked the restoration movement. Unfortunately, the Campbells and their contemporaries were succeeded by men of lesser ability and greater personal ambition and we can today see the result in a disturbed and scattered brotherhood. Men have climbed to prominence as the chief proponents or opponents of certain issues which should always have been kept in the realm of opinion. When issues are forced and stressed beyond their proper proportion and relation to the Christian system only strife and evil can result. The intemperate attack on brethren who hold certain views always results in crystallization of party feeling. Some men seem to thrive as defenders of orthodoxy and must find an issue to keep themselves in the public eye. If they do not find one they invent one or distort the position of some other brother.

A Case In Point

As an example of unnecessary division caused by ignoring the principle relating to faith and opinion we may cite the formal separation over the pre-millennial interpretation of the scriptures. It will come as a surprise to our readers in other parts of the world and as a shock to those from other religious segments in our own country, to learn that an opinion relative to unfulfilled prophecy has created such a cleavage that in many communities in the United States there are two separate and distinct parties operating under the title "Church of Christ" and having little to do with each other except in case of public debate. Each party has its own schools for training of a special ministerial class, each has its own recognized journals, each its own missionaries.

I do not subscribe to the pre-millennial viewpoint. My personal position is opposed to this interpretation, but it is absolutely unthinkable to me that such a thing should be made a condition or test of fellowship. It happens that many of the pioneers in the restoration movement were inclined toward the pre-millennial idea of the coming of our Lord but this did not affect their association with brethren who felt otherwise. It was only after men were betrayed into adopting the factional attitude and setting up orthodoxy as the basis of fellowship that the matter was pressed and pursued until schism resulted. It was repeated and rehearsed like playing on a harp with one string until it seemed that a position on this matter was the most important thing in all Christendom.

One is made to wonder to what extent future generations are made to suffer under the stigma created by ambitious and implacable leaders of previous decades. Many of our current divisions are inherited and the real cause which produced them originally was the temperament of the leaders in the early struggle. Of all the inexcusable, unjustifiable, and ridiculous divisions to perpetuate among a people who propose to bring unity to a divided religious world, that over the premillennial interpretation is the worst. Here is dogmatism gone to seed! An acceptance of an opinion as to the millennium is not essential to one's salvation. Thousands of men and women died for the faith of the gospel long before John wrote the Revelation letter. As a result of this scandal in the Restoration movement we now have two well defined parties with little fraternal exchange between them. This is the result of pressures and insistence from both sides followed by the inevitable public debates in which partisan gladiators spar for every forensic advantage. Neither side is guiltless before God. Both tend to look with some misgiving, and often with open suspicion, upon those who are not allied with their party. It is probable that those of pre-millennial leanings are somewhat more lenient and charitable than some of their rabid opponents, but they are certainly not all free from factional bias. The rash accusations made against them have caused them to counter with everything at their command and truth lies wounded in the street, the innocent victim of such exchanges.

We need to eliminate such cleavages and tear down the walls that have been erected against brothers in the Lord. It will be difficult because of prejudicial statements that have been made. Not long ago an official in a southern "Church of Christ" college told me that the pre-millennial brethren preached another Jesus. I told him that they recognized Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah and God's Son and this was the same Jesus whom I also confessed. He pointed out what he alleged were certain mistakes in their views about the position of Jesus. Apparently he could not grasp the difference between mistaken identity and wrong ideas about the right person.

I am not a member of any kind of millennial party. I welcome as my brothers in Christ those who hold the various views and ideas of the Lord's return. Certainly some of them are mistaken, and in some respects they may all prove to be. But it is not a view as to how he will come again that is the foundation of Christian union. It is belief that he has come in the flesh! "By this you know the Spirit of God: every spirit which confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God" (1 John 4:2). Brethren should cease to proclaim as gospel their opinions and interpretations relative to the second coming. These are not a part of the gospel, whether they be right or wrong. We should not try to bind these views upon anyone as essential to salvation for they are not, and by the same token they should not be made tests of fellowship.

Our separation over such matters is an outgrowth of the party spirit. This is a work of the flesh. It is a sign of unspirituality and immaturity. It will damn us if we persist in it and refuse to repent. A man may be wrong about the millennium and go to heaven if he does not have the party spirit; he may be right about the millennium and go to hell if he does have the party spirit. Any man who makes a test of fellowship out of a millennial interpretation— pre or post, pro or con— creates an unwritten creed. Such a person is a partisan and a factionalist. There have been too many such factionalists on both sides of the issue. All such persons are childish, puerile in thought, and like ordinary men of the world. "For while there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not of the flesh, and behaving like ordinary men?"

If we are ever to put an end to the shameful state which now exists we must rise above the factional spirit in which we have been reared. We must recognize as our brethren those who are on both sides of the fences that men have constructed. I want it known to all who read this that I shall not allow such issues as the one under discussion to affect my relationship with any of my brethren. I propose to move freely among all of them, associate with them, respect them and love them. I shall not allow myself to be forced into any kind of party relative to the millennium through threats, coercion, group pressure or fear of boycott. It is time to call a halt to the insane frenzy of factionalism which will make a shambles of our plea!

I shall allow no theory or opinion about the coming of my Lord to drive me into hatred or antagonism toward any of my brothers for whom that Lord died. I love them because they are children of the same Father as myself. “Every one who loves the parent loves the child” (John 5:1). Jesus did not accept these because they held a particular view as to his second coming; I will not reject them for that reason! It is time to awaken out of sleep. It is time to repair the divisive damage our fathers have wrought. They were sincere but they were wrong about the implications of brotherhood and fellowship. Because they ate sour grapes is no indication that their children’s teeth should be set on edge!

Let those of us who truly love God begin now to show it by loving all of His children. Let us move freely among all of our brethren, loving them and praying for them in spite of their treatment of us. If we cannot batter down the stone walls that men have erected to debar their brethren let us gather the tools for those who come after us so they may be more successful because of our preparatory efforts. Those stones which are loosened from the wall, let us not hurl at each other, but pile them up for a foundation of a bridge of good will which may some day span the chasm caused by the erosion of the soil of brotherhood. Let us not bequeath to our posterity the sad legacy that we have had bestowed upon us by our fathers. It is time to do a right about face if we are to face about right!

Altering Attitudes

The division over the millennial question is merely one example of the many which harass and hamper us. All of them are the result of an attitude which makes a brother of less value than an opinion. This is an exact reversal of the attitude which sponsored the Restoration movement. Now we must make another complete change if we are to recapture the spirit of that great effort. We have forsaken "the will to unite" and have been betrayed into adoption of the "will to divide." We must once again make fellowship in Christ Jesus of greater significance than orthodoxy. Such an ideal will not be easy to attain. It must fight for every inch of ground with partisan leaders entrenched in power and prestige. But it will eventually triumph because it is the will of God. Nowhere in the sacred scriptures is division authorized or sanctioned as a means of settling differences between brethren.

In order to properly assess the magnitude of work we must do in the recovery of the sense of brotherhood we propose to deal frankly and candidly with how and where the Restoration movement was diverted and sidetracked. This will mean the debunking of some of our long cherished grounds for partisan boasting. Certainly those who have been regarded as party heroes will be found to be all too human and our earthly idols will be found to have feet of clay. However, our purpose will not be to affix personal judgment but simply to re-discover those lost principles which will enable us to overcome the tragic state which now renders our plea for unity a laughingstock before the world. May we have your interest in the next issue which will get to the very core of our problem.

We trust that our brethren will look charitably upon our humble effort to face up to the grave problem of disunity in our day. We make no vaunted boast of having all the answers. We are merely sharing with you our ideas of what we believe will usher in a brighter future for our children. If you cannot concur in our thinking we will love and respect you just the same. We are not obligated to love the things that have divided us. We are obligated to love our brethren. We do not regard them as separated from us but we are separated from each other. If our words seem critical and censorious of brethren we beg your forgiveness. We are not fighting our brethren; we are warring only against the factional attitude. “For we wrestle not against flesh and blood.” We eagerly solicit your prayers in our behalf, regardless of your present alliance. May God be with you all.

Adventures in Religion (2)

Mission Messenger (October 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

1. Jesus taught that a man creates the standard by which he will be judged. We will be weighed in the scales which we use to weigh others. God will accept our own yardstick as the criterion by which we will be measured. “For with what judgment you judge, you shall be judged; and with what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again.” If your basis of judgment for your brothers is strict conformity to legalistic procedure and you deviate from that law in the slightest degree you sign your own death warrant and seal your own doom. If you demand as a requisite to fellowship with you that others must have the same degree of spiritual knowledge as yourself, then you must have the same degree of knowledge as God to be in His fellowship. If you do not have, you will be damned, not because God desires to judge you thus, but because you chose that basis of judgment.

The way to assure that God will be lenient and merciful unto you is to be forbearing and forgiving toward your brethren. “Accept life with humility and patience, making allowances for one another because you love one another” (Eph. 4:2 Phillips). Since we cannot claim perfection God must either make some allowances for us or we will be lost. I am convinced that He is willing to do this because He loves us. But if we do not love our brothers enough to make allowances for them we cannot expect to measure them by one rule and be measured by another.

It is for this reason we are under a “law of liberty” which means that we operate under a principle of freedom. The apostle says, “We are free to serve God not in the old obedience to the letter of the law, but in a new way, in the Spirit” (Romans 7:6). If we were under law and not under grace we could not make allowances for one another regardless of the degree of our love. We would have to “exact the pound of flesh for every failure” because law knows nothing of mercy, but only of justice. Since we serve in a new way we can extend mercy for ignorance and mitigating circumstances. Circumstances do make a difference. “Anyway, you should speak and act as men who will be judged by the law of freedom. The man who makes no allowances for others will find none made for him. It is still true that ‘mercy smiles in the face of judgment’” (James 2:12, 13).

Recently, on the outskirts of a town I saw a sign which read: “Speed Limit— 25 Miles Per Hour. Fine— One dollar for every mile in excess. Write your own ticket!” In that town the judge will assess you according to your own decision. The eternal judge will do the same. It will be well to recall that Jesus said, “For if you forgive people their failures your heavenly Father will forgive you; but if you do not forgive people their failures neither will your heavenly Father forgive yours” (Matt. 6:14, 15).

A prospective proselyte once approached the aged Rabbi Hillel (who died when Jesus was about ten years old) and enquired of him what was involved in obeying the law. The reply was, “What is hateful to thee, do not unto others. This is the law, the rest is commentary.” Jesus agreed that the rest was commentary but he turned it from a negative to a positive statement. “Therefore in whatever way you would have people treat you, treat them the same; for this sums up the law and the Prophets.” You are writing your own ticket!

2. Jesus taught that reciprocal love is no proof of a righteous life. It is not a distinction belonging to children of God and, therefore, has no particular promise of reward. Such love not only falls short of perfection, but is grounded in selfishness whereas true love is selfless. It expends itself with no thought of personal gain or return. Much of our love today is partisan and parochial. It is exclusive and limited. It is reserved for those who do things as we do. Many point to closely knit factions and fraternities as examples of love. In reality these may be merely mutual admiration societies. Their members love each other only because they know they have the ability to respond in kind. That is like being certain that a man has the money on hand to pay back a loan before you let him have it. Such a man does not really need the loan. Jesus used this very illustration.

“If you love only those who love you, what credit is that to you? Even sinners love those who love them! And if you do good only to those who do good to you, what credit is that to you? Even sinners do that. And if you lend only to those from whom you hope to get your money back, what credit is that to you? Even sinners lend to sinners and hope to get their money back. No, you are to love your enemies and do good and lend without hope of return. Your reward will be wonderful and you will be sons of the most high.”

Here is a real test of the depth of your conviction. God has said “your reward will be wonderful” if you turn love loose in your life and turn your life loose in love. If your motto has been to “live and let live” He challenges you to get love and really live! Do you know someone who is an enemy of yours? The best way to get rid of him is to “love him to death.” When Lincoln was rebuked for showing kindness to the South during the Civil War and told that he ought to destroy his enemies, he answered, “Do I not destroy them when I make them my friends?” One of the quickest ways to destroy factionalism is for those who are members of various parties to start visiting each other— not to find fault but to find friends! Jesus ate with publicans and sinners because He loved mankind. The Pharisees and scribes murmured because they did not know how to love that kind of man. Their religion got in the way of their love. Such religion is the worst kind of slavery. A member of a faction said to me not long ago, "I'd like to get out to hear you but I do not know what they would do to me." A man in jail once said identically the same thing to me.

3. Jesus taught that the will of the Father is sovereign and He has a perfect right to administer His affairs as He wishes. What God wills to do is right, because He has the right to will to do it! He may dispose of His blessings irrespective of any previous agreement. This is illustrated in the story of the farmer who went to hire laborers for His vineyard. Early in the morning he hired a group after agreeing to pay them each a silver coin a day. He went out again at nine o'clock in the morning, at noon, and at three o'clock and five o'clock in the afternoon. Each time he hired additional workers and told them to go to work and he would give them a fair wage.

At sundown the laborers were summoned and lined up to receive their pay. The foreman was told to start with the last ones who were hired and pay them off first. As each came forward he was handed a silver coin. Those who were employed first expected to receive more but each got just one silver coin. This caused a lot of grumbling which came to the ears of the farmer. He said to them, "I'm not being unjust with you. Wasn't our agreement for a silver coin a day? Take your money and go home. It is my wish to give the latecomer as much as I give you. May I not do what I like with what belongs to me? Must you be jealous because I am generous?"

In the final day of accounts there may be those who will share in the blessing of God's bounty, not upon the basis of an agreement, but upon the basis of fairness and justice. Jesus continually held out that no law was of universal application. We ought not to bind God by a law which He has given to bind us. When He put all things under the feet of Jesus He excepted Himself. The grace of God existed before the church and is greater than the church. While we have no right to violate the agreement of God, nor seek to receive His blessing upon any other ground, He will not violate that agreement if He sees fit to extend mercy above and beyond it. He can do what He wishes with what belongs unto Him. Let us hope that we shall not be found grumbling about His administration of mercy nor seek to argue about our human concept of fairness.

A Brighter Day

Mission Messenger (October 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

The signs are everywhere manifest that we stand upon the threshold of a new era as heirs of the Restoration movement. After a long dreary night of factionalism and strife, when the dark clouds of debate and partisanship eclipsed the sun, an occasional shaft of light breaking through a rift betokens the dawn of a better day. Those who have long been sick at heart with the wars and wrangles engendered by the factional attitude are lifting up their downcast hearts with a hopefulness unique in our generation. Many despairing that anything could be done to alleviate the sad state of Zion and resigned to trudging the pathway of traditionalism to its bitter end are now cautiously conceding that something may be done!

Something is being done! At the risk of partisan persecution men are daring to rise above the narrow intolerance of their own past to break through walls and batter down barriers which other men have constructed to keep brethren apart. Without sacrificing personal convictions or compromising previous views, the value and dignity of brotherhood is being reaffirmed and recaptured in a drama of spiritual adventure which cannot long be ignored even by its most bitter antagonists. This is one of the most vital and refreshing things that has happened to the forces of restoration in a hundred years. It could become the prelude to a real restoration of the restoration spirit.

The Holy Spirit has a way of supplying needs in the spiritual realm when those needs become acute. God has not retired on social security. This is God's world and nothing is more essential to this age than the gathering and unifying of the forces of righteousness. Slowly, deliberately, but with increasing momentum, hearts are beginning to respond to the irresistible impulse of the Spirit. We are being impelled toward a closer walk with God and our brethren all of them! You can read the stirring story in reports of meetings in many papers. You can see it in happy faces reflecting an inward glow of renewed relationship at those meetings.

For more than two years the editor has sought to avail himself of every invitation to share in the meetings of brethren of every existing faction. He has regarded every such invitation to participate as an open door swung wide by angelic hands, to explore areas of agreement in love. He has watched initial fear and suspicion melt away with hope and joy taking their place. He has seen skepticism supplanted by sanction and doubt dispelled by delight. The army of the saints, plagued by division in its own ranks, harassed by hatred and hamstrung by hostility, is being once again welded into a cohesive force that even yet may bring the full power of its arsenal to bear on the real foe.

Of course there is opposition. We have all been brought up in or brought into a factional pattern. Those who have lived so long in the swamps and lowlands of unbrotherly hate cannot all be transferred at once to the mountain peaks of faith and made to breathe the rarified atmosphere of brotherly love. Many have difficulty getting their breath. While gasping for it they lash out at those whose spiritual lungs are adapted to the purer air. The essential thing is that we love them, cherish them, hold ourselves ready to help them when they will permit. This is the only guarantee against starting another party— the absolute refusal to succumb to the temptation to love only those who agree and separate from those who do not! A faction can only result from a factional spirit.

We must cultivate patience and forbearance! The New English Bible renders Philippians 4:5, "Let your magnanimity be manifest to all." The word translated "magnanimity" is epieikes. It is one of the most important terms in the sacred scriptures to the renewed restoration spirit. We urge our brethren to do research in its implications for our day and its problems. It is not too much to say that this word, correctly understood, will revolutionize our entire approach toward discipline and brotherhood.

The word epieikes is a good illustration of the richness of the Greek language. It demonstrates the keen discriminatory features of that language. We have no single word in our tongue which will adequately translate it. Matthew Arnold renders it "sweet reasonableness" but this does not do justice to it. Aristotle, in the book of ethics which he dedicated to his son Nicomachus, concluded that the term signified that which was better than justice. He said it is that which corrects the law when a deficiency occurs because of the generality of the law.

Laws are given to regulate intelligent beings but such beings cannot all fall into the same category if they possess will as well as intelligence. They are affected by circumstances, opportunities, natural temperaments and abilities. No law can then be made which will be universal in application. The spirit of the law, its intent, design and purpose, must be understood and applied by intelligent administrators. It is here the Christian administrator is superior because he interprets the law on the side of mercy. If laws are made for the good of man, not only is man superior to law, but his good is superior to law. But the letter of the law is sometimes opposed to the good of man, so there must be some quality which is "better than justice." That quality is expressed by epieikes. Archbishop Trench in his Synonyms of the New Testament says the word expresses that "moderation which recognizes the impossibility that cleaves to formal law."

We believe the Restoration movement began in the spirit of epieikeia but as we became more sectarian in attitude we became more legalistic. This is a natural trend for it is by legalism that the sect perpetuates itself. Now there is every evidence that while respecting and reverencing the will of our absent lord we are rejecting the idea of “smiting our fellow-servants” as a means of demonstrating our faithfulness to our stewardship. This is not equivalent to lowering the requirements of law, or of disregarding any of the demands of law, but it is rising above the letter of the law to operate in the realm of the spirit. Here is our hope for the future. William Barclay in A New Testament Wordbook says, “A new world would arise in society and the Church if men ceased to base their actions on law and on legal rights and prayed to God to give them epieikeia.” Perhaps it would do as well to substitute for some of our outworn slogans the scriptural one, “Let your moderation be known unto all men.”

The Growth of Division

Mission Messenger (November 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

On September 7, 1809, Thomas Campbell presented his “Declaration and Address” at a meeting of “The Christian Association of Washington” in Pennsylvania. Mr. Campbell was a Presbyterian and so were most of the others who were present, but the document which was read and approved set forth principles which were destined to cut across all sectarian lines and give the greatest impetus to Christianity since apostolic days. It constituted the foundation of what was described by Alexander Campbell as a project to unite the Christians in all sects.

Today those of us who are heirs of that restoration movement constitute one of the most divided religious classifications in America. Recently this writer visited representatives of nine different factions in one Texas city. Three of these employ instrumental music in their corporate worship, six of them do not, but not one of the groups has any working relationship with any of the others. In Dallas thirteen distinct factions were catalogued and there may be others. True, some of these are small and insignificant with respect to the number of adherents but they cannot be discounted on that basis. The situation is best illustrated by a statement made by a rather eccentric Texas preacher who is now deceased. Someone who contemplated a move wrote to ask if he could find “a loyal church” in the new location. The preacher wrote back, “There are ten loyal churches in that area and neither one will have a thing to do with any of the others.”

What forces have acted upon the brethren to bring about this sad state of affairs? What are the tributaries which have contributed to this flood tide of factionalism? What caused the will to unite to give way to the will to divide? We must not expect to find a simple answer to our complex problem. It is possible that we can never know all of the factors involved. No one can point to a specific date in our history and say that it marks the beginning of our disintegration into partisan warfare.

Many have undertaken an analysis of this kind in the past. The literature that has been produced upon the subject forms no small accumulation. On what grounds do we again cover the same field with any optimistic hope that we may discover that which others failed to see? Let it be understood that our judgment is not infallible. Our deductions may prove to be incorrect. We do not offer the result of our research to our readers in any dogmatic or arbitrary spirit. We simply share with those who are among the concerned ones certain views which have crystallized as a result of our study. If there is any possibility of our contribution producing results for good it will stem from the following considerations.

1. Many of those who have done research on the outgrowth of the restoration movement have sought justification for the party with which they were affiliated as opposed to other parties. They have regarded all others as factional and themselves as constituting the church of God. We no longer represent any segment, section or splinter growing out of this movement. We freely acknowledge our own factional attitude in the past and apologize for it. Far from delving into our history to justify our past conduct, we begin by admitting that there is no scriptural justification for it. We are searching for the development of the spirit of factionalism, not so much to accuse others of being motivated by it as to eliminate it from our own hearts and lives.

2. We believe it is a fallacy to conclude that we are divided over the things which have been credited with being the cause of our divisions. This is made apparent when we consider that our brethren have seriously differed about certain things which were much more important than some which have been credited with division, yet they have remained together as relates to those things. Too, they did not divide when the so-called divisive things were introduced but labored in mutual brotherhood for many years until agitation drove them apart. Almost every writer has proceeded upon the basis that the introduction of certain things, called innovations, created the divisions. It will be our thesis that the actual division was wrought by the party spirit. Unity is a fruit of the Holy Spirit (Eph. 4:3); disunity is a fruit of the party spirit (Gal. 5:20). Most of those things to which division has been attributed would have caused no real schism among the pioneers of the restoration movement. There first had to come a change of spirit or attitude before division could result.

3. As we view it many of those who have written in the past on all sides of the issues have been guilty of over-simplification. As an example we cite the once common question, "Who drove the wedge that split the log?" In this illustration the log represents the church, but in the first great cleavage in the restoration movement, as in every other one since, there has been disagreement over what constituted the wedge. Those who opposed instrumental music affirmed it was the wedge; those who favored it declared the wedge was the disposition to bind as law that which God had not bound. Fervent orators have stood on each side of the riven log and pointed the finger of accusation at each other. Meanwhile the log remains divided. We confess that we are not so much concerned about who split it as we are about who is going to get it back together. The unity of the log is the important thing. Arguing about who split it may be interesting diversion but it is secondary in importance. God will adequately take care of the guilty one or ones!

However, we cannot resist the impulse to look at a few aspects of this example. We suggest that the identity of the log may be as hazy with some of our brethren as is that of the wedge. It is generally assumed that the log is the church but it was the disciple brotherhood growing out of the restoration movement that was split over instrumental music. That brotherhood did not necessarily constitute the church of God in its fulness. The church is composed of every called out person in the world. Not all of them were affiliated with the disciple brotherhood when the log was split! This fact was well understood by those who constituted that brotherhood in those days. The concept has been lost by most of the splinters since.

If a log is split in half, both halves are a part of the original, and will always remain so. They are related to each other by cells and tissues in a way they can be related to no other trunk or tree in the world. But when “the log” was split each side immediately began to treat the other half as if it were another or foreign log. No relationship was acknowledged, no affinity sought, and the two portions moved farther from each other through the years. It is our contention that before unity can be effected there has to be restored to those who constitute both parts a deep sense of relationship, a mutuality of feeling. If both sides concentrate their sole interest on the wedge and are oblivious of each other there will be no energy expended to produce union. If they consider each other they can at least lessen the gap. It is possible that a recognition of brotherhood can be restored even while the wedge remains in place. Many a tree has for years existed with a knife or scythe imbedded in its trunk. Perhaps we need to suffer awhile from “pricks in our eyes, and thorns in our sides” (Num. 33:55) to teach us the value of respect for the authority of God and love for each other. But we should not suffer in stolid silence when we can remove the pricks and thorns.

I cannot leave this analogy without another observation or two. Those who have sought diligently to affix the blame for splitting the log have been much more concerned about who did it than about the fact that it was done. It is not so much the unity of the log as the identity of the splitter that has interested them. This is proven by the fact that each half has not hesitated to split again and again under almost any provocation. The instrumental brethren have used the cleaver a half dozen times while the non-instrumental brethren have apparently proceeded on the basis that once a log is split the thing to do is to make kindling wood out of your part as soon as possible. If this fragmentation continues the restoration brotherhood will be reduced to a pile of divergent splinters. "The churches of Christ" will be so many toothpicks.

4. Most of those who have written have begun with a false premise about fellowship. They have been misled into assuming that fellowship was something extended or withdrawn by the church. Contrary to this view, fellowship is a state or condition into which we are called by God through the Good News concerning Christ Jesus (1 Cor. 1:9). In reality the body of Christ is the fellowship. This is illustrated in the usage of the word koinonia in 1 Corinthians 10:16, 17: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion (koinonia) of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion (koinonia) of the body of Christ? For we being many are one bread and one body, for we are all partakers of that one bread."

Fellowship is not endorsement. It is not unanimity of opinion or conformity in interpretation. We do not come into the fellowship because we see everything alike, but because we are in fellowship we strive to see things alike. Fellowship is a reality into which we are introduced by God, harmony is an ideal toward which we strive in that relationship. Because of confusion at this juncture those who have written about the restoration have only served to make the rifts wider. With a proper understanding of fellowship we can see factionalism in its true light and recognize it as a sin not to be condoned or sanctioned.

5. All too often developments have been treated as isolated incidents wholly removed from the frame of reference in which they occurred. In our complex world few things are unrelated and wholly unique. The circumstances obtaining at the time when things are introduced have much to do with their acceptance or rejection. That which was pressed to the point of division in one generation might not be given passing notice in another. Our religious convictions are not segregated from our other mental concepts. Life is not a series of unrelated thoughts and actions. Social, economic, scientific and moral factors all combine with our religious views and help to motivate our thinking. It is not wholly by accident that instrumental music, for example, became a problem when an industrial revolution was transforming American from a pioneer status to a more cultural level, nor that division followed close on the heels of the Civil War which had frequently pitted brother against brother and encouraged sectional feeling. This does not justify either the introduction of instrumental music or the division resulting from the attitudes toward it, but it may help to explain both. We propose to weigh all factors within the scope of our limited knowledge and fit them into the puzzling picture when we can.

6. Many of those who have written on the history of the restoration movement imply that our present condition is incurable. While all regard the causing of division as a grave misdemeanor in the sight of God, it is assumed that when division occurs it has to be accepted as an irreparable state. This I refuse to believe. It is unthinkable that the power which drew us together when we were aliens has not the strength to bring us back together once we are brethren. It is not only the creation of division which is a sin, but the division which is created is a violation of God's plan and purpose for mankind. No one can be indifferent about division between brethren and be faithful to the trust imposed upon us by the Father.

I refuse to regard division among brethren as a normal state any more than I regard disease as the normal condition for a physical body. I deny that we should supinely accept the current state of affairs and make the best of it. The fear engendered by the party spirit which has intimidated us in the past should be shaken off with the spirit of complacency. It is time to move forward, to fight factionalism and to wage peace. It is as wrong to perpetuate division as to begin it. We sin when we adopt the philosophy that we are obligated to perpetuate the feuds our fathers started. We are obligated to stop them! Our writing on the rise of factionalism will be in confidence and hope that we can help to rectify the situation. Because something must be done there is something that can be done! Brighter days can come. The dark clouds of disunity can be dispelled. The power of God can effectually work in us.

When Thomas Campbell read the “Declaration and Address” there were only seventeen states which had been admitted to the Union. Ohio was the last to be granted statehood before that time. Beyond its confines to the west lay a great wilderness area, although pioneer settlements, some quite populous, dotted the region between Ohio and the Mississippi River. The first Protestant Church in Missouri Territory had been established but three years before, a congregation of Baptists planted by David Green, near the town of Jackson. Indian tribes still freely roamed and hunted over the area. It was seventeen years later that the Kansas, Shawnee and Iowa tribes were removed from the state. The conditions of that day can best be described by Elder Samuel Rogers, the second preacher to bring the Restoration plea into Missouri.

Not long after I settled in Ohio, a number moved from Bourbon county, Kentucky, and settled on Ramsey’s Creek, in Pike county, Missouri. Their Macedonian cry had come to the ears of Brother James Hughes and myself, and we determined to go to their assistance. We made ready for the journey and set out, prepared to take soldier’s fare on the route, as, most of the country through which we had to pass was yet a wilderness. We were both fond of tea; so we carried a coffee pot, tin cups, and a tea canister with us. At each settlement through which we passed, we would procure provisions enough to last us to the next one. The settlements in Indiana and Illinois were so far apart that we were compelled to camp out most of the way. I had learned to cook in the army, and now made it my business to prepare the meal, while Brother Hughes unsaddled our horses and hobbled them out for the night. I generally had a tin-cupful of strong tea for each of us, and bread and meat sufficient to satisfy the demands of nature but this was all.

Following the work in Pike county, Hughes decided to return to Ohio, but Rogers resolved to go to Howard county and visit with Thomas McBride who was the first preacher to bring the cause of reformation into Missouri. Here is his description of the lonely journey.

By the aid of a pocket compass which I always carried with me in those days, I made the first day's journey without much difficulty, and was fortunate in finding, about sundown, a hunter's camp, in a beautiful grove, convenient to water. Here I determined to stay for the night. I unsaddled my good horse, Paddy, hobbled him, and turned him out to make his supper on the fine grass that was still green in the grove. With my flint and steel I soon kindled a fire; then I prepared my supper, after the eating of which I was ready for bed. My saddle bags were my pillow; I slept on my saddle-blanket and covered myself with the blanket I rode upon. I slept tolerably well until midnight, when I was aroused by the howling of a pack of wolves in the vicinity of the camp. I arose and renewed my fire, knowing that this would keep them at a respectful distance, and again I retired to rest. At break of day I was up, and soon having my tea ready, I ate a hearty breakfast, saddled Paddy, and was off. I entered a vast prairie just as the sun was rising.

The pioneer heralds of restoration carried the message into the rude dwellings of the hardy souls who were hewing home sites for their families out of dense forests. Many meetings were held in the open in groves of trees, some were conducted in homes of the settlers where eager listeners sat on benches clustered around the fireplace. Frequently a schoolhouse was used for the gathering. Here is the description of one such edifice as given by a chronicler of those early days:

After many consultations and many delightful seasons of worship in their cabins, they determined to build a school house which would also answer for the purpose of a house of worship. These sturdy young farmers, with some of their new neighbors, felled the forest trees and created a commodious log cabin, covered with boards weighted down with poles, daubed with mud, floored with puncheons, seated with benches made of split logs supported by pegs driven into the round parts of the logs. The window was made by the removal of a log from one side, a rude sash was inserted and oiled foolscap paper was substituted for glass. The chimney, which was wide and deep, was built of split logs and sticks, and daubed with mud or clay. The one door was made of boards and hinged and latched with a wooden contrivance which answered the purpose admirably.

The school house completed, no teacher was at hand, and they were compelled to await his coming. He came ere long in the person of an Irish pedagogue, fresh from the sod, whose name was Allan Bass, whose accomplishments were that he could 'read, write and cipher' as far as to 'the rule of three,' at which point any precocious boy that dared to reach it was 'turned back.' His only fault, so far as now remembered, was that he would get drunk on Friday evening, remaining so till Monday morning, and it was often suspected that he was not duly sober then.

So long as these primitive conditions obtained questions such as that of organized mission effort and the use of instrumental music did not trouble the disciples. They were too busy taking the Good News to all and sundry to take the time to stop and form an organization. At first the question of who should go did not enter into the picture as there was a deep feeling that every person who heard was under a divine obligation to share what he had learned. They took literally the admonition, "Let him that heareth say, come." There was an eagerness upon the part of the preachers to go into "the regions beyond." Every unevangelized area was looked upon as a direct challenge. They reacted to invitations of the believers to remain among them and labor as did the Master, "And the people sought him and came to him, and would have kept him from leaving them; but he said to them, 'I must preach the good news of the kingdom of God to other cities also, for I was sent for this purpose'" (Luke 4:42, 43).

The question of using an instrument in the corporate worship did not trouble them. There were no instruments in most communities. The various denominations did not use instrumental music in their worship and most of them were to undergo some difficulties when it was introduced. Peter Cartwright, the famed Methodist circuit rider, who was just three years older than Alexander Campbell wrote:

We had no Missionary Society; no Sunday School Society; no church papers; no Bible or Tract Society; no colleges, seminaries, academies, or universities; all the efforts to get up colleges under the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church in these United States and territories, were signal failures. We had no pewed churches, no choirs, no organs, in a word, we had no instrumental music in our churches anywhere.

Many of the original reformers came from Presbyterian ranks in which the use of instrumental music was then opposed. In 1888, John L. Girardeau, Professor in Columbia Theological Seminary, South Carolina, wrote in his book "Instrumental Music in the Public Worship of the Church" as follows:

The non-prelatic churches, Independent and Presbyterian, began their development on the American continent without instrumental music. They followed the English Puritans and the Scottish Church, which had adopted the principles of the Calvinistic Reformed Church. How the organ came to be gradually introduced into them it were bootless to inquire. They began right, but have more and more departed from the simple genius of Christian worship. On what grounds they have done this it would be well for them to stop and inquire. For if there be any force in argument their present condition cannot be maintained. It is a clear departure from the practice of the church, both early and reformed.

Another thing which militated against advocacy of instrumental music in worship by the restoration pioneers was the publicity given in their day to the division occurring in the Jewish synagogue over the question. These men were already familiar with the fact that the worship of the primitive ekklesia took its form from the synagogue rather than from the temple. Six years after Thomas Campbell first read the "Declaration and Address," on June 14, 1815, Rabbi Israel Jacobson in Berlin, Germany, introduced an organ into the synagogue worship for the first time. This created a furore in the Jewish community and feeling ran so high that a petition was made to the emperor, Frederic Wilhelm III, to close the synagogue, which he did. The breach widened between the reformed and the orthodox, and the former aided and abetted the growing schism by building their first temple at Hamburg, which they dedicated on October 18, 1818. In it they installed a fine organ but employed a non-Jewish organist.

These actions abroad threw American Jewry into a ferment and provided the chief source of conversation in the Jewish homes and of discussion in the synagogues. The more liberal element, seeking to divorce themselves from traditional practices and forms were outspoken, and since many of them were prominent in business circles their controversies were sometimes aired in the press. In 1840, Rabbi Gustav Posnanski of Temple Beth Elohim, in Charleston, South Carolina, asked for a vote of the congregation on whether or not to install an organ. The vote was 46 for doing so and 40 against. The protest vote was chiefly from the older members. When the organ was brought in the dissenters entered suit in court for redress of grievances. The decision was rendered in favor of the majority and an appeal was taken to the State Supreme Court. The decision of the lower court was upheld in an opinion handed down in 1846. In this opinion written by Justice Butler, the court held that it was powerless to make decisions as to the merits of religious controversy and must depend upon the will of the majority of the members. The minority group then withdrew from the others and organized another congregation.

This controversy is especially important to the objective historian for several reasons. First, one of the principal arguments used in the courts by the orthodox Jews against instrumental music in worship was that it was an innovation borrowed from the “Christian” church. This was an exact reversal of the plea made against adoption of instrumental music in Christian worship. Thomas Aquinas in his Summa Theologica wrote, “Our church does not use musical instruments, as harps and psalteries, to praise God withal, that she may not seem to Judaize.” There is really no conflicting element in what appears to be divergent views. The worship of the ekklesia was patterned after that of the synagogue in which the instrument was not used. Instrumental music was used in the temple service along with a priestly caste, burning of incense, sacerdotal garments, holy water, etc.

When the Roman church finally became an open admixture of paganism, Judaism and Christianity, many of the forms of ritualistic Judaism were adopted. Meanwhile the synagogues continued as they were until more modern members, affected by their contact with Christian elements undertook to alter the worship procedures. Thus, the Orthodox Jews were not in conflict with the early Christians in their statements, for when they affirmed that instrumental music was borrowed from the “Christian” church they had reference to Christianity after it had adopted Jewish liturgical practices.

Another important feature of the trial in South Carolina was that it confirmed with reference to introduction of instrumental music into religious worship, the precedent set in previous kindred matters, that the civil courts are powerless to rule as to the merits of religious controversy, and established the majority rule as the basis for judgment in local situations.

That we be not further tedious let us summarize some of our own conclusions regarding the storms of contention which came to batter the forces of restoration.

1. The divisions which occurred cannot be properly evaluated if considered as isolated from the age and conditions in which they arose. They were part of a pattern. In the nineteenth century almost every Protestant religious organization suffered from strife over the question of instrumental music. The Jewish synagogues, the Presbyterian church, and the disciple brotherhood are still divided over this question and related matters.

2. It is altogether possible that if the restoration brotherhood could have survived this particular period of tension it could have remained intact. Some of those things which were then introduced might never have been introduced at all, and those which were might have been dealt with upon a more rational basis rather than upon an emotional one.

3. The transformation from a frontier and pioneer status to a more settled and cultured society, augmented as it was by the growing industrial revolution, had a profound effect upon the religious life of the people. Any period of rapid change in the life and economy of a people is fraught with great problems. This is vividly portrayed before our very eyes in the struggle of backward nations to take their place in the sun of international recognition. The development of America in the last half of the nineteenth century was without parallel in the annals of history. We still suffer from some of the decisions made during the intensity of growing pains.

4. The effect of the Civil War with its strain on family relationships and its relegation of brotherhood to a position inferior to sectional prejudice affected our forebears more than most of us realize. The proud boast that the disciple brotherhood passed through the war over slavery without dividing is only partially true. It is probable that it would be more nearly correct to say that this brotherhood did not divide openly, or that it did not divide then. That the conflict between “the Blues and the Grays” affected the future course of our brothers in the Lord can be proven beyond question by the unbiased researchist.

5. In this series we are not interested in assessing guilt. We are not especially trying to determine the right or wrong of those things which have been credited with creating schism in one of the noblest projects ever to command the attention of sinful men. Our purpose is to try and understand why brethren who labored together and loved each other very dearly could become antagonistic and fractured into parties filled with spite and venom. We believe that this was the result of the rise of a factional spirit and it is our expectation to trace those causes leading to it and help to eliminate that spirit from our lives. We must either conquer it or perish!

6. Our whole course is directed toward healing breaches rather than causing them; of binding up wounds rather than inflicting them; of creating unity rather than schism. In our next issue we will proceed with the analysis of those factors which produced the shameful state in which we now find ourselves. We ask that you pray for us that we may be used by the Spirit as humble instruments to further the cause of “peace on earth among men of good will.”

In our coverage of the rise of factionalism as it was augmented in dealing with problems evolved from the creation of the missionary society and introduction of instrumental music, we shall no doubt say many things which will cut across the traditional thinking of all our readers. We are not writing from a controversial standpoint and you need not agree with us to be respected as brothers and sisters in the Lord Jesus Christ. We will be content if all of us are inspired merely to re-examine our hearts and convictions in the light of what is said. It is still true as Socrates said, that "The unexamined life is not worth living." If, after honest scrutiny of what we have written, you cannot find it within your heart to concur, we shall continue to love you fervently as brethren and leave the issues with God.

Adventures in Religion (3)

Mission Messenger (November 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

Jesus was a perplexing person to many who heard him while he was on earth. They were disturbed by the fact that he taught, as well as by the facts which he taught. In the first place he did not make teaching his profession so he was not a professional teacher. Indeed, many of the greatest truths he uttered were spoken almost casually, some of them as answers to questions from hecklers. He did not attend one of the schools for scribes or go to a college for rabbinical students. He made no appeal to formal degrees or educational attainments as a reason why he should be heard. He was not a theologian and he offered the people no course in systematic theology.

The scribes were always sure of themselves, but they were not always sure of their teaching. It was too frequently a subject of dispute with other scribes. The difference between Jesus and the scribes was easily seen by the people. "When Jesus had finished this discourse the people were astonished at his teaching; unlike their own teachers he taught with a note of authority" (Matt. 7:28, 29) Any person who dares to rise above the narrow concepts of his age and set forth great principles will gain both enemies and friends. Jesus was no exception as his attendance at the Feast of Tabernacles upon one occasion demonstrated. "The Jews were looking for him at the festival and asking, 'Where is he?', and there was much whispering about him in the crowds. 'He is a good man,' said some. 'No,' said others, 'he is leading the people astray.'”

It was this occasion which gave Jesus an opportunity to enforce some great truths. One of these is the inner testimony to the truth of God which is resident in every sincere individual who is unreservedly following Christ to the best of his ability. It is not essential that one be conversant with the logical processes which go into books on apologetics in order to have assurance of the divine origin of the message of our Lord. Another principle is that a man demonstrates his sincerity when he aims at the honor of the one who sent him, rather than seeking for self-praise. These affirmations were called forth because of the astonishment of the Jews. Here is the way the scriptures record it, “When the festival was already half over, Jesus went up to the temple and began to teach. The Jews were astonished. ‘How is it,’ they said, ‘that this untrained man has such learning?’ Jesus replied, ‘The teaching that I give is not my own, it is the teaching of him that sent me. Whoever has the will to do the will of God shall know whether my teaching comes from him or is merely my own. Anyone whose teaching is merely his own, aims at honour for himself. But if a man aims at the honour of him who sent him he is sincere, and there is nothing false in him’” (John 7:14-18).

It is our personal conviction that the teaching of Jesus would provoke about as much astonishment today as it did among the Jews, if it was correctly evaluated. Actually, most of us take what Jesus said and fit it into thought-patterns of our own. We have formulated our ideas of goodness and righteousness and into these moulds we pour the great teachings of the Master and conceive of the crystallized forms we produce as being those of heaven. Men tend to think of holiness in terms of places and times. They define goodness in relation to specific deeds. To them, it consists of particular performances in a particular manner. The one who does these things is considered to be a righteous man because he does them. All of this would be regarded by Jesus as superficial, perhaps even a hypocritical approach. We believe that the following principles are very important in the concept of righteousness which was enunciated by our Lord.

1. Jesus taught the ideal of a completely unified life, an existence wholly integrated and not separated into various departments. The entire personality is governed by a central force, and it is this abiding internal principle which makes one good. Goodness does not consist in the mere performance of deeds. It is an inner quality of being. There is no distinction between thoughts and deeds, or between motives and actions. Things are good because they are done by good men. It is the man, not merely the transaction, which makes the difference. “A good man produces good from the store of good within himself; and an evil man from evil within produces evil” (Matt. 12:35).

The nobility of this concept escaped the legalists in the days when Jesus was on earth. It still escapes those on earth since Jesus returned to heaven. Few of us dare even yet to believe that “A good tree cannot bear bad fruit, or a poor tree good fruit” (Matt. 7:18). An apple tree is not an apple tree because it has apples on it, but because it is that kind of tree it bears apples. If it is impossible for a good tree to produce bad fruit, then whatever is produced by such a tree must be good. However, men tend to exalt laws instead of the principles such laws were given to preserve. The keeping of such laws then becomes the chief good. Any deviation therefrom is regarded as evil.

There is a higher good than that of keeping laws. Laws are given to regulate relationships and those relationships are superior to the regulations. Jesus used as an example the case of David and his men when they were fleeing from Saul. Being hungry, they entered the sacred precincts of the House of God and ate the loaves of the Presence “which it was not lawful for them to eat.” When there is a conflict between perpetuation of life and performance of law, the first becomes the chief good.

Life is superior to law! Actually there is no conflict about this in the heart of the one who truly understands Jesus, for he spontaneously does what is right. He “produces good from the store of good within.” He does not have to stop and quibble about the matter. The decision has long ago been made. It is not the good deed that produces the store within, but it is the good store within that produces the good deed. It is not new deeds or new acts that Jesus wants, but new men! “You must be made new in mind and spirit, and put on the new nature of God’s creating, which shows itself in the just and devout life called for by truth” (Eph. 4:24).

2. Jesus taught that while all righteousness welled up from within, it had to flow out. He knew nothing about a religion kept bottled up by traditional restraints. So effervescent was true religion and goodness that it would burst the bottles (Luke 5:37). Religion was not a stagnant pool. It was a flowing spring. It was not a cistern but an artesian well. Jesus said to the Samaritan woman, “The water that I shall give him will be an inner spring always welling up for eternal life.” On the last day of the festival in Jerusalem he said of the believer, “Streams of living water shall flow out from within him” (John 7:38).

The true religion was to be known by its fruits. Jesus knew that a religion which did not reveal itself openly was empty and vacuous. He pronounced a sentence of condemnation on the fig tree when he came and found not fruit. He could not be content with mere leaves. There are no ornamental trees in God’s acreage. One either bears fruit or cumbars the ground. God demands the whole man and nothing less. Someone said “It does not take much of a man to make a Christian but it takes all of him there is.” Jesus only painted one word picture of the final judgment and in it he made no allusion to worthiness based upon knowledge of doctrine, theological perception or argumentative ability. The criterion for entering into and possessing the kingdom was simply the good done for others.

It is interesting to note that in this presentation Jesus goes to some length to show that those who gave food and drink, showed hospitality, sheltered the homeless and clothed the naked, did not know they were doing it for him. They were motivated purely by compassion and not by hope of reward. They were not so much demonstrating their religion as their character. Their good deeds were not partisan gimmicks to advertise “our church” or to influence people toward it. They were simply sharing what they had with suffering humanity and they were surprised to hear Jesus say, “Anything you did for one of my brothers here, however humble, you did for me.”

This may help to explain another statement of Jesus. “I tell you there is not a thoughtless word that comes from men’s lips but they will have to account for it on the day of judgment.” The King James Version has “idle word.” The Revised Standard Version renders it “careless word.” I confess that this used to bother me. That was before I considered it in the light of the context. At first it seems very extreme. It tends to portray God as a harsh and exacting taskmaster instead of a loving Father. But we must remember that a man does not reveal his true self when he is on guard and watching every word. It is when his guard is down and he is not trying to make an impression for social or other reasons that he shows what he really is. It is the careless or idle word, the chance act, which gives you a glimpse into the heart. You cannot judge a man so well by his formal as by his informal speech. Since judgment has to do with the man as he is, not as he wants others to think he is, this is the proper criterion — the word idly or carelessly spoken, the thoughtless expression.

3. Jesus taught that the inner quality called goodness was never static. It was ever changing and amending character for the better. The good man was never satisfied with his current state. He must be ever climbing and never standing still. Complacency has no place in the life of the concerned one. The man who stands and boasts of what he is and what he has done merits no notice from God. An outcast from society who bows his head, smites his breast, confesses his sins, and prays for forgiveness, goes to his house justified rather than the other. The apostle Paul makes a statement which portrays the creative nature of the goodness which keeps the eye fixed on Jesus. "And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:16).

"With unveiled face . . . are being changed." Think about these expressions. It is the man who "sees through a glass darkly" who does not change. His vision is distorted, his perspective is warped, his sight is clouded. There are veils over the faces of many— veils of prejudice, of tradition, and of partisanship. These allow only a blurred image of the Christ. One cannot properly discern his Lord through a film of legalism. Such a man may be like the disciples on the way to Emmaus. They were actually talking about Jesus and what had happened unto him. It was inconceivable to them that anyone who resided in the vicinity of Jerusalem should not know these things. "As they talked and discussed it with one another, Jesus himself came up and walked along with them; but something held their eyes from seeing who it was" (Luke 24:15). It is possible to know a lot of things about Jesus and still not know him! There are so many things which seem to hold our eyes!

The goodness of which Jesus spoke is not merely outgoing. It is also ongoing. It produces a flexibility of spirit, an elasticity of soul, which allows itself to be shaped and reshaped by increasing knowledge. It is not hardened by conformity to the past or the infirmity of the present. It is transformed and transforming, striving ever to an unattainable ideal, yet becoming more ideal for the striving. It regards law not as horizontal but as vertical. It is not a restraining fence but a ladder, and even as one climbs the rungs he looks between them to a new vista and a better world offering new challenges for tomorrow.

Rejecting and Returning

Mission Messenger (December 1961)

Volume 23

[Abstract]

The history of all great revolutionary religious movements indicates that they are given impetus because of the intolerable conditions existing when they are launched. Under the influence of leaders who have grown tired of the state of affairs, and motivated by a desire to reform the prevailing order, men risk their all in the crusade for better things. But as time goes on, contact with the world around erodes away the spirit of reform, brings about adoption of those means and methods which destroy the original purpose, and the movement slows down and finally stagnates into sectarian tendencies until other men arise who have the courage to inaugurate another reformatory movement. Every reformation is corrective in nature and is called into existence by the prevalent condition of the times.

We think it can be shown that each movement is not only part of a cycle but that each passes through the same phases and in almost the same sequence. If this can be proven it would enable the careful analyst to determine at what juncture of the movement he stood at any given time and also to predict the coming phase into which it would pass. It is not our intention at present to develop this theme but there is a point we would like to mention. A great many become discouraged when they realize that every reform has terminated in the formation of additional parties. To them it appears that we are merely “going in circles.” We are convinced, however, that while each reformation is cyclical it is also helical. It is on an ascending spiral. Thus, with each reformation we are lifted a little closer to the ideal. We do not “come out where we went in,” but we emerge on a higher plane. The essential attitude of each generation should be one of restoration because all succeeding generations stand on the shoulders of those which preceded it.

Christianity itself was the greatest revolution of all. It was introduced into the world at a time when hopelessness reigned with full sway over the hearts of men. Canon Farrar in his book “The Early Days of Christianity” says, “Gluttony, caprice, extravagance, ostentation, impurity, rioted in the heart of a society which knew no other means by which to break the monotony of its weariness, or alleviate the anguish of its despair.” At the risk of extending our remarks unduly I would like to share with our readers quotations from two men of note who lived during the time of the apostles.

Seneca, the Stoic philosopher, was born in Cordoba, Spain, probably in the same year that Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea. His brother was Gallio (Acts 18:12). Through the influence of Agrippina, wife of Claudius, Seneca was appointed tutor for her son, Nero. About the same time (perhaps in the same year) when Peter was announcing to Cornelius, the Roman army officer, that the gospel was the only remedy for sin and evil, Seneca wrote:

The world is filled with crimes and vices. Things are too far gone to be healed by any regimen. Men are battling for the palm of reprobate manners. Each day lust waxes and shame wanes. Trampling down all that is good and sacred, lust hies it whithersoever it will. Vice no longer shuns the light. So barefaced is wickedness become, and so wildly does it flare up in all bosoms, that innocence is not to say rare, but is nowhere found.

Our next witness is Pliny, known as “The Elder” to distinguish him from his nephew who is called “The Younger.”

He was born about the time that Jesus was nineteen years old, and became famous as a historian and naturalist. His great encyclopedia of nature, consisting of thirty-seven volumes, was dedicated to Titus, son of the emperor Vespasian, and the man who destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Pliny died of suffocation in the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79 when Herculaneum and Pompeii were destroyed. Pliny wrote thus:

All religion is the offspring of necessity, weakness and fear. What God is— if in truth he be any Being distinct from the world— it is beyond the compass of man's understanding to know. But it is a foolish delusion springing from human weakness and pride, to imagine that such an infinite Spirit would concern himself with the petty affairs of men. The vanity of man and his insatiable desire for existence, have led him also to dream of a life after death. A being full of contradictions, he is the most wretched of creatures, since no other has wants transcending the bounds of his nature. Man's nature is a lie, uniting the greatest poverty with the greatest pride. Among such great evils the greatest good that God has bestowed upon man is the power of taking his own life.

Into such an age of frustration and doubt the Christian concept brought faith, hope and love. Under the powerful motivation of these three, a tottering paganism went down and the whole world became conscious of a new humanity made possible through Jesus. The sad aftermath brought about by the ambitions and intrigues of men and resulting in the hierarchical domination of the clergy is too well known to our readers to detail it again. Suffice it to say that by the dawn of the sixteenth century Christianity had become so abused that the world was again wallowing in a slough of immorality and oppression. Of this period the eminent Irish historian W. E. H. Lecky remarks:

Wherever the eye was turned, it encountered the signs of disorganization, of corruption, and of decay. For the long night of medievalism was now drawing to a close, and the chaos that precedes resurrection was supreme.

The providence of God raised up men to meet the challenges of the age, and the Protestant Reformation shook Rome to her very roots. Already, John Wycliffe, a professor in Oxford University, had laid the foundation for reform. He has been described as “the unsparing assailant of abuses, the boldest and most indefatigable of controversialists, the first reformer who dared when deserted and alone, to question and deny the creed of Christendom around him, to break through the tradition of the past, and, with his last breath, to assert the freedom of religious thought against the dogmas of the papacy.”

Swiftly the seed of reformation was borne by the winds which swept across Europe to the hearts of honest men. Time would fail us to tell of the labors of Hus and Jerome (of Prague) in Bohemia; of Luther and Melancthon in Germany; of Zwingli and Oecolampadius in German Switzerland; of Calvin, Farel and Beza in French Switzerland. Unfortunately, Rome had left her mark, and all too frequently the reformers produced a union of church and state and sought to enforce their own creeds and interpretations by the secular arm. In spite of their affirmation of the principle of the right of private judgment, their words were not always backed up by their practice. Lecky writes, “The first Protestants were as undoubtedly intolerant as the Catholics.” So the stage was again set for another attempt at reform. J. B. Briney writes:

The testimony thus given shows that not only was Protestant Christendom divided into various and warring factions at the beginning of the 19th century, contrary to the prayer of Christ, and in contravention of apostolic teaching, but that theology had shrouded the gospel in mysticism, and that men, instead of looking to and relying upon the promises of the word of God, were groping in darkness in search of something foreign to the New Testament plan of salvation, and depending upon their feelings for evidence of the pardon of their sins and acceptance with God. The plain teaching of the gospel was shoved aside and ignored, and the speculations and philosophies of men were thrust upon the consciences of the people, and belief in, and allegiance to them demanded. Confusion reigned everywhere, and spiritual darkness was dense. Presently people began to tire of these conditions, and noticed that they were out of harmony with Bible teaching. The times were ripe for another forward movement, and men were ready to lead it. Whenever God providentially gets the people ready for a great work he providentially furnishes men to take it up and carry it on. This is made very plain by the facts of universal history. It is especially manifest from the facts of church history.

Nature of Restoration

It is a readily noticed phenomenon that when religious, social, or political affairs become deplorable a simultaneous reaction is aroused in widely scattered areas and among men of divergent backgrounds and talents. The restoration movement was no exception. In its inception it was not a single effort but eventually became a fusion of various forces struggling toward a common goal. Elias Smith and Abner Jones led a movement among the Baptists in New England; James O'Kelly and Rice Haggard among the Methodists in Virginia and North Carolina; Barton W. Stone among the Presbyterians in Kentucky; and Thomas Campbell among the Presbyterians in Pennsylvania and western Virginia. It now seems that the last mentioned may have had the clearest concept of the means by which, in his own words, "to adopt and recommend such measures as would give rest to our brethren throughout all the churches— as would restore unity, peace and purity to the whole church of God."

Alexander Campbell revealed the definite objectives of the work in which he labored. Without specific aims toward which to strive any religious movement must soon go adrift. The purpose must be one of sufficient value and worth to command all of the spiritual resources of those engaged in it, else it will flounder helplessly. Campbell wrote:

Next to our personal salvation, two objects constituted the summum bonum, the supreme good, worthy of the sacrifice of all temporalities. The first was the union, peace, purity and harmonious cooperation of Christians, guided by an understanding enlightened by the Holy Scriptures; the other the conversion of sinners to God. Our predilections and antipathies on all religious questions arose from, and were controlled by, those all-absorbing interests.

The first object was to be accomplished by a restoration of the primitive order as manifested by the apostles. In the “Declaration and Address” Thomas Campbell put it thus:

Our desire, therefore, for ourselves and our brethren would be, that rejecting human opinions and inventions of men as of any authority, or as having any place in the church of God, we might forever cease from further contentions about such things, returning to and holding fast by the original standard, taking the Divine word alone for our rule, the Holy Spirit for our teacher and guide to lead us into all truth, and Christ alone as exhibited in the word for our salvation; and that by so doing we may be at peace among ourselves, follow peace with all men, and holiness without which no man shall see the Lord.

Note well the two words “rejecting” and “returning.” These were the watchwords of the restoration pioneers. There were certain opinions and inventions which had been adopted and enforced dogmatically. These had created schism in the ranks of the believers. It was proposed to purge the church of God of all such opinions and inventions as having no place in it. But these could not have been accepted as “of some authority” unless there was first a lessening of respect for the proper authority which was considered to be “the Divine word alone.”

The first of these words (rejecting) is essential to reformation but the second (returning) is not necessarily so. Both are involved in restoration. Reformation may be achieved by changing into a new and improved form but restoration has to do with a return to a former state. Those who are restorers are always reformers, but reformers are not always restorers. One passage in Isaiah incidentally portrays restoration. “And I will restore your judges as at the first, and your counsellors as at the beginning (Isa. 1:26). Restoration simply means returning to conditions “as at the first” or “as at the beginning.” One cannot restore an order by “restoring” something that was not in its original state. Neither can he restore it by retaining those things which have been added since and by other authority. There must be both a rejecting” and a “returning” and Thomas Campbell recognized this fact. The unity of believers was to be secured by a restoration of things “as at the first.” By the simple expedient of going back beyond the introduction of all the divisive opinions and inventions peace was to be restored. In order to maintain that peace no opinion in the future would be introduced as a test of fellowship and a source of friction.

As at the First

It was generally conceded that pure Christianity as exhibited in organization, piety and devotion was quite simple. It had been made complex by men and had come to be a philosophy which must be interpreted and dispensed by a professional clerical caste. The proposal to divest the church of God of all the accretions which had accumulated through the centuries appealed to the rugged frontiersmen of the early nineteenth century. The dross was to be melted from the gold in the crucible of hearts fired by an intense passion for peace. The barnacles were to be scraped from the bottom of the Ship of Zion in the drydock of scriptural research and that vessel made ready for sea again.

One of the first considerations was to secure a blueprint of the primitive ekklesia in its functioning and service. Without this men would not be able to agree upon what must be rejected and what retained. They could not return to something unless they knew when they had reached it. Alexander Campbell realized this and on August 3, 1823, published what he described as “a cursory view of some of the leading features of the christian religion, exhibited in prospective, and in actual existence at the first institution.” Among other things he wrote:

Their churches were not fractured into missionary societies, bible societies, education societies; nor did they dream of organizing such in the world. The head of a believing household was not in those days a president or manager of a board of foreign missions; his wife, the president of some female education society; his eldest son, the recording secretary of some domestic bible society; his eldest daughter, the corresponding secretary of a mite Society; his servant maid, the vice-president of a rag society; and his little daughter, a tutoress of a Sunday school. They knew nothing of the hobbies of modern times. In their church capacity alone they moved. They neither transformed themselves into any other kind of association, nor did they fracture and sever themselves into divers societies. The[y] viewed the church of Jesus Christ as the scheme of Heaven to ameliorate the world; as members of it, they considered themselves bound to do all they could for the glory of God and the good of men. They dare not transfer to a missionary society, or bible society, or education society, a cent or a prayer, lest in doing so they should rob the church of its glory, and exalt the inventions of men above the wisdom of God.

In view of the above it is difficult to believe that twenty-six years later Alexander Campbell would become the first president of the American Christian Missionary Society, a position he was to hold for sixteen years. His name is the first to appear on the “Act of Incorporation” in which he and a number of other men “with their successors, be, and hereby are constituted and made a body corporate and politic, with perpetual succession, by the name of the American Christian Missionary Society, and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all courts of law and equity, and are hereby invested with all the powers and privileges necessary for conducting home and foreign missions, in advancement of the Christian religion.”

A review of the statements contained in his “leading features of the christian religion . . . at its first constitution” indicates the following as his ideas concerning such societies:

1. The primitive Christians did not dream of organizing missionary societies in the world.
2. They would have regarded the support of such a society by either prayer or finance as robbing the church of its glory.
3. They would have considered such support as “exalting the inventions of men above the wisdom of God.”

It is obvious that many who were led to espouse the restoration movement upon the basis of such a plea would become disturbed in mind by the apparent abandonment of it. But the steps leading to the organization of the society were so gradual that others little realized their significance. There were but few diversions from the unremitting toil of pioneer life. The people were widely scattered and it was difficult to satisfy the craving for human association and fellowship. One means of answering the need was found in the camp meeting. To it people came with their families from distant points. They sang and prayed together and heard the more talented and informed speakers of the day. In their anxiety for their neighbors to share in the messages they frequently selected a gifted man to travel as their evangelist, with the various congregations bearing his expenses. The evangelist made a report to the gathering the following year and subscriptions were raised to carry on his labors for another twelve months.

Out of this arrangement arose an insistent demand for greater organization to plan evangelistic work and assure its fulfillment. Some of the states began to hold annual meetings at which delegates of the various congregations made reports of membership, accessions to the faith, and other statistics. In 1842, Alexander Campbell wrote: "We can do comparatively but little in the great missionary field of the world, either at home or abroad, without co-operation." He concluded, "We can have no thorough co-operation without a more ample, extensive and thorough church organization."

David S. Burnet became seriously ill in 1845 and promised God that if his life were spared he would devote his energies to promoting an organization to take the gospel to the world. He used his Christian Age to urge co-operation in missionary activity. In May, 1849, Alexander Campbell wrote: "Reformation and annihilation are not with me now, as formerly, convertible and identical terms. We want occasional, if not stated, deliberative meetings on questions of expediency in adaptation to the ever changing fortune and character of society." On October 24-28, in that same year, a national conference was called and more than one hundred and eighty delegates convened in the meetinghouse at the corner of Eighth and Walnut Streets, in Cincinnati, Ohio. During these five days the constitution was drawn up for The American Christian Missionary Society.

When the report of this meeting appeared, Jacob Creath, Jr., who had opposed the convention, proposed that a general meeting be called in May or June of the following year to discuss the legitimacy of conventions and missionary societies. Some congregations of the saints registered a strong protest against the society. The elders of a Pennsylvania congregation wrote, "The church is the only missionary society and can admit no rivals." So great was the opposition and so meager the interest at first that the movement languished for several years. But the first convention had been held and the first society organized, and because of the varied concepts concerning such matters the seed of distrust and disunity had been sown. Later this seed would germinate and bear the fruit of division. The divergent views became more crystallized in the hearts of their adherents. Those who thought in terms of restoring the primitive pattern became ever more critical of the right of the society to exist, but David S. Burnet wrote, "I consider the inauguration of the Society system, which I vowed to urge upon my brethren if God raised me from my protracted illness of 1845 was one of the most important acts of my career."

It seems to us as we read the earlier writings of Alexander Campbell and compare them with his actions a quarter of a century later that he made a definite change in his objectives and position. This, however, he disclaimed and sought to defend the American Christian Missionary Society as merely the church at work. On what ground he concluded it was necessary to secure a charter for "the church" that it might be "hereby invested with all the powers and privileges necessary for conducting home and foreign missions, in advancement of the Christian religion" it is difficult for us to see. Had the church been doing this work without the power and privilege before 1849? But we feel that our readers may be interested in the statement by Campbell, which was written in reply to a letter from James Inglis, an outstanding preacher in the Baptist party, who resided in Detroit, Michigan. In 1850, the year following the creation of the missionary society, Mr. Inglis wrote:

But, amidst these anticipations, the movement excites apprehensions, too. The body of Disciples is now influential in point of numbers and resources. They have advanced, through severe conflict, to their present prosperity, and now is the time when a denominational spirit will be apt to spring up. The selfish cant of 'our denomination' may steal in under a mere change of phraseology. The critical period, in this respect, is in the outset of your associated efforts and organization. My apprehensions on this score are quickened by some features of the constitutions of the several societies formed by the convention at Cincinnati, and by some corresponding features in the proceedings of the convention itself.

To this scholarly and friendly epistle, Alexander Campbell replied in his characteristic form as follows:

In my first essay in the first volume of the Christian Baptist, I took the ground that the church, in her own capacity, was the only scriptural missionary institution known to the primitive church and to Christianity, as propounded by 'its Founder and His prime ministers,' and that no separate and distinct associations, composed of other persons than its members, could be regarded as of divine authority, or in harmony with the genius and spirit of the gospel and the church. To this view I am as much devoted today as I then was; and while consenting to a missionary society as a distinct object of contemplation, and as a means of diffusing the gospel, I now regard it as I then regarded it, as the church of any given district, in council assembled by her messengers, to devise ways and means for accomplishing this object with more concentrated power and efficiency.

General Observations

As we think back upon this occasion for the first real cleavage in the ranks of the restoration movement it may not be amiss to make a few statements with reference to the situation. These are not written to alter the views of the brethren or to condemn or justify any specific position but simply to record the reflections of the writer. Regardless of our personal attitude toward the missionary society we can all learn some things about the controversy resulting from it and can profit from what we learn.

1. Both those who introduced the society and those who opposed it acted upon honest motives. One group sincerely felt that it would innocently implement the spread of the kingdom of heaven on earth; the other just as sincerely held that it would constitute a surrender of the plea for restoration of the ancient order. Unfortunately, in religious matters, those who differ soon come to impugn the motives of those who hold divergent ideas and the controversy passes from the domain of the rational to that of the emotional. We have tried to settle too many of our differences with hot heads and cold hearts when they should always be discussed with cool heads and warm hearts.

2. Satan takes advantage of our disagreements and exploits them for his gain. He employs them to engender the party spirit which is a work of the flesh. One way of implementing the party spirit is to alienate brethren by false accusation and assignment of base designs. Those who opposed the missionary society were indicted as being opposed to mission work and proclamation of the gospel. Those who favored it were charged with entering into a premeditated conspiracy to willfully betray the cause of Christ. Both charges were false. Labels beget parties. They tend to force men to band together in self-defense. Since labels are affixed as brands by the opposition their very tendency is evil and divisive. Little is accomplished in behalf of peace by tagging some brethren as “Digressives” and others as “Old Fogies.”

3. It is the nature of organizations that they seldom legislate themselves out of existence. That which is introduced as an expedient today becomes a necessity tomorrow. That which was created to meet an emergency in one generation will create an emergency to perpetuate itself in the next generation. All human organizations are the offspring of human thinking. They are conceived in human minds and beloved by those who gave them birth. Frequently they come to mean more to those who support them than the divine organism created by God. This is evidenced by the fact that severe criticism of the church will not induce a reply but the least unfavorable reference to the organization brings instant retaliation.

4. In our study of the history of religious movements it is frequently impressed upon us that things are introduced upon one basis in one generation and defended upon wholly different grounds by succeeding generations. All of us are constantly faced with the temptation to search the scriptures to justify what we possess. This is directly opposed to the spirit of restoration. We should always recognize that a stream can accumulate sediment as it flows along its channel in contact with its banks. A religious movement will likewise collect accretions from its contact with the world. We ought to be willing to constantly reevaluate our practice and profession in the light of the revealed testimony of God.

5. Although in their inception it is the stalwart character of their membership which forms the basis of distinction for most religious movements, when those same movements grow older and become more sectarian in nature they tend to point instead with increasing pride to their organizations and institutions. Actually that which is recognized as a badge of progress may be a symbol of shame. Most organizations are born of fear. When the initial flame that kindled individual hearts burns low and the zest for service born of love recedes, there is an urge to organize in order to capture and preserve the waning powers and direct them in some effective measure. All too often the accomplishments are actually less than those of a handful of pioneers who had nothing behind them upon which to depend for sustenance and were forced to “look unto Jesus.”

When the disciples no longer care for orphans, organizations are created to fulfill this function. When they no longer train every enlistee to be a soldier, organizations are created to train a special “palace guard” to defend the faith. In time the idea never occurs to the average member to put on the whole armor. He does not think it pertains to him. When all lose interest in taking the good news to friend and neighbor, organizations are created to do this while those who contribute to the organizations sit in air-conditioned comfort to have the message “sounded in” to them which they should be sounding out to dying sinners. Perhaps one of the greatest errors in the history of Christendom was that of building houses in which to preach the gospel. This removed the warfare from the battlefield to the mess hall. It reversed the process of the Spirit which laid upon the shoulder of the believer the responsibility to go and take the message and placed upon the lost the responsibility to come and get it.

Instead of publishing colored brochures telling of the great accomplishments of our organizations we need to publish apologies for the necessity of having them. The moment we start thinking in terms of an organization sending out missionaries we betray our lack of knowledge of God’s program for His people. The church does not send out missionaries, it is composed of missionaries. We are all missionaries and it is precisely because we have lost our sense of mission and vocation that we seek to prepare a professional caste under professional supervision to enable us to hold up our heads among the sectarian groups which surround us. Our organizations are not so much banners of success as monuments to our failure. We did not recapture the spirit of primitive Christianity so we settled for something less—moral mediocrity. We created a cult of the unconcerned!

6. Organizations sustain the same relationship to the spiritual realm as machines do to the social and economic realm. Indeed organizations are a part of our machinery. They represent inventions created to enable us to go farther and do so with greater speed. They are facilitating devices. It is because of this that they are regarded as harmless expedients. Machines are neutral, they are neither good or bad. They can be used to accomplish good or evil. It is reasoned that we ought not to oppose their creation or existence but concentrate on regulation of their use. We become less certain of this all the time.

It has been generally accepted that the Machine Age when introduced marked a milestone in human progress, that it was a great step toward a higher order of civilization. It may yet be proven that this judgment was rendered too hastily and prematurely before all the data was in and the results could be properly evaluated. If by civilization we mean moral and spiritual growth of mankind it may be argued that the Machine has destroyed rather than augmented it. The Machine Age may have been born of a desire for the easy life, of a lust for luxury. Instead of marking a great conquest in the realm of the Spirit it may have been nurtured by a compromise with the flesh. Perhaps it pampered the belly instead of enriching the heart. In any event man invented the Machine as a servant but it has now enslaved him and become his master.

Once again we see the result of misplaced loyalties. Man is the creator, the machine is the created. Men now worship and serve the creature more than the creator. When two shining creations of metal feeding upon high octane fuel, hurtle through space at more than a mile per minute and crash into each other, there is often less remorse over the dead and dying than over the damage rendered to the beautiful machine. Men will freely give their sons at the call of the government and send them away to die with drums beating and flags waving, but if that same government sought to attach their automobiles there would be a rebellion. It is true that men made machines but it's equally true that machines have made a new type of man.

When "civilization" was in its infancy men were sickened if a fiend in human form slit the throats of a half dozen helpless children. Now a man may become a national hero if a machine lifts him above the clouds from which he may drop a bomb upon an unsuspecting populace, which will scatter the entrails of ten thousand people over the surrounding landscape, and sear, blind and maim thousands of others who will be doomed to a life worse than death. It is an irrevocable law that when men worship the creature more than the creator they are "given up to a base mind and to improper conduct” (Romans 1:28).

Of course we do not imply that the organizational machinery which men have created in the spiritual realm will be utilized in such a manner as that we have described. But there are certain likenesses which must not be treated lightly. (1) Machinery creates a sense of dependency and produces a deadening conformity which is destructive of the individual spirit. After a generation or two man becomes helpless without the organization. (2) The machinery comes to direct and dominate as men (or congregations) surrender their right of function to it. Men contribute their capital to the organization and the organization uses this money to gain control or supervision even of the activities of those who contribute. (3) The Machine always breeds machines, but what is a hundred times more dangerous, it artificially creates new needs which demand other forms of machinery. The church, like the government, can become the slave of bureaucracy. Already the religion of the Son of Man is so complexified that it requires trained professional personnel to operate the machines— Ministers of music, Youth Program Ministers, Ministers of Education.

We have been made the victims of our organizational processes. It is probable that the Cincinnati Convention of 1849 lit the fire in the forge from which the chains were welded that took away our freedom to restore the primitive order. We are a long distance from the simplicity of the original ekklesia of God. Perhaps Alexander Campbell doomed the movement to become one of contemporary conformity when he wrote that year: “We want . . . deliberative meetings on questions of expediency in adaptation to the ever changing fortune and character of society.” There is a grave difference between adaptation and reformation. The church is intended to transform the character of society and not be conformed to it. Let us never forget that we are not sectarian because we have these organizations, but we have these organizations because we have become sectarian!

7. The division which occurred did not settle the organizational question for either side. Those who favored the establishment of the missionary society have since suffered from several cleavages among themselves as to the place of the society, and have resorted to the courts to clarify ownership of the property claimed by one side or the other. Those who opposed the society have split into several factions over the charge that they created other institutions in the same category and bearing all the earmarks of the missionary society. They also have become involved in lawsuits and court actions among themselves.

Any person who studies earnestly the history of events related to the restoration movement must reach the conclusion that division is like war in that it constantly shifts the ground of our problems, but never solves them. We should realize that division in the ranks of God's army is not the road to purity of morals or of doctrine. Each division lays the groundwork for others to follow. It is a fact that division between brethren is nowhere sanctioned in the sacred scriptures as a remedy for our ills. It is the most widely practiced procedure but it is without any scriptural authority.

8. It is possible that the creation of the society in 1849 marked the termination of the original purpose of the restoration movement. We say this not because the society was formed. Its formation was merely a symptom of a much deeper and more subtle change of goals. The restoration movement was launched as "a project to unite the Christians in all the sects." The establishment of "our own organizations" and "our own societies" signalled the crystallization of the sectarian attitude and betokened the fact that a new party had been born with all of its exclusive partisan mechanisms to perpetuate its power and enlarge its gains. Mr. Inglis, the Detroit Baptist preacher, could see this, although Alexander Campbell could not.

My Personal Attitude

We must face up to situations and conditions as they exist. We cannot live in a dream world of idealism nor a Utopia of perfectionism. Our brethren are divided, rent and torn asunder. We will gain nothing by rash and unprincipled accusations or by impugning motives. Our task is not to create new schisms nor to widen old gaps. We can best serve the cause of the Prince of peace by pursuing peaceful methods. We should begin with a recognition of the scope of fellowship and brotherhood so that we will not look upon our discussions as wars between aliens but as problems among brethren.

I am personally resolved that I will follow the apostolic example of preaching the gospel of God's Son and planting nothing in any community except a congregation of disciples. When I leave an area I shall be concerned that there be but one thing there which was not there before I came— a church of the living God. I believe that all the Father wants done for the salvation of sinners and the sanctification of believers can be done by this unit of the divine organism. Anything that cannot be done through it and by it is something He does not want done. It is my conviction that through the indwelling Spirit of God the church is empowered to accomplish the purpose of God for this generation.

But how shall I regard those who sincerely believe they can scripturally implement the work of God through methods my conscience will not allow me to condone? Certainly I shall respect them as my brothers. Especially will I rejoice in every good work they perform and in every soul they lead to acknowledge that Jesus has come in the flesh. If one goes to the dark recesses of a tropical jungle and at great personal sacrifice proclaims Christ Jesus to half-savage natives and leads them to reformation of life, I shall not deny that the preacher or the natives are God's children and my brethren, merely because the former is supported by a missionary society. "Some indeed preach Christ from envy and rivalry, but others from good will. The former proclaim Christ out of partisanship, not sincerely . . . What then? Only that in every way whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is proclaimed, and in that I rejoice” (Phil. 1:15-18). This is not to imply that all who are sent forth under auspices of a missionary society preach from envy, rivalry, and partisanship. Certainly many thus preach who are opposed to missionary societies. I refer to the passage only to show the principle that one may rejoice at the results achieved although he cannot always endorse the methods and motives leading to such achievement. Any other course makes us more partisan than those we condemn.

I am a firm believer in the fact that God has not retired from contemporary history. He is not a God of the past but also of the present and of the future. He is active and working in our day. “He holds the whole world in His hand.” The tragedies and crises of yesterday can be woven into His pattern for our times in ways we cannot foresee or realize. Even the factions among us can be turned into practical use in the fulfillment of the divine purpose and made to serve as tests in the laboratory of faith (1 Cor. 11:19).

I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I hold the conviction that world events are so shaping themselves in our generation that the entire approach to missionary effort may have to be re-thought, revamped and revised. I have been analyzing trends within recent months which indicate that the missionary societies in all Christendom may some day be scrapped as outworn and ineffective. I shall not here discuss those trends nor detail the factors which lead to my conclusions but they are sufficient to warrant this statement that our readers may observe the rapidly advancing conditions. God may, through His providence, force us to settle some of our grave difficulties which we have considered unsolvable in the past. When this happens there may be a return to the primitive method in which “all those who were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word.”

It is obvious that the systems we have evolved have not provided for the effectual sharing of all our gifts and talents. Actually we have created and utilized methods which make it impossible for the average person to contribute anything but money. Celsus was the first infidel on record who attacked the Christians. He sneeringly remarked that “wool-workers, cobblers, fullers, the most illiterate and vulgar of mankind,” proclaimed what he designated an illiterate faith and knew how to “commend it to women and children.” That at which he scoffed was the strength of Christianity as opposed to the philosophy of the schools. In his book The First Three Christian Centuries, Islay Burns writes of the early saints:

Then they were intensely propagandist. While ever unseen they were ever at work. Every member was also a missionary of the sect, and lived mainly to propagate a doctrine for which they were ever ready to die. Thus the infection spread by a thousand unsuspected channels. Like a contagion propagated in the air, it could penetrate as it seemed, anywhere, everywhere. The meek and gentle slave that tends your children, or attends you at table, may be a Christian; the favorite daughter of your house, who has endeared herself to you by a tenderness and grace peculiarly her own, and which seems to you as strange as it is captivating, turns out to be a Christian; the captain of the guards, the legislator in the senate-house may be a Christian!

Conclusion

I am convinced that a majority of our present readership will study with interest what has here been written. Despite the fact that we have all been affected by our factional backgrounds and associations we have grown tired of trying to deal with our problems by traditional slogans and familiar cliches. Certainly there will be mixed emotions as you read. Many will be reluctant to acquiesce in the positions expressed. But all agree that our past thinking has constituted a “philosophy of separation.” It has produced strife and division unparalleled by any other religious group in this century. While it may be argued that we have contributed nothing to the betterment of our condition by this article all will agree something must be done.

We only ask that you read with fairness and objectivity. If you cannot agree with what we say you will still be loved and respected as a brother or sister in the Lord. You need not conform to our thinking on these matters for us to cherish and respect you. We will receive you as God, for the sake of Christ, has received us. It is not conformity to our thinking, but the new birth, that makes us children of God and thus a part of the brotherhood of the redeemed ones. As we continue to explore the history of the movement to which all of us are related and see the rise of factionalism, it is to be hoped that all of us can see our way clear to the dedication of ourselves to the crusade for “peace on earth among men of good will.”

I have this final word to say about the proclamation of the gospel. It is my personal opinion that the controversy over the missionary society arose because of a mistaken concept as to the nature and mission of the church of God. Both those who favored and those who opposed the society were wrong, as we see it. The sharing of the good news with a world of lost sinners was never entrusted as a task to any organization, human or divine. It is not true that the church was a missionary society. True the church was composed of missionaries, for the simple reason that our sharing of the glad tidings stems from our covenant relationship with Jesus and not our membership in the church. The church was not planted to preach the gospel. The gospel was preached to plant the church. The message was first and the community of saints resulted from it. It must ever be thus!

In our next issue we shall deal with the problem of instrumental music in its introduction among the congregations resulting from the restoration movement. It will be our humble intention to analyze the real factors contributing to our unfortunate division. We shall deal with the problem as it relates to fellowship and we shall suggest certain things that may lay the foundation for better days for the strife-torn brotherhood of disciples. Until next month we bid you farewell with our prayers ascending for all of you. We never write an article nor mail an issue of this paper without a fervent prayer that God may bless us all— writer and reader alike. Pray for us and if possible write us. Your own personal reactions are always read with interest and studied with benefit. May His grace attend you all!

MISSION MESSENGER ESSAYS (1962)

Volume 24

The Path of Peace

Index to Volumes

- Incendiary Instruments
- Adventures in Religion (4)
- The Unequal Yoke (1962)
- The Sand Creek Address
- Basis of Authority
- Brothers at Law
- Adventures in Religion (5)
- The Two Spirits
- Factional Flames
- Adventures in Religion (6)
- This Is Life Eternal
- Decline of Factionalism
- The Hands of Folly
- Adventures in Religion (7)
- Explaining My Position
- The Common Life (1962)
- How Far Is Too Far?
- Adventures in Religion (8)
- Getting Untangled
- Christ and the Church
- Adventures in Religion (9)
- The Basis of Faith
- The Ignorance of Wisdom

- The Basis of Authority
- Problems in Attitude
- Sectarianism
- The Real Jews
- Adventures in Religion (10)
- War in Heaven

Incendiary Instruments

Mission Messenger (January 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The disintegration of the restoration movement under the impact of the factional spirit is a story to “make angels weep and strong men bow themselves in grief.” The heart of the faithful historian recoils from the task of picturing the dissolution of the noble effort even while his sense of fairness and honesty demands that he pursue it to its end. It is a tragic tale of brother fighting against brother, a narrative of bitterness and hate, of strife and debate, of law suits and political maneuvers. The aftermath which we can still view betokens the intensity of the storm which passed over the heads of our parents and grandparents, laying waste the fond hope of uniting all the believers in Christ Jesus.

We are probing the ruins again, not to set fire to the wreckage, but in the hope that we may start anew to rebuild the city of peace. It is our intention to be both chronicler and commentator. We shall not only record events but try to determine what gave them significance. We shall attempt to interpret their relevance for our day. What we say will not be offered in dogmatic fashion. We will respect those who disagree as much as we do those who concur. While it is not our aim to assess guilt neither is it our intention to condone wrong. In this issue we shall be dealing with a topic which is charged with tension. Instrumental music in the public worship of the saints has become a symbol of intangibles. To one group it is a token of freedom, to another a badge of apostasy.

It is difficult to write on such a theme in objective fashion. The problem is enhanced when one is possessed with a deep personal conviction on the matter. Yet it is impossible to avoid dealing with this subject for its roots are intertwined with the division existing among heirs of the restoration. All we can do is to plead with our readers to defer judgment until all the evidence is in. Do not render your verdict upon partial testimony. If after reading all we write upon the subject you wholly disagree with what is said we shall allow our case to rest with you. As you read please bear in mind that our specific purpose in this series is not to determine the right or wrong involved in the use of instrumental music but simply to study the problems created by its introduction as relates to unity.

J. W. McGarvey wrote in Millennial Harbinger, November, 1864, that in the earlier years of the reformation there was "entire unanimity in the rejection of instrumental music from our public worship. It was declared unscriptural, unharmonious with the Christian institution and a source of corruption." He admitted that occasional attempts were made to introduce instrumental music but said it was "at first a sufficient objection to such attempts that a large portion of the congregation were offended and that the Scriptures forbid giving offence to brethren." It is obvious that if instrumental music ever entered the public worship of restoration congregations there would have to be a change of attitude toward the instrument or a change of attitude toward the brethren. It is our conviction that both occurred.

We are interested in the factors which produced these changes for several reasons. (1) When those factors are no longer present attitudes may again be changed. Circumstances do alter conditions. (2) The introduction of the instrument was symptomatic of a feeling which may no longer exist in the hearts of those who have grown up in an environment where its use is traditional. (3) To charge against those who now employ it the same attitude as those who introduced it and to argue from that premise may be decidedly uncharitable. We must not hold any person liable for a position or attitude which he personally disavows. (4) The introduction of the instrument was preceded by an erosion or decay of the sense of brotherhood. Our first task is to restore the recognition of brotherhood and within its frame of reference work toward a solution of our current difficulties. If we seek to solve our problems by continued attack upon symptoms we will only worsen our state. We must sit down as brothers dealing with an inherited difficulty and not as aliens obligated to perpetuate a relentless feud. (5) We should cease to regard others as separated from us and realize that we have become separated from each other.

The restoration movement gained its early impetus because it appealed to the plain, hardy pioneers by its simplicity and freedom from ostentation. There were no musical instruments in the rude cabins of these settlers, and such instruments were associated with effeminate tastes. The idea of having them in the sacred worship was obnoxious. In 1856, Peter Cartwright, the famous Methodist circuit rider, wrote in his autobiography as follows:

The Presbyterians, and other Calvinistic branches of the Protestant Church, used to contend for an educated ministry, for pews, for instrumental music, for a congregational or salaried minister. The Methodists universally opposed these ideas; and the illiterate Methodist preachers actually set the world on fire—the American world at least— while they were lighting their matches.

But the old preacher could see “the handwriting on the wall.” The Methodists were demanding an educated ministry and institutions were being created to supply the demand. He declared, “I do not wish to undervalue education, but really I have seen so many of these educated preachers who forcibly remind me of lettuce growing under the shade of a peach tree, or like a gosling that had got the straddles by walking in the dew, that I turn away sick and faint.” He was disturbed by the thought that popular clamor for a salaried minister and instrumental music to pamper pride would spell the end of a virile movement. We ask your indulgence for one more quotation.

I awfully fear for our beloved Methodism. Multiply colleges, universities, seminaries and academies; multiply our agencies and editorships, and fill them all with our best and most efficient preachers, and you localize the ministry and secularize them too; then farewell to itinerancy, and when this fails we plunge right into congregationalism, and stop precisely where all other denominations started.

The restoration was passing through the same throes as it was transformed from a rustic to an urban movement. As the original purpose of “uniting the Christians in all sects” receded, and a desire to “hold our own among the sects” became the chief objective, alterations began to be urged regardless of the feelings of the brethren. Three years after Peter Cartwright wrote the above, the first instrument of music was introduced into the worship of a restoration congregation. We think it will be interesting for our readers to know something about the personalities involved in this radical change, and of the results accruing from it.

In 1859, Dr. L. L. Pinkerton brought a melodeon into the meetinghouse at Midway, Kentucky. There were vigorous protests which went unheeded. Dr. Pinkerton was always a controversial figure. One historian writes, “Throughout the eighteen-fifties and -sixties he was a thorn in the flesh not only of the strict constructionists, but of most of those who considered themselves progressive; but such was his evangelical ardor, the fervor of his piety, and the unselfishness of his service, that even his severest critics found it difficult not to love him.” For all of these traits, it appears that Pinkerton was somewhat inflexible in his views and bent on having his way regardless of consequences. When he died on his sixty-third birthday, President James Garfield wrote of him, "He was a man of most positive and intense nature; his opinions were convictions."

L. L. Pinkerton was born at Baltimore, Maryland, January 28, 1812, but was reared in Pennsylvania and Virginia, near Bethany. His Presbyterian father taught him the tenets of Calvinism, but he was unable to "get religion" at the mourner's bench. In September, 1830, he heard one sermon by Alexander Campbell and immediately requested the privilege of being immersed. After studying medicine he established a lucrative practice in a suburban district of Cincinnati where Walter Scott was laboring. It was because of the insistence of Scott and David S. Burnet that he discontinued his medical profession and began preaching in May, 1838. It was in 1844 that he moved from Lexington to Midway, Kentucky.

While at Lexington Dr. Pinkerton had guided the congregation in erecting a new meetinghouse on Main Street. Several of the well-to-do families wanted to reserve pews, which they marked with their personal name plates and fitted out with cushions. This action so incensed some of the others that they entered the new structure one night, pried off the name plates and ripped the upholstery to pieces. Dr. Pinkerton publicly assailed those who had been guilty of this vandalism and feeling ran so high he had to resign.

After the Civil War, in which he served as a surgeon in the Union Army, Pinkerton returned to Lexington in 1865 as a teacher in Kentucky University. The Main Street congregation ignored him in spite of the fact that he had led them in the construction of their building and once served as their minister. The opposition to him was so great that he resigned from the college faculty after one year. Three years later the congregation attempted to bring him to trial on the charge that he was guilty of “conduct of a schismatic character, and calculated to create and keep up strife in the body of Christ.”

In January, 1869, Dr. Pinkerton and John Shackelford began a periodical called the Independent Monthly. In an article titled “Bible Inspiration” Pinkerton denied the plenary inspiration and infallibility of the scriptures. He attacked “Reason and Revelation” by Robert Milligan and branded it as fallacious. He affirmed that there would be a second chance after death for those who died without knowledge of the plan of God. He advocated a Presbyterian form of government for the churches, stating that it was a matter of liberty to select that method which was most efficient. It is probable that he was the first exponent of “open membership.” He produced an article designated “No Immersion— No Membership in a Church of the Reformation.” In it he declared that he would allow each man to settle the question of baptism for himself. Dr. Pinkerton declared that he would personally teach and practice immersion but would not deny admission to the congregation to one who did not concur. His position was that he “would not thrust his translation of a Greek word between a man’s conscience and his God.”

We mention these things because they may help to give an insight into the nature and temperament of the man who boasted in 1860 that he was the only preacher in Kentucky who approved of the use of the organ and his church at Midway was the only one in the state that had an organ. It is barely possible that general division might have been averted had it not happened that on April 12 of the following year the Confederate forces began their bombardment of Fort Sumpter and the War between the States became a reality.

It has been the proud boast of those allied with the restoration movement that they did not split over the issue of slavery and war as did most of the other religious bodies in America. This is true as regards formal or overt separation but the civil strife left its imprint. The very nature of the conflict cheapened brotherhood, aroused suspicion and magnified differences. We freely admit that there was a rapidly developing difference in philosophy among those who constituted the forces of restoration yet it might have been possible to have averted a serious disruption had it not been that the tempers of men were inflamed. In Lard's Quarterly, April, 1865. the editor wrote:

No position has been more distinctly enounced, or more firmly held among us, than this: that matters of opinion shall never be made tests of fellowship. The pertinacity with which we have clung to this principle, so obvious and so just, and defended it both for ourselves and for others, is no secret. It has been our pride and our boast. Is it so now? Alas, for the mutability of man! The last four years have seen it changed not in the sacred matters of religion but changed in the paltry affairs of politics. Many so-called brethren in our ranks now actually refuse to meet with and fellowship their brethren of the adverse political faith. Not only so, but they have gone so far as to advise and counsel their arrest, imprisonment, and banishment, for no crime against any law of heaven or earth, but merely because of a difference in political opinions. Even preachers have not blushed to be foremost in the work.

At the very time when passions were kindled by the war, instruments were introduced in some of the congregations. The regard which had formerly been shown for the personal feelings of the brethren who objected was no longer accorded. The congregations were being rent asunder by the violence of the discussions pro and con. Those who opposed the instruments but who saw the tragic results which would accrue from severance of fellowship were outspoken in their condemnation of the organ but just as plain in their statements relative to maintenance of brotherly relationship. They regarded the use of the instrument as a surrender of the very basis of the former plea.

Dr. H. Christopher, writing in Lard's Quarterly, for October, 1867, expressed it in this fashion:

Standing on the ground and proceeding on the principle so frequently proclaimed before the world, that in all matters of religious faith and practice, the faith and practice of the apostolic church are our only guides and authorities, the introduction of instrumental music into our congregations is simply a logical and moral impossibility. It can not be done without abandoning our ground and giving up our fundamental principle. We are compelled to discard this innovation on primitive practice, or give up all pretension and purpose of prosecuting any further the grand design of our reformatory movement. And if we have been right up to this time, to abandon the ground and principle would be nothing less than apostasy. To this dilemma are we driven by the most remorseless logic and by the highest considerations for honesty and consistency.

Prof. J. W McGarvey, in Apostolic Times, 1881, wrote after the same tenor:

It is manifest that we cannot adopt the practice without abandoning the obvious and only ground on which a restoration of Primitive Christianity can be accomplished, or on which the plea for it can be maintained. Such is my profound conviction, and consequently the question with me is not one concerning the choice or rejection of a necessary expedient, but the maintenance or abandonment of a fundamental and necessary principle.

F. G. Allen, who became influential as editor of Old Paths Guide which he started, wrote thus:

I regard the use of the organ in the worship a violation of one of the fundamental principles of our plea for restoration and unity. We have ever claimed that our plea is catholic— that is, we hold as common ground that, and that only, which is conceded by all to be right. In restoring just what we find in the beginning in faith and practice, and refusing all else, we stand on undisputed ground . . . The world has seen and felt the advantage and self-evident correctness of this catholic position; but the introduction of the organ, since all cannot worship with it, is a violation of this grand principle. All can worship without it; all cannot worship with it. Therefore we can be united and harmonious without it; we cannot be harmonious and united with it. To introduce the organ to the destruction of our peace and unity is a complete renunciation, therefore, of this principle of catholicity characterizing our plea for the union of God's people on God's word.

Benjamin Franklin, whose leadership and plain manners endeared him to many, and who was distinguished from the illustrious statesman of the same name, by the designation, "the gospel preacher," declared:

If any one had told us forty years ago, that we would live to see the day when those professing to be Christians; who claim the Holy Scriptures as their only rule of faith and practice; those under the command and who profess to appreciate the meaning of the command, to 'observe all things whatever I have commanded you,' would bring any instrument of music into a worshiping assembly, and use it there in worship, we should have repelled the idea as an idle dream. But this only shows how little we knew of what men would do; or how little we saw of the power of the adversary to subvert the purest principles, to deceive the hearts of the simple, to undermine the very foundation of all piety, and turn the very worship of God itself into an attraction for the people of the world, an entertainment or amusement.

It is evident, however, that these men were able to distinguish between an attitude toward "innovations" and "fellowship." F. G. Allen said that it was not a question of fellowship. Both J. W. McGarvey and Benjamin Franklin were unwilling to regard use of the instrument as a test of fellowship. In his book, "Brother McGarvey," W. C. Morro writes:

When he found that it was necessary to speak he was largely content to state his position and not to press it to the point where it would become a barrier or a cause of division between him and his brethren. This much is a certainty: McGarvey never allowed his position on the organ question to become a cause of division within the church. His soul recoiled from such a step. Yet, he stood so firmly by his original position that he was willing and actually did bring upon himself discomfort, alienation from friends, and practical isolation, yet he was not willing to impose this upon others.

Winfred E. Garrison in his book "Religion Follows the Frontier," writes about the situation in these words:

But it should be said that much Christian forbearance was practiced on both sides. Franklin (anti-organ) advised the anti-organists to meet separately for worship if an organ was put in over their protest, but not to organize a new church, or create a split. And Errett (pro-organ) advised discarding the use of the organ where there was opposition by a considerable minority.

Not all the writers were as amiable in their treatment of the question or of those who contended for the instrument. Moses E. Lard, a staunch defender of the missionary society was just as strong in his opposition to instrumental music. This was regarded as the "middle of the road" position in that day. His advice to those troubled about the problem was given in Lard's Quarterly, March, 1864:

Let now, as further evidence of this, any set of brethren, no matter how pious and true, set about inducing a church which has introduced an organ, to put it away, and these brethren will soon fall under its proscriptions and it will absolutely go the length of putting them away before it will put away its organ. It will part from everything and anything rather than its infamous box.

But what shall be done with such churches? Of course nothing. If they see fit to mortify the feelings of their brethren, to forsake the example of the primitive churches, to condemn the authority of Christ by resorting to will worship, to excite dissension, and give rise to general scandal, they must do it. As a body we can do nothing. Still we have three partial remedies left us to which we should at once resort 1. Let every preacher in our ranks resolve at once that he will never, under any circumstances or on any account, enter a meeting house belonging to our brethren in which an organ stands. We beg and entreat our preaching brethren to adopt this as an unalterable rule of conduct. This and like evils must be checked, and the very speediest way to effect it is the one here suggested. 2. Let no brother who takes a letter from one church ever unite with another using an organ. Rather let him live out of the church than go into such a den. 3. Let those brethren who oppose the introduction of an organ first remonstrate in gentle, kind, but decided terms. If their remonstrance is unheeded, and the organ is brought in, then let them at once, and without even the formality of asking for a letter, abandon the church so acting; and let all such members unite elsewhere. Thus these organ-grinding churches will in the lapse of time be broken down, or wholly apostatize, and the sooner they are in fragments the better for the cause of Christ. I have no sympathy with them, no fellowship for them, and so help me God never intend knowingly to put my foot into one of them.

A year later, in the Quarterly, dated April, 1865, Lard referred to his previous statement, and added:

Editors and preachers may write and preach against organs till the last trump shall sound, but while they countenance the churches in which they stand, visit them, and suffer the machines to be cracked over their heads, they are but whistling idly in the air. There is but one way to cure the spirit in question— crush it. When a church learns that no preacher will set foot within its doors while it holds an organ; when it sees that its members are abandoning it; that it is fast coming to naught; and that unless it gives up its unholy innovation it is destined to ruin— then will it kick out its organ, and not before.

As more homes began to install organs in the parlor and these instruments ceased to be a luxury, the pressure to have them in the meetinghouses increased. The controversy waxed fierce in every section of the land. It was the chief subject discussed in the papers from 1864 to 1875. The spiritual life of many waned as character became no longer the criterion of the Christian walk and loyalty to Christ was judged primarily by an attitude toward the organ. Partisan spirit was aroused to such an intensity that W. K. Pendleton exhorted, “We notice a growing heat under the discussion of this subject— but let us keep cool.” This warning went unheeded. Men boasted of the congregations into which they had thrust organs, or of those in which they had thwarted its introduction, as so many scalps dangling from the party belt.

Challenges for debate began to be issued by the opposing groups within local congregations. Each camp secured a champion who had built up a reputation as a party “hatchet man” for his side. The debaters were not always noted for their intellectual ability. A common boast was that they “would skin an opponent and tack his hide on the barn door with the bloody side out.” They resorted to ridicule, invective, sarcasm and derision. The public gladiatorial combats, held in full view of the delighted sectarians whom the movement started out to unite, were not investigations carried on between brethren. They were fights to the death between tribal warriors, the “Digressives” and the “Antis.”

Only at first did calm sense prevail and then not for long.

When the congregation at Seventeenth and Olive Streets, in Saint Louis, Missouri, had an organ forced into the worship by a small group of agitators, many of the brothers and sisters with tears streaming down their cheeks, stumbled from the auditorium, their hearts both incensed and broken. There still lingered in their minds the greatness of the cause which they had espoused so they agreed to submit the case for arbitration. Among those who heard the respective sides were Robert Graham and Isaac Errett. These brethren decided that one soul was worth more than an organ and that a brother for whom Christ died should not be destroyed by preference for any expedient. They recommended that the organ be silenced. This was done and the dissenting members were restored.

But the united effort did not long continue even in Saint Louis. Those who desired to use the organ felt they were being inhibited in their freedom and the next rift was caused by their withdrawing and securing another place to meet. This produced one of those queer ironical twists so often noticeable under such circumstances. The hall which they rented did not have an organ, the meetinghouse they abandoned had one. For months there were two groups worshipping not far apart. One group had an organ which they would not use, the other group would have used an organ but had none.

In many urban communities especially there were those who felt it was necessary to make the congregation "cultured" regardless of the manner by which it was accomplished. In the heated exchanges the instrument became a status symbol. Those who regarded themselves as in a higher social bracket and who were progressive in thought and action resented the idea of "holding back the church" in the community to please "a bunch of old fogies." They saw no reason for catering to the whims of an uneducated segment who would make the congregation always subject to the regulation of yokels. In turn, those who opposed the instrument often regarded themselves as the loyal defenders of the bastion against a sinister group of conspirators whom Satan had infiltrated to destroy the last hope of Christianity from the earth.

Regardless of the spiritual and scriptural implications of the music question (and we are convinced there are many such worthy implications) we dare not overlook the circumstances and conditions which contributed to the division over the issue. We must never lose sight of the fact that instrumental music in the social worship of the saints is one thing, while division into two rival parties over the subject is a wholly different thing. It is our contention that while such subjects as the use of an instrument may be debatable, the subject of division among brethren is not debatable. If opposition to the instrument is based upon the silence of the apostolic doctrine, opposition to division among the members of the family of God must be based upon the positive declarations of scripture.

In any final analysis, such questions as instrumental music aggravate the problem of maintaining brotherly and family relationships, but overt division is caused by an attitude toward brethren, not by an attitude toward instrumental music or other such innovations. It is because of this fact that I contend that social, political and economical factors, prevalent at a given time, may have much to do with our spiritual reaction to troublesome and vexing problems. Certainly the transformation in our national life wrought by the industrial revolution, or the effect of the Civil War on our social fabric, have nothing to do with whether instrumental music in Christian worship is sanctioned by the Lord Jesus Christ, but they may have a lot to do with the atmosphere in which such problems are discussed and in the manner in which the discussions terminate.

It is possible, and I think quite probable, that this great test of the restoration movement had to end in division because of the very condition prevailing at the time of its introduction. To maintain that state of division and to make the same accusations and counter-accusations as were made in its inception, when conditions have altered, reveals that we are naive and childish. This in no sense implies that a thing becomes right in one generation which was wrong in another. It does not argue that instrumental music in the corporate worship is sanctified by the passage of time. Our contention is that it was an attitude toward brotherhood which resulted in the formation of distinct parties around the pro and con of this issue, and it is time for us to recapture the sense of brotherhood. We may never settle such questions as those which have split and fragmented us but we will settle our eternal destiny in a manner we do not crave if we do not love our brethren— all of them!

In past generations those who lived in the remote hill country of our Missouri Ozarks were often superstitious and illiterate. In spite of this they possessed a high degree of integrity and family honor. When insulted they knew but one way to purge the blot from their name and that was by ambushing and killing the guilty person. Often this provoked a feud which was carried on from generation to generation, with members of each clan swearing over their latest victim to “wipe the others out.” I have personally immersed into Christ some of the descendants of these feuding families. They have gone to the same schools and sat in the same classes. They are now members of the same congregations of the saints. They have outgrown the cruder methods of their fathers. Shall we learn in every department of life except the spiritual? Will we perpetuate the same bitter feuds which made havoc of the restoration plea in past years? Will we transmit to our children the same heritage of bitterness and sectarian animosity which we have received from our fathers.

It occurs to me that if we can grasp the significant difference between a thing and the division which occurred among brethren when they discussed it, we will be able without compromise of any personal conviction to restore a concept of brotherhood as a proper framework for future investigation and examination. And it will help us to realize that the disintegration of brotherhood was encouraged by external forces of which the participants were wholly unaware at the time. Those factors have been altered or amended in some cases and in most cases have passed away. It is time for a re-study of brotherhood and fellowship in the light of more advanced knowledge and free from the unfortunate interference of outside elements which had such an adverse influence a century ago— free also from the personalities which then affected the struggle!

The instrument has lost its importance as a status symbol either in home or congregation. The industrial revolution which has acted to raise the living standard to such a high plane has made it possible for almost any home to possess radio and television. Aerials are seen above the poorest cabins and rudest shacks. Music appreciation is taught in schools. Congregations which oppose instrumental music have, in some instances, developed the art of singing until it is conceded by all that an instrument would be a hindrance instead of an aid. Those who do not employ instrumental music are no longer regarded as “old fogies.” It not infrequently happens that their place in the industrial, economic and educational world earns for them in some communities a respect not enjoyed by many who contend for the instrument. The implications of the instrument as a social gauge have been completely altered.

The division now existing is an inherited one. We do not know of a single congregation that has been disturbed for several decades by the attempt to put in an instrument. We know of several that have suffered some unpleasantness when certain ones have sought to remove an instrument. Many of the brethren who see no harm in the use of an instrument and who do not consider it a sin would never recommend adoption of an instrument in a congregation that did not have one. Others in this category would gladly surrender the instrument in their locality if the decision were theirs to make, and if this one act would secure peace and harmony and reunite the divergent elements in love.

Under existing conditions it seems rather absurd to regard all who worship where an instrument is used as “dividers of churches,” and to quote Romans 16:17 as universally applicable to them is both unfair and untrue. There is a difference between one who “causes division” and one who grows up in a state in which he may be wholly oblivious that division exists. It is also possible that the attitude of those who oppose the instrument has done as much to perpetuate the controversy as has a love for the instrument. The unbrotherly treatment that has been accorded has cemented the factional spirit in many communities.

The simple truth is that in the inception of the problem the partisan spirit was not the exclusive possession of either side. This was demonstrated by the eagerness of both groups to rush into the courts of the land to guarantee their property rights often at the expense of their spiritual influence for generations to come. The ruin wrought by lawyers who knew nothing of the goals of the restoration movement and whose relation to the problem under dispute was on a mere mercenary plane can never be fully assessed until eternity reveals its effect in the lost souls driven away in discouragement or disgust.

Any sensible approach to the situation as it now exists must be made on a basis other than that of partisan debate by selected champions before the religious world. It is just possible that such an approach was never Christ-like in its nature, and was one of the means used by the Arch-foe to assure that the family of God would become so divided as to feel it was useless to ever strive for unity again. If we are to defeat his sinister designs we must reject his weapons which belong to “the works of the flesh.” We must recognize that in every factional movement the partisan debate is one phase through which it passes until men can arise who look at the situation as a whole and who recognize that those methods which engender or encourage passion and emotion provide no rational solution of the difficulty. But we should reject such ineffective and outgrown weapons as we would the “law of fang and claw.”

This does not mean that the question of the use of instrumental music is settled, or that it no longer needs to be studied and discussed. Men cannot be asked to set aside their convictions or to “just go along” with each other as if nothing had ever happened. Such a course would be merely following the path of least resistance and this always makes for crooked men. We must face up to the fact that in some places the question will never be settled in such a manner as to provide any working agreement. This should not deter us from working on the problem and lessening areas of tension where we can. It is possible that in the physical realm we shall never discover a cure for cancer which will be universally successful, but we must dedicate our energies toward trying to do so and never allow discouragements and setbacks to offset our zeal.

Our proposal is very simple. It is based upon the general recognition that before the division occurred we were united, all of us part of the same fellowship. The introduction of the instrument and other things placed a strain upon the ties of brotherhood. Under the existing conditions then prevalent our fathers sought to solve the problem by division and by a declaration that a state of brotherhood no longer existed. We need not question their sincerity nor impugn their motives. Instead we should credit them with the noblest intention, that of preserving the purity of the church and the original purpose of the restoration movement. But in the light of additional knowledge we can see that they misunderstood the implications of “fellowship” as the Holy Spirit used the term. Perhaps it would be safer to say that in the heat of the controversy they forgot those implications, at least temporarily. We must now decide whether we shall continue to perpetuate their mistaken concept.

If we decide to do so in order to preserve our partisan status, we shall doom our posterity to such recurrent divisions as will eventually divide the restoration movement out of existence. The philosophy adopted by our fathers was a factional one. It can never produce unity. It can only perpetuate existing divisions and breed new ones. If we decide to renounce this unscriptural concept of fellowship or brotherhood we can then begin to examine our points of difference from a new perspective, as brethren seeking for a common solution, not as enemies or aliens seeking to capture each other. We can recognize our differences as legitimate subjects for exploration but not occasions for division.

It is at this juncture we must personally face up to some grave problems as did our fathers in their day. One of those problems is occasioned by fear—the fear that we may lose all we have gained so far. Thus, there are some who would take a limited view of our situation and who ask why we cannot restrict our efforts to restoring a proper sense of fellowship to those only who do not use the instrument. They are willing to recognize as bothers those who are divided over cups, classes, colleges, etc., and seek to alleviate the conditions existing among these, but they recoil from a recognition of those who employ the instrument in worship. They regard them as sectarian, whereas the groups who do not use instrumental music are looked upon as factions or parties within the church.

This attitude will never meet the needs of our day. In the first place it is unscriptural. It makes a distinction between sectism and factionalism, but these are applicable to the same thing so far as God's word is concerned. Moreover, it does not get to the real core of the problem. It is artificial and superficial. Our divisions have not been caused by things but by an attitude toward others of God's children, our brothers. It is not enough to merely nibble around at the troublesome issues which have arisen to plague us since we adopted the factional approach. We must go back to the time when we were misled into accepting that approach and reject it, and start to deal with our problems on a wholly different basis—one that will lead toward unity which God commands instead of toward division which he condemns.

This is a real adventure of faith! For those of us who have always lived sheltered, protected lives behind the barriers we have erected since our fathers chose the factional method in an attempt to protect what they had gained, it seems too risky and daring to associate with those of other factions and groups with a view to allowing the leaven of the Spirit to work in direct contact with the whole lump. But there are some considerations we should always bear in mind. First, it is false to assume that truth must always be overcome by error when they are brought into contact. Indeed it should be the other way around. Moreover, God is working in this age. The Holy Spirit is mightily at work in the hearts of many who are heirs of the restoration movement prompting toward unity and oneness. We do not risk anything when we submit and surrender ourselves completely to the guidance and care of the Spirit. We are never safer than at such a time.

Actually we are lost anyhow if we continue to evaluate our own little parties as the church of God and are thus led to disregard as our brethren those who have been reared in other factions. Nothing is a greater insult to the Father than the refusal to recognize His other children as our brothers. Instead of protecting what we have gained by maintaining a factional attitude, we actually insure our own condemnation. In the only portrayal which he gave of the final judgment scene, Jesus conditions our entrance into eternal rest upon our attitude toward and treatment of our brothers. This is the area to which we need to give the greatest attention for, if we believe Jesus, it is the one which will determine our right to be welcomed into the kingdom prepared for the faithful.

We can see no real gain to be derived from merely agreeing to recognize those who see “most things as we do,” while we nourish the seed of partisanship in our hearts. It is not that we need to turn over a new leaf; we need to turn up with a new life! As we become convicted of the wrong inherent in our divided state we will be tempted to do the same things our fathers did three-quarters of a century ago. They chose the factional method of trying to preserve their spiritual gains; we may choose to gain spiritually by preserving the factional method. They doomed the restoration movement to failure by their choice; we will doom our souls eternally, for we could profit by their mistakes.

No faction among us today is “the loyal church.” Not one is the church of God to the exclusion of all others. All of them are parties. They exist as monuments to our failure to keep the peace.

Their partisan gains and growth do not necessarily enrich the kingdom of heaven. Their multiplication is a disgrace to us and not a blessing to humanity. It is time for all of us to rise above the narrow partisan approach and to restore the spirit of the restoration movement. As I see it, this involves going back to the place where we began to divide, and not starting in at some subsequent point where we sub-divided. It means a recapture of the true sense of brotherhood in Christ Jesus based on the new birth. It does not mean endorsement of those things which were brought in to test and try our fathers. It does not mean the adoption of a single thing that you regard as an innovation or which you cannot conscientiously condone.

It does not involve a change of procedure where you worship. It does involve a change of heart toward those baptized believers who do not proceed as you do. It does not require surrender of any truth you hold, or of anything you hold to be a truth. It only involves renunciation of the greatest error Satan ever palmed off upon us— the fallacy that we can untie ourselves into unity, split ourselves into harmony and divide ourselves into oneness. I do not deny a single thing which our fathers in the faith discovered to be the truth, but I want it to be known to one and all that I renounce the factional approach which they adopted. In spite of their sincerity it was no part of the truth, it is not now and never will be!

I regard as my brothers in the Christ every sincere immersed believer in the Lord Jesus. Our differences I will approach as differences between brothers, not as occasions of strife between aliens. I deplore the introduction of instrumental music over the protests of the saints but I deplore even more the adoption of the false premise that those who were my brothers yesterday are no longer my brothers today. I renounce as untenable the very idea that brotherhood in Christ Jesus is based upon any other consideration than the mutual Fatherhood of God. "We are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus," and not by conformity on matters of opinion or interpretation.

It is my intention, if God spares my life, to deal directly and positively with the rise of the factional spirit, in our next issue. It will be my purpose to show how those who opposed innovations chose the factional method of dealing with their brethren who introduced them, and how these latter then adopted that method in retaliation, and aggravated, irritated and agitated until in many communities the bitterness created by this intestine strife and civil war still lingers to haunt the battlefield and to thwart any real hope of producing unity until hearts are purged and renovated. We shall quote from legal briefs and court decisions to show how love had fled and mercy hid her face while hate was enthroned on the sacred altar.

Perhaps what is said in the paper next month will humble us all as it should. Certainly as I contemplate my own past and see how I was victimized by the party spirit bequeathed from our ancestors, as I realize how I even regarded the sacred oracles as a repository of scriptures to be drawn upon for factional conquest, I am saddened, distressed and penitent. I do not ask you to concur with what I write. I only ask you to fervently pray for me that I may have understanding of His will for my brief life and courage to fulfill the design without fear of what men may do unto me.

We believe that every anxious member of the fellowship of the concerned will want to share the paper next month with others who need to be shaken from their complacency. We promise you that it will be worth reading, even though you cannot find it in your heart to agree with its contents. In the meantime, you are my brother if you are God's child, and I love you sincerely because I love Him. I am resolved to make nothing a test of fellowship or communion which He has not made a condition of salvation! This recognizes my right to disagree with my brothers in Christ and respects their right to disagree with me. Thus Jesus becomes central in our thinking and we truly become one in Him!

Adventures in Religion (4)

Mission Messenger (January 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

To identify yourself with Jesus, allowing Him to dwell in you, is the greatest adventure of which one can be capable in the flesh. Unquestionably, the outstanding event in the history of mankind occurred when God broke through the physical barrier. This earth became the visited planet. In Jesus dwelt all the fulness of Deity in a body. “The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us and we beheld His glory.” Until that time the ideals of man were hazy images. Now the longings and aspirations and challenges were focused in the reality of a person, an ideal man. It is not surprising that he was killed. There are two things society cannot tolerate—for one to live too far below their standard or too far above it. The first they commit to prison, the second they nail to a cross.

Jesus lived dangerously! He was not a rabble rouser. He chose to feed a hungry multitude rather than weld them into a political mob. He was not a shouting demagogue. When he spoke in the house “his voice was not heard in the streets.” He did not harangue the populace with waving arms and clenched fist. Instead, his approach was so gentle that it would not break a crushed reed or extinguish the tiny spark on smoking flax. It was his utter unselfishness which made him a threat to the world of his day—or of any day! Religiously, politically, socially, economically, the world in which we live is geared to serve the selfish ends of those who are in power. They are hedged in by traditional rules and regulations, forms and ceremonies. They can use exclusiveness, boycott, threat and rumor to protect themselves and make it appear foolish for a lone individual to “buck the machine.”

The man who introduced Jesus ran afoul of the moral corruption of “the powers that be.” His head was chopped off in the gloomy dungeon of Machaerus and this bloody trophy served up on a platter to a scheming woman who shared her bed and her body with her brother-in-law. It must have required a considerable degree of courage to enter the province of Galilee after this, but the record says, “Now after John was arrested, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of God.” Such daring is always branded fanaticism by those who “play it safe” religiously. It makes a difficult situation for the folk at home, because they become the butt of ridicule due to their relationship. “When his family heard this, they set out to take charge of him, for people were saying that he was out of his mind” (Mark 3:21).

Nothing is more upsetting for a group than for someone to really believe that all humanity is related and that we have a responsibility toward all men. Such a person will not limit his association to “the right people.” He disregards convention. He goes as freely to the homes of the humble as to the mansions of the “upper crust.” Of course the best way to mark him off the social register is to start a whispering campaign and attribute ulterior motives. If it can be made to appear that he is not as good as he pretends to be, that really he is a glutton and a drunkard, the polished and refined can dismiss him from their thoughts without a qualm. In that way the kingdom of heaven can be reserved for “the country club set” who will not have to be embarrassed by the homespun manners of the uncultivated.

Jesus readily distinguished between beauty and ornamentation. He knew that one was natural and the other artificial. “And why be anxious about clothes? Consider how the lilies grow in the fields; they do not work, they do not spin; and yet, I tell you, even Solomon in all his splendor was not attired like one of these.” I suspect that Solomon had a whole retinue of tailors. No doubt they bought the finest fabrics from the looms of every country. They contrived to make the king the Beau Brummel of his day. With all of their skill, however, they could only attire Solomon from without. The real beauty is from within. It comes only from God. “God clothes the grass in the fields, which is there today, and tomorrow is thrown on the stove.” Even that which is fragile and unenduring serves its purpose in God’s plan.

For a long time I have been wondering if the real soul of adventure is not in the search for the beauty of nature as opposed to the artificial. We say that one is an adventurer who leaves the grime and smoke and dirt of the city to live in a log cabin on the shore of a wilderness lake. We use the term to designate one who becomes tired of ascending skyscrapers while walled up in an elevator and scales the wind-swept steeps of a wild snowy peak in the Himalayas. We apply it to those who leave the placid surface life and descend to the depths of the ocean to visualize the fantastic beauty never before observed by human eye. And when, after months of the weary grind which erodes away the spirit, we take a vacation and camp beside a clear lake surrounded by tall spruce, we whisper in awe and reverence, “This is God’s country.”

It has been said that our own civilization is becoming a decadent one because the spirit of adventure has disappeared. There are no new areas to challenge pioneers. Every remote spot has its burned out ashes of a campfire and its litter of empty beer cans. Our political leaders seek to arouse us from lethargy by coining slogans about the “new frontier” but we are jaded and tired and suspicious that this is merely another gimmick for raising taxes. All history bears mute witness to the fact that cultures are like the men who compose them. When they lose the spirit of daring they either die or continue an existence of such cautious and hopeless mediocrity that it can be said of them, “that though you have a name for being alive, you are dead.”

But the realm of exploration need not be closed to you! The most challenging area God ever created is relatively unexplored as yet. We have been deceived by the artificial and the superficial. Behind the facade lies a great vista, beckoning him who has the courage to enter. It is the field of human understanding, the vast area of brotherhood, the almost untrammelled wilderness of spiritual relationship—the creation of God! We have penetrated but slightly into this magnificent realm, then settled down and created our organizations which have shackled and enslaved us. We have made ourselves the serfs to systems upon which we are dependent for support and financial aid. Our own vision is thus made subservient to the restricted limitation of the most selfish and nearsighted member of the group whose objection will be voiced in business meeting if we dare to rise above our own narrowness. We are no longer lions of courage freely roaming the veldt, we are well-trained bird dogs who have learned how to “heel” when the whistle blows.

Before Jesus could begin the greatest adventure of the ages, he had to break through the curtain of flesh and become identified with man. “The children of a family share the same flesh and blood; and so he too shared ours, so that through death he might break the power of him who had death at his command” (Heb. 2:14). He did not come as an interplanetary traveler to share the hospitality earth had to offer. He did not come as a heavenly investigator to see how we were making out. He was not a colonial inspector sent out from headquarters. He came as one comes to his brothers. He shared their lot. He identified himself with them in every way. “And therefore he had to be made like these brothers of his in every way” (verse 17). This was the brotherhood of mankind and Jesus shared in their every weakness, desire and temptation. “For ours is not a high priest unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but one who, because of his likeness to us, has been tested every way, only without sin” (Heb. 4:15).

Those who would share in this adventure must also break through the curtain of the flesh and become identified with Christ. This is not possible to one who is cautious, frightened or dismayed by what others think or say. It is the way of the “bold approach” (Heb. 4:16). It is not the route of the prosaic nor the haunt of the humdrum. It is new and vibrant with life. “The blood of Jesus makes us free to enter boldly into the sanctuary by the new, living way which he has opened for us through the curtain of his flesh” (Heb. 10:19). Men dream of penetrating behind the Iron Curtain of Red Russia or the Bamboo Curtain of Red China, but the greatest adventure of all is to cross through the Flesh Curtain dyed red by the blood of Jesus and enter the realm of the spirit.

The blood which flowed from the body of Jesus was warm human blood. It made him akin to every man in every nation in every age on earth. God has made of one blood all nations. The blood which courses through my veins is also human blood. It identifies me with every individual on this earth. “We are God’s offspring.” As the record says, “That is why the Son does not shrink from calling men his brothers” (Heb. 2:12). To identify myself with Jesus is to identify myself with his purpose— “to bring many sons unto glory.” It is commonly thought in these days of shallow reasoning that this will be done through the agency of our religious organizations which, in our simplicity, we call “churches.” Actually, these may hinder instead of help. They have erected barriers, built walls, and created barricades to keep God’s people apart. They have set up false standards of loyalty and devised spurious tests of fellowship. It has come to pass that one must break through the “religious barrier” before he can even reach Jesus.

That which God creates is natural. That which man makes is artificial. As it was with the field lily and the apparel of Solomon— there is one glory of the natural and another glory of the artificial! If Jesus were on earth today he would ignore the conventions we have created, the traditions we cherish, and the selfish codes we countenance. He would recognize a brotherhood of all the redeemed, a fellowship of all the humble followers in his footsteps. There is just one flock of God as there is just one Shepherd. There is just one church on earth. There never was but one, there never can be but one. Those who compose it are all children of the same family. “We know that we have crossed the frontier from death to life because we do love our brothers” (1 John 3:14). If you believe this and are willing to pay the price for believing it, you can share in the great adventure, and Christ will live again on earth in you! The cross was the cost to Christ.

The Unequal Yoke

Mission Messenger (January 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

Of all the symptoms of the party spirit perhaps none is more fraught with evil consequences than that of wresting the scriptures to justify a position of separation and exclusiveness as relates to brethren. The entire tenor of the sacred writings is one of encouraging unity and condemning division. To select a passage and interpret it in such a manner as to contradict the very purpose of God is a great tragedy. It is like poisoning the well from which an entire community draws its water. It substitutes bitter for sweet and darkness for light.

As an example of what we mean consider the partisan application of 2 Corinthians 6:14-18 which begins with the admonition, “Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers,” and concludes with the command, “Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord.” This is quoted by factional leaders in order to enforce a boycott directed against other splinter parties. It is employed as a threat to discourage all fraternization across party lines. It is used to make it appear a dire sin to even go hear a man speak who does not belong to “the loyal church.” An “unbeliever” in party parlance is anyone who disagrees with “the powers that be” on the factional test of fellowship.

If a party opposes Bible classes one who does not oppose them is an “unbeliever.” If the party opposes individual cups one who does not oppose them is an “unbeliever” with whom you dare not associate. If instrumental music is made a test of fellowship those who use it are “unbelievers” and you must have no concord with them. “The unclean thing” which must not be touched (verse 17) is whatever the party opposes. Each party has a different test of fellowship so the “unclean thing” differs with each party. That which is unclean to one group is clean to another.

Although such an interpretation appears ridiculous to a real student of the sacred oracles, our readers would be surprised at how many factional leaders stand before their adherents and proclaim it in all seriousness. The deplorable thing is that such men confound believers with unbelievers, and use the latter term to describe those who are the very opposite of the ones so designated by the Spirit. No one who believes in the Lord Jesus Christ and has come into covenant relationship with Him can possibly be an unbeliever regardless of how many mistaken ideas he may have while in that relationship. No believer can become an unbeliever by any position he honestly holds on instrumental music, Bible classes, colleges, or individual cups. These are divergent views and opinions held by believers.

There is a catalog of terms in the passage under consideration referring to association. In the King James Version they are listed as yoked together, fellowship, communion, concord and part. Those with whom God’s sons and daughters are not to participate are listed under the following terms: unbelievers, unrighteousness, darkness, Belial, infidels and idols. The word translated “infidel” in verse 15 is the same as the one translated “unbelievers” in verse 14. Surely a man is not an infidel because he disagrees with us about instrumental music or individual cups. If having a mistaken idea makes a man an unbeliever there are no believers on earth.

Who is an unbeliever as the Spirit uses the term? Certainly an unbeliever is the opposite to a believer, and believers are those who are added to the Lord (Cp. Acts 5:14). Fortunately, the apostle draws a contrast in his first epistle to the Corinthians which gives an insight into the scriptural connotation of “unbeliever.” In chapter 6 he deals with the matter of resorting to heathen courts to adjudicate their disputes. He condemns their impleading each other before such tribunals instead of selecting moderators or referees from their own number. “Can it be that there is no man among you wise enough to decide between members of the brotherhood, but brother goes to law against brother, and that before unbelievers?” (verses 5, 6). It is evident from this that members of the brotherhood are not unbelievers. No brother in Christ Jesus is an unbeliever.

In verse one the unbelievers are identified as the unrighteous, and the brothers as saints. “When one of you has a grievance against a brother, does he dare to go to law before the unrighteous instead of the saints?” The unrighteous cannot be in the church because the apostle says, “If then you have such cases, why do you lay them before those who are least esteemed by the church?” A point frequently overlooked in this connection is that he identifies the unrighteous as the immoral, idolaters, adulterers, homosexuals, thieves, greedy, drunkards, revilers and robbers (verses 9, 10). These are the unrighteous and the unrighteous are the unbelievers. To brand as “unbelievers” those sincere brethren who hold different opinions than ourselves is not only to do them a grave injustice but also reflects the paucity and inadequacy of our own scholarship. We do not so much indict others as we demonstrate our own ignorance of the scriptures.

Against what was Paul warning? The clue is found in two expressions in the series of questions. “And what concord hath Christ with Belial? . . . And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols?” The association and fellowship of God’s people with idolatry which was so prevalent in Corinth was forbidden. They were to come out from idolaters and be separate from them and touch nothing unclean. “The unclean thing” had reference to the lewd and lascivious practices engaged in as a part of the very religion of pagan temples.

Ephesus, with its temple to Diana, was also a seat of idolatry. To the Ephesians Paul wrote: “But fornication, and all uncleanness, covetousness, let it not be once named among you, . . . no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God . . . Be not ye therefore partakers with them . . . And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them” (Eph. 5). To apply these passages to sincere brethren in the Lord to promote separation and division among them; to imply that followers of Christ are servants of Belial—these are crimes of deepest dye against brethren.

It is no wonder that under the influence of such interpretation we have become fragmented into fractions, split into segments, and torn into tatters. It is time for brethren to grow up and quit searching the scriptures for a pretext to dissolve brotherly affection and turn saints toward tribal warfare. It is an insult to the Father to brand his offspring as unbelievers and infidels. Such a course is unwarranted, unwise and unscriptural. “These are they which separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit.”

The Sand Creek Address

Mission Messenger (February 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It is not, therefore, within the province of this court to pronounce judgment upon the doctrines taught by Alexander Campbell and believed and practiced by his followers, or to determine which faction of the Sand Creek congregation, in their practices in their church congregation, from an ecclesiastical standpoint, is correct, as the courts have no concern with the questions whether a religious congregation is progressive or conservative; whether a musical instrument shall be present or absent during church services; whether the preacher shall be selected from the congregation or shall be a person employed by the congregation for a stated time at a stated salary; whether missionary societies and Sunday schools shall have separate organizations from the church congregations or not, or whether the funds necessary for the support of the church shall be contributed wholly by its members or raised in part by fairs and festivals. All these questions, and kindred questions, must be left to the determination of the church congregation.

This is an excerpt from the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois in the case of “The Christian Church of Sand Creek, Shelby County, Illinois, versus The Church of Christ at Sand Creek.” The opinion was filed on February 21, 1906. It was read by Mr. Justice Hand with all of the six other justices concurring. This case was typical of many which plagued the heirs of the restoration movement at the dawn of the twentieth century. The decision was presented the same year that David Lipscomb informed the United States Census Bureau that a separate listing under the title "Churches of Christ" should be accorded those congregations which opposed instrumental music and certain other things. Formal division was now an established fact among those who had started out to answer the prayer of the Savior for the unity of all believers.

The year of 1830 is famous in Illinois history because it marked the arrival of the Lincoln family who migrated from Kentucky, coming by way of Indiana. Many other Kentuckians came the same year and some of them planted the first congregation of disciples in the state at Jacksonville. Two years later Barton W. Stone moved to Jacksonville and from that time on his Christian Messenger was published there. In 1834 enough of the settlers in Shelby County had been converted to the restoration plea that John Storm and Bushrod Henry organized a congregation at Sand Creek and erected a log meetinghouse. In 1836 Tobias Grider united with the congregation and became its pioneer elder as well as a preacher of the gospel. Sometime later Peter P. Warren became associated with him as an elder and preacher.

There was little in the inception or early history of this rural congregation to indicate that it would have a prominent role in the unfolding drama of strife and division in the ranks of the restoration movement. But fate plays strange tricks and destiny, like lightning, strikes in unexpected places. Almost half a century passed and the little country church swelled in number time and again when the maturing young people in the community were immersed at the annual meeting. Many of these were forced to go elsewhere for work but they carried with them the fond memory of the place where they were baptized. Each August the Sand Creek congregation had a special gathering which was virtually a homecoming, a mass meeting attended by hundreds. Homes in the community were thrown wide open in hospitality. Basket dinners were served on Saturday and Sunday under the trees in the yard of the meetinghouse. The surrounding woods were filled with teams that had drawn loaded wagons, buggies and surreys to the scene.

Prominent preachers were secured for this annual event and the influence of the meetings was far-reaching. When the restoration began to be troubled and disturbed by introduction of the innovations that were creeping in, it was decided that Sand Creek was the place best suited to making a stand in opposition to these things. The annual meeting presented an unparalleled opportunity because of the number in attendance and their favorable attitude toward the congregation. The decision was not made hastily. It was discussed fully and deliberately. The leaders of the congregation were encouraged by a thirty-seven year old evangelist who had just purchased the American Christian Review in 1887.

Daniel Sommer was born near Washington, D. C., January 11, 1850, of poverty-stricken German parents. A serious minded youngster, he was induced to unite with the Methodists, but upon learning the plea of the restoration movement, he accepted it. Having a desire to preach the gospel he enrolled in Bethany College where he continued some two years. After the death of Benjamin Franklin at Anderson, Indiana, on October 22, 1878, the paper which he had published became a medium for advertising. The main source of revenue came from manufacturers of patent medicines and nostrums. Daniel Sommer bought the paper with borrowed money and began as editor by discarding all worldly advertisements. The decision to do this created great hardship.

He was assisted in this enterprise by some members at Sand Creek, Illinois, and two of the elders jointly signed a note with him to secure money from a Dr. Oliver, to apply on purchase of the paper. Soon after he assumed editorship he urged the leaders at Sand Creek to "draw a line against the innovators” and proposed to publicize their action as an example to other congregations faced with the same problems. Other congregations in the vicinity of Sand Creek were consulted and expressed a willingness to concur in any action thus taken. It was decided to draw up a document which would recognize “a formal division” and amount to “disfellowship” of those who advocated certain practices. To make it more impressive the statement was to be called “An Address and Declaration.” This was a play on the term “Declaration and Address” which was the designation of the famous document presented by Thomas Campbell exactly eighty years before.

The Sand Creek Declaration

Peter P. Warren was selected to write and publicly read the statement. It was agreed that it would be presented on Saturday afternoon, August 17, 1889, and that the reading would be preceded by a discourse on “Innovations” delivered by Daniel Sommer. This procedure was followed and the document was signed by six representatives for the Sand Creek Church, four for the Liberty Church, and one each for the Ash Grove Church, the Union Church, and the Mode Church. An addendum stated, “Elder Colson of Gays, and Elder Hoke of Strickland congregations signed, but as individuals only, because the congregations whence they came, had not been called together so as to send them formally. Green Creek congregation, by a letter from Bro. Jesse Baker, endorsed the movement.”

The “Address and Declaration” began with a statement of the original ideals of the disciples in the restoration movement. It pointed out that peace and harmony prevailed so long as these ideals were treasured. It then called attention to some painful facts and considerations made necessary because “there are those among us who teach and practice things not taught nor found in the New Testament.”

Some of the things of which we hereby complain, and against which we protest, are the unlawful methods resorted to in order to raise or get money for religious purposes, namely, that of the church holding festivals of various kinds, in the house of the Lord or elsewhere, demanding sometimes that each participant shall pay a certain sum as an admittance fee; the select choir to the virtual, if not the real, abandonment of congregational singing; likewise the man-made society for missionary work, and the one man imported preacher-pastor to take the oversight of the church. These with many other objectionable and unauthorized things are now taught and practiced in many of the congregations, and that to the great grief and mortification of some of the members of said congregations.

It is interesting to note that the question of instrumental music is not specifically mentioned in the document although it may have been referred to as part of the “many other objectionable and unauthorized things.” The aim and intent of the action is specified in the final paragraph.

It is, therefore, with the view, if possible, of counteracting the usages and practices that have crept into the churches, that this effort on the part of the congregations hereafter named is made, and now, in closing up this address and declaration, we state that we are impelled from a sense of duty to say, that all that are guilty of teaching, or allowing and practicing the many innovations and corruptions to which we have referred, that after being admonished, and having had sufficient time for reflection, if they do not turn away from such abominations, that we can not and will not regard them as brethren.

After Daniel Sommer purchased the American Christian Review he changed its name to Octographic Review, and true to his promise he published the “Address and Declaration” in that paper, with added observations of his own. He pointed out that there had long been discussions about “the question of drawing a line of demarkation between the churches of Christ and our innovating brethren.” The matter had even been agitated in columns of the Review ten years before “but it was then thought by the brethren generally that some other solution than a formal division could be reached.” He charged the innovating disciples with being “the dividers of the brotherhood” and declared, “They have abandoned our original position and have gone out from us because they were not of us.” However, he wrote, “Let it be distinctly understood that we have from the first agitation on this subject been numbered with those who earnestly endeavored to find some other solution of the problem than a formal separation.” The editorial concluded in this fashion:

If this sentence of an inspired apostle be adopted throughout the brotherhood, then the time will come that our ‘Modern School Brethren’ will have fixed upon them the odium of having by division disgraced the best cause on earth and having thereby become a party among parties, a sect among sects, a denomination among denominations. In the meantime the loyal disciples will become more firmly than ever established in their original principle in contending for the faith once delivered to the saints, and endeavoring to establish everywhere the Kingdom of Christ as it was in the beginning. Amen.

The year prior to the one in which Peter P. Warren wrote the “Address and Declaration” was the one in which David Lipscomb, editor of the Gospel Advocate first presented his thesis on “Civil Government” in the Christian Quarterly Review. Having gone through the tragic period of “Reconstruction” following the Civil War, Lipscomb reached the conclusion that all civil government originated with and belonged to Satan and that a Christian could not hold office or even vote at the polls. This view was not generally acceptable in the North and there was a considerable amount of feeling engendered over it and other issues. But David Lipscomb endorsed the “Sand Creek Declaration” and gave his commendation to its authors.

Personal Observations

Later on in our investigation we will detail the series of events which led to the Sand Creek church trial, for we cannot ignore this and correctly portray the rise of factionalism. Before doing this, however, it seems appropriate to make some personal observations relative to the “Address and Declaration.” Two years after the Supreme Court of Illinois rendered the decision referred to at the outset of this article, I was born in a rude two-room miner’s shack in the Missouri Lead Belt. At the time my parents knew nothing of the restoration movement. My father was a skeptic, my mother a devout Lutheran with spiritual roots running back to Denmark. My father had finished the third McGuffey’s Reader, my mother could not read or write English.

By a chain of circumstances not necessary to detail at this juncture, my father heard and became convicted of the plea of the churches of Christ, and when I was five years old I saw him immersed into our Lord. Although my mother continued in the Lutheran communion until two years after I began preaching the gospel, a profound change came over our family life. The first preachers whom I ever recall seeing were Daniel Sommer and his son, D. Austen Sommer. With an insatiable hunger for knowledge I lay flat of my stomach on the grass for hours, listening as my elders talked while sitting on hickory splint bottom chairs under a shade tree in the yard.

Between the date when the Sand Creek Declaration was read and the time of my birth, all had not been harmonious among the forces opposing innovations. Contrary to expectations “the loyal disciples” had not “become more firmly established in their original principles in contending for the faith.” After having said that the most fatal mistake Alexander Campbell made “was the establishment of a school to train and educate young preachers,” David Lipscomb himself helped inaugurate the Nashville Bible School. Other schools sprang up, among them “Western Bible and Literary College,” at Odessa, Missouri. Daniel Sommer regarded these as “human institutions to do the work of the church,” and in the same category as other societies.

Daniel Sommer testified at length in the court case involving Sand Creek and received with much satisfaction the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois, on February 21, 1906. Less than a year later, on the afternoon of February 18, 1907, he began a debate with B. F. Rhodes at Odessa, Missouri, on the question of “the Biblical right to establish an institution of learning which is chiefly secular, in order to furnish an occasion to teach pupils in the Bible.” In 1908 he published a written “Discussion on the Bible School” with J. N. Armstrong. Thus, when I first became aware of the restoration movement I learned to regard it as an attempt to hold the fort against “Old Digressives” and “New Digressives” as the advocates of colleges were designated.

Long before I knew anything about the “Declaration and Address” prepared by Thomas Campbell I was conversant with the “Address and Declaration” written by Peter P. Warren. In my childish mind I conceived of the church of God as having had a perfect and unbroken existence until the introduction of missionary societies and instrumental music. Then the Sand Creek document was conceived in the hearts of true and staunch defenders of the faith and proved to be the thing which salvaged truth from the rude hands of an implacable foe, restoring order out of chaos. That the cause had again been betrayed by a “southern element” was regrettable but not wholly unexpected from those in secessionist states. I grew up under the impression that there were few, if any, “loyal churches” south of the Mason and Dixon’s Line. Most of their members did not even read the Review.

Now, from more mature years and judgment, I would like to re-examine the decisions made at Sand Creek in 1889. I do this in full recognition of the price that must be paid by any person who questions the traditions of his fathers. I am aware of the fact that one must bear the stigma of “traitor” or “heretic” who dares to challenge the partisan concepts of his associates. But I am committed to an honest search for truth regardless of personal consequences. I cannot live with myself nor be prepared to meet my Lord if I compromise my conviction in a matter so important as this. I have resolved that I will shield no part of my thinking from examination and that I will accept nothing simply because it has been taught by men in the past. My faith must stand, if it stands at all, “in the power of God and not in the wisdom of men.”

In my analysis of the rise of factionalism I have come to believe that the philosophy embodied in the Sand Creek Declaration laid the foundation for the subsequent disintegration of the restoration movement. I am not especially concerned with the principals involved except as they were agents to give expression to a general feeling. Neither am I primarily concerned with the document except as it voiced the ideas held by so many. My review is not to be construed as an attack upon either the persons involved or the declaration they made. It is intended to be a searching study into the motivations and implications of thought which crystallized in the address.

For that matter, the document could well have been produced at numerous other places in 1889. The discussion of how to handle the rise of innovationism was rife in the land. In mass meetings held at Moberly and Richmond, Missouri, calls were made for just such a written expression “drawing a line of demarkation.” I do not impugn the motives nor question the sincerity of those who signed the document. Far from this, I am certain they did what they believed was best for the cause of Christ out of a deep love for the church of God.

In spite of the devotion of the author and signers the document was the product of fallible men. It originated in the thinking of men and Daniel Sommer referred to it as “the sentiments of the brethren who assembled at Sand Creek.” No document of human origin must ever become so sacred that to question it is regarded as sacrilege. We must never confuse “the traditions of the elders” with “the law of God.” No human production can ever be elevated to a sacred status without a simultaneous loss of respect for the revelation from heaven. There are those among our contemporaries who deeply resent our current research. They are fearful of the consequences. They would prefer to maintain the status quo even though it involves accepting division than to examine with open minds the factors which produced the tragic condition. Present error has a greater lure than newly-discovered truth.

Points of Clarification

In our review of the Sand Creek Declaration there is no attempt to condone those things which it condemned. We do not deny that they were innovations and it is evident that they were without scriptural warrant. But there is a difference between those things and the division which resulted from agitation of them. The factional spirit is sinful. The party spirit is a work of the flesh. To oppose evil from a factional standpoint is as wrong as to uphold evil from any standpoint. It is not opposition to evil but the factional spirit which is wrong. It is subversive of the divine government to create a party to oppose wrong. This is a species of doing evil with the hope that good may come.

It is our opinion based upon research into the factors leading to the adoption of the policy of attempting to preserve purity by division, and upon observation of the consequences resulting from application of that policy, that it is factional in nature and essence. It is our further opinion that this policy pursued regularly as a course of action can only culminate in more divisions, and ultimately will counteract and destroy any real spiritual gains made by those who adopt it. We hold the view that this philosophy is without sanction in the sacred scriptures, that it is contrary to the examples given of the primitive ekklesia, and it is in contravention of the purpose of God. It originates in human wisdom prompted by fear. It proposes to maintain what has been gained by regimentation of thought.

There is little to be gained in any final analysis if, in an attempt to keep innovations from destroying the church of God, we adopt those methods which will eventually achieve the same end. If “the church” is destroyed in our generation it matters little whether it is done by those who profess to be “faithful” or by those whom they denounce as “unfaithful.” A man is just as dead if shot by a faithful wife as by one who is unfaithful. The restoration movement today is splintered into more than two dozen antagonistic parties. These have been created by application of the philosophy that was adopted by our fathers three-quarters of a century ago. Since the cleavage resulting from introduction of the instrument, those opposed to its use have averaged four partisan divisions for every decade of their separate existence.

This is not all. Other divisions must follow in the future. Every time a truth is discovered, every time honest investigation forces a change of mind, there will be another division. This philosophy bars the door to further scriptural research, makes real unbiased study a crime, and places a premium on mediocrity. It throws a dam across the channel of thought, freezes the acquisition of knowledge, and constitutes an unwritten creed. It makes blind conformity a blessing and enthrones orthodoxy as the ideal. If a system, like a tree, is known by its fruits, we should eliminate this one immediately.

Let us not indulge precious time or waste our efforts in an attempt to establish guilt for what occurred three-quarters of a century in the past. Our brethren were faced with grave and serious problems. They were frightened by an oncoming wave of innovations which would destroy all they held sacred. They had to make a decision as to the best means to withstand the onslaught. Perhaps the choice was exactly the one we would have made at the time and under the circumstances. We have the privilege of looking backward upon the outworking of their method. We can admit all the good that was done through it without perpetuating it if conditions have altered. Radium treatments may be administered to a cancer patient at one stage of his illness but if continued indefinitely may become as harmful as the disease.

I do not regard the Sand Creek Declaration as I once did. I no longer think of it as an embodiment of those means which will provide the proper answer to every situation which confronts us when men advocate things we cannot endorse. It is not a panacea for all of our spiritual ills. Indeed I think it contains within it the seed which, when ripened, may prove as destructive as the innovations it proposed to thwart. The spirit which is entombed within it will force every generation to declare non-fellowship with every preceding one. Under the influence of this thinking no congregation of fifty years ago would be recognized by present day congregations if it taught exactly as it did then, and none existing today will be regarded as faithful fifty years hence. It is doubtful if David Lipscomb or Daniel Sommer would be allowed to speak now in most of the congregations they planted. In view of these statements allow me to make some observations about the address written by Peter P. Warren.

A Critical Examination

1. The Sand Creek meeting at which the document was signed was essentially a delegate convention. True there were a great many others in attendance but the signers had been formally sent as representatives or delegates of their respective congregations. The congregations had assembled and authorized them to sign in their behalf. It is specifically stated that “the brethren whose names stand alone in signing the document represented the churches from which they came.” Of two others it is said they “signed, but as individuals only, because the congregations whence they came, had not been called together so as to send them formally.”

Every one of the signers would have opposed a delegate convention to determine policy and did oppose the convention which met in Cincinnati and inaugurated the missionary society. Yet they met at Sand Creek as congregational delegates and entered into a coalition, adopting and signing a document which was intended to serve as a policy making instrument in dealing with brethren who were not even present or represented. The editor of Octographic Review wrote, “We endorse the foregoing document as adopted and signed at the Sand Creek meeting.” All such meetings are divisive in their outworkings.

2. The Sand Creek Declaration sounded the death knell for the autonomy of the local congregation. Its very purpose was to reach out and discipline, even to the point of excommunication, those not affiliated with the congregations from which the delegates were sent. It was an ultimatum, adopted and published, which intended to transfer into the hands of certain ones the right to determine when others at a distance and not even in their congregations should no longer be regarded as brethren.

The editor of the Octographic Review wrote, “It does not propose to disfellowship any till they have been admonished and refuse to turn from their waywardness.” This is a clear admission that it did propose to “disfellowship” certain ones and it placed the judgment as to when to take such action in the hands of those not even remotely connected with the congregations in which some of the “guilty” ones were members. Out of this kind of reasoning grew the idea that one congregation could “disfellowship” another congregation and that the elders of one church could pronounce the sentence of “spiritual death” upon another congregation over which they held not the slightest degree of jurisdiction. Nothing more unscriptural was ever conceived by the minds of partisan men.

It is astounding that men would meet to deal with those who “teach and practice things not taught nor found in the New Testament” and depart so far from both the letter and spirit of the new covenant scriptures. Certainly this declaration was an innovation for which no one could produce a “thus saith the Lord.” Eventually, as it always happens, the power of decision became invested in the editor of the official organ and all nonconformists were cut off without trial or appeal. All that was required to drive one forth from the party was a censure by the editor. The unfortunate victim had no recourse. He could not publish a reply to be read before those who had read the censure. The “loyal churches” did not dare call upon him or recognize him. He was given the “deep freeze” treatment by even his former friends. Branded a “traitor, heretic and apostate,” he either gave in, gave out, or gave up!

It is appropriate to remark that the Sand Creek Address and Declaration differed from the Declaration and Address written by Thomas Campbell. The purpose of the document written by Campbell was to unite the Christians in all the sects; the purpose of the document written by Peter P. Warren was to call for division among disciples. One was written to remove barriers between brethren, the other to draw a line of demarkation between them. One marked the beginning of war against the sectarian spirit, the other marked the start of a conflict which would be waged in that spirit.

A Partisan Foundation

3. Another feature must not be overlooked. The Sand Creek Declaration laid the foundation of brotherhood based upon conformity in matters of opinion, interpretation and congregational practice. Let me not be misunderstood at this juncture. Such conformity is an ideal for which to strive. Nothing less can be the goal of all who are sincerely interested in restoration of a primitive order. But there is as much difference between the basis of entering family relationship and the aims and ambitions of a family as there is between the basis of acquiring citizenship and national ideals of the citizens in the aggregate.

Regardless of all partisan appeals and propaganda to the contrary brotherhood is the result of common fatherhood. "Now the one who sanctifies and those whom he sanctifies both have the same Father, and thus he is not ashamed to call them his brothers" (Heb. 2:11). We are not unaware that a strain may be put on family ties. We do not doubt that the wilful and deliberate advocacy of certain things over the protest of humble brethren in 1889 presented a difficult situation. We do not question the decision as to how to meet the problem. We do not deny that if we had been present we would probably have agreed to the action. We freely admit that for years we implemented the decision in our own conduct toward others, but this does not make it right. We believe that even though we acted sincerely we worked against the interest of peace and unity.

The policy of those opposed to innovations as stated at Sand Creek was that when those who were "guilty of teaching, or allowing and practicing the many innovations and corruptions" had been admonished and given sufficient time for reflection, "if they do not turn away from such abominations, that we can not and will not regard them as brethren." This is the equivalent of declaring that at a certain time to be determined by human judgment those who did not conform to the written ultimatum would be disinherited from the family of God and no longer recognized as His children. To those who protest that this is a forced interpretation it only needs to be pointed out that one would certainly regard as his brothers all who were children of the same father as himself. The statement,

“We will not regard them as brethren” is equivalent to saying, “We will not regard them as God’s children.”

We know that defenders of our traditional position declare that the cause of Christ was saved by the forthright action of our fathers in the dying decades of the nineteenth century. They believe that the drastic steps taken then preserved “the faithful brotherhood.” But an unbiased investigation will show that we now have as many “brotherhoods” as we have factions. One who reads the reports in partisan journals will soon learn that “News of the Brotherhood” contains reports only from the limited number who conform to the partisan concepts of the editor. One who learns better is hounded from “the brotherhood” although he is generally received with open arms as a convert into another “brotherhood.” This is the natural fruit borne by the philosophy adopted by Daniel Sommer and David Lipscomb, which, because of their influence became the official and orthodox policy of the “The Church of Christ.” Stripped bare of all extraneous matters it is a philosophy of brotherhood based on conformity of opinion, a relationship that is extended only until others deem that one has had “sufficient time for reflection.” It is brotherhood based on the calendar— or clock!

Our problem is augmented because this philosophy sees only two alternatives. It is either accept the innovations which become the pets of men, or no longer regard such men as brethren while they hug their pets to their bosoms. But this is an incorrect assumption. There is another alternative. One may continue to regard men as his brothers while steadfastly refusing to condone or sanction what his heart cannot regard as right or proper. We believe this is the scriptural course. Certainly the first is untenable for we cannot expect that men will endorse that which they believe to be wrong. We think that the second has proven itself to be injudicious and unworkable for it has left a sordid trail of division and has brought the restoration movement itself into disrepute. The first is based on compromise, the second on dogmatism, but the third is the way of love and thus the only way of genuine brotherhood!

4. We believe that our approach to the problem of securing and maintaining purity in doctrine has been factional in nature. This will be denied by hundreds and thousands who have so long defended that policy it will be difficult for them to ever admit they were in error. But the advocacy of any system which proposes to divide God's people into various camps, cliques, splinters and segments, is certainly factional in its out-working. The truth is that God has not offered division among brethren as a possible solution to problems facing those brethren. The Sand Creek Declaration was written for the specific purpose of recommending separation of a formal nature. The very language used to justify it proves what we allege. Referring to attitudes ten years preceding it is said, "It was then thought by the brethren generally that some other solution than a formal division could be reached." Again it is said, "We have from the first agitation of this subject . . . endeavored to find some other solution than a formal separation."

The context of these remarks proves that the document was an attempted solution by "formal division" or "formal separation." This could mean nothing other than that from this time on the brethren who had labored and worshiped together would be divided and separated from each other. Now if formal division or separation is authorized by the Father as a means of settling problems in His family the document was justified. But a careful examination of the scriptures will reveal that it is not so. Jude, in his condemnation of those who "walk after their own ungodly lusts" writes: "These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit" (verse 19). The RSV translates the passage, "It is these who set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit."

Formal division must always create at least two parties of those who have been one. In the type of case before us these will be rival parties. Yet Galatians 5:19, 20 affirms, "Now the deeds of the flesh are quite obvious, such as . . . dissension, jealousy, temper, rivalry, factions, party-spirit . . . and the like” (James Moffatt). “Anyone can see the kind of behavior that belongs to the lower nature . . . quarrels, a contentious temper, envy, fits of rage, selfish ambitions, dissensions, party intrigues, jealousies . . . and the like” (New English Bible). Few of us would dare deny that those on both sides of the feuds in the previous century were affected by one or more of these works of the flesh. Jesus Christ has nowhere authorized his disciples to formally separate from each other. He has repeatedly urged them to attain unto harmony. “Fill up my cup of happiness by thinking and feeling alike, with the same love for one another, the same turn of mind, and a common care for unity. Rivalry and personal vanity should have no place among you” (Phil. 2:2, 3).

To those who live in congregations which tolerate false teaching, there is not one single admonition to divide or separate and create rival parties in the same community. Instead Jesus says, “Those who do not accept this teaching and have had no experience of what they like to call the deep secrets of Satan; on you I will impose no further burden. Only hold fast to what you have until I come. To him who is victorious, to him who perseveres in doing my will to the end, I will give authority over the nations” (Rev. 3:24-26). To those who are in a congregation that is pronounced dead, and one which has never completed a single thing it started out to do, there is not a hint of division or separation. Instead the few who are worthy and deserving are promised that He will receive them (Rev. 3:3, 4). To a congregation that has divided although they still meet in the same location, the admonition was not to continue in formal separation, but to cease it. “Mend your ways, take our appeal to heart, agree with one another; live in peace; and the God of love and peace will be with you” (2 Cor. 13:11).

Opposing Considerations

Against this reasoning, those who are advocates of the factional approach to purity of doctrine, urge the words of Jesus, “You must not think that I have come to bring peace to the earth; I have not come to bring peace, but a sword. I have come to set a man against his father, a daughter against her mother, a young wife against her mother-in-law, and a man will find his enemies under his own roof” (Matt. 10:34-36). If this means that Jesus came to create division among the believers, and to urge brethren to set each other at nought, then his mission is wholly irreconcilable with his work and sayings. Whatever is involved in bringing a sword it refers to his mission to the earth. It was what he came to do.

In Matthew 7:9-11 the heavenly Father is favorably contrasted with physical fathers. “If you, then, bad as you are, know how to give your children what is good for them, how much more will your heavenly Father give good things to those who ask him!” It is inconceivable to me that a father while sitting at the table with his children would hand one of them a dagger or sword and encourage him to slay the others. On the night of his betrayal Jesus prayed that the believers might be one in him so the world would believe that God had sent him. Surely he would not come for the express purpose of setting them against each other. Three times in one week after his resurrection he appeared to the disciples with the greeting, “Peace be with you” (John 20:19, 21, 26). Does this not indicate that he came to bring peace to the disciples?

What did Jesus mean by the statement, “I have not come to bring peace, but a sword . . . and a man will find his enemies under his own roof.” The context shows that this was a part of his instructions to the twelve when he commissioned them to go to Jewish towns and villages with the announcement, “The reign of heaven is approaching.” They were told, “Be on your guard, for men will hand you over to the courts, they will flog you in the synagogues, and you will be brought before governors and kings for my sake, to testify before them and the heathen” (Matt.

10:17, 18). The intensity of the animosity is shown by the fact that “Brother will betray brother to death, and the father his child, children will turn against their parents and send them to their death. All will hate you for your allegiance to me; but the man who holds out to the end will be saved” (verses 21, 22).

It is in this connection Jesus declares he did not come to bring peace to the earth. The nature of the message is such that it transcends all earthly ties and considerations. But the sword is not to be used by one brother in Christ against another such brother. Brethren are not to settle their differences as enemies under the same roof. The parting gift of Jesus to the disciples was not a sword with which to chop his body to bits. “Peace is my parting gift to you, my own peace, such as the world cannot give. Set your troubled hearts at rest, and banish your fears” (John 14:27). Jesus did not shed his blood that his followers should hack each other to pieces over individual cups, fermented wine, colleges and Bible classes!

Again, those who defend the factional approach as a solution to problems, quote James 3:17. “But the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable.” In their interpretation, purity is made to refer to doctrinal matters and is actually conformity to the norm of the party. The degree of purity which one possesses is determined by the intensity with which he opposes missionary societies, instrumental music, Bible classes, individual cups, unfermented wine, or other things of a controversial nature. Thus the standard for measuring purity differs with each faction. What is pure to one may be impure for another. I recall that in one factional dispute some years ago between brothers in the Lord and in the flesh this passage was constantly quoted to justify separation and division. While all of us should strive to know God’s will and grow in grace and knowledge of the truth, I doubt that James has in mind any justification of the factional attitude. It may be interesting for you to read the comment which Albert Barnes makes on the passage.

It is true that a church should be pure in doctrinal belief, but that is not the truth taught here. It is not true that the scripture teaches, here or elsewhere, that purity of doctrine is to be preferred to a peaceful spirit; or that it always leads to a peaceful spirit; or that it is proper for professed Christians and Christian ministers to sacrifice, as is so often done, a peaceful spirit, in an attempt to preserve purity of doctrine. Most of the persecutions in the church have grown out of this maxim. This led to the establishment of the Inquisition, this kindled the fires of Smithfield; this inspired Laud and his friends; this has been the origin of no small part of the schisms in the church. A pure spirit is the best promoter of peace, and will do more than anything else to secure the prevalence of truth.

Does not this passage imply that the first step toward real Christian character is a pure, or sincere heart? In the same context James contrasts the wisdom that is earthly and declares that it is the motivating factor in those who have bitter jealousy and selfish ambition in your hearts (verse 14). In verse 16 he says, “For where jealousy and selfish ambition exist, there will be disorder and every vile practice.” Then he continues, “But the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, open to reason, full of mercy and good fruits, without uncertainty or insincerity.” Do not all of these proceed from pure hearts that are purged of “bitter jealousy and selfish ambition”? Surely every congregation should be as pure in doctrine as possible and they need to make those alterations and changes which will help them to attain to greater purity, but to quote this verse as grounds for division among believers in Jesus seems to me to do a grave injustice to the sacred scriptures. We ought not to forget that the very next verse reads, “And the harvest of righteousness is sown in peace by those who make peace.” But even God could not write a law which was a safeguard against the spirit of factionalism.

My Personal Position

In the next issue I shall deal with the partisan tactics exhibited by those who introduced the “innovations” against which the Sand Creek Declaration was directed. The leaders forsook all semblance of brotherly love and deliberately sought by the arm of the civil law to take the property long held by those whose consciences forbade their sanction and adoption of certain things. This crystallized community and family feeling and doomed the restoration movement to an incessant civil war carried on by snipers and guerillas until this very generation. It was an ill-advised move taken by those who proved beyond doubt that “the party spirit” is indeed a “work of the flesh.”

I am committed to the task of pleading for unity among the believers. I am convinced this can only be achieved by a restoration of the primitive order. This prompts me to oppose anything, in tendency or in fact, which will delay such restoration. I do not plead for unity regardless of restoration nor for restoration irrespective of unity. My plea is for unity based upon restoration of apostolic order and principle. This includes a restoration of the apostolic concept of brotherhood. It follows that I am not only opposed to those things which will obstruct restoration but I am also opposed to those methods which will destroy any hope of unity.

While I deplore the introduction of any innovation which seriously affects an attempt to restore the primitive order, I also decry any system devised to oppose such innovations which will forever banish the hope of securing unity in Christ Jesus. Those congregations representing the various divergent segments which call themselves “The Church of Christ” have adopted a philosophy of attempting to maintain doctrinal purity by separation, that is, by fractionalizing and factionalizing the previously existing brotherhood. They have developed an unwritten creed of dogmatism. It is based on a theory of disciplinary action which may be designated ex familia, out of the family.

This method was contrived to meet the problems posed in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Its application has now effectively reduced a glorious movement started to unite “the Christians in all sects” into the most divided religious movement on the American scene. I revere the memory of men like Daniel Sommer and David Lipscomb, leaders in the north and south, but they overstepped their human limitations when they proposed to un-Christianize and depose from God’s family those who disagreed with them. Only the Father has a right to tell who should be regarded as brethren.

I want it known that I love God and I love every word in the sacred oracles. But I renounce the traditional twentieth century “Church of Christ” factionalism as a means for achieving God’s purpose in this age. I shall continue to oppose everything that I believe to be out of harmony with God’s plan but I shall not allow these things to interfere with my love or regard for any of my brothers who sincerely and conscientiously disagree with me about the implementation of that plan. In short, I shall make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. I shall not seek to establish brotherhood by definition of a human document, nor by conformity in matters of opinion. I shall be a brother to all who have been begotten by my Father. Brotherhood based upon fatherhood, fraternity based upon paternity, this shall be my standard because it is scriptural. I will free myself from all partisan traditions, schemes and ideas which men have adopted to offset unity of the Spirit. I intend to be a free man in Christ, bound only by His word. “You are bought with a price, do not become slaves of men” (1 Cor. 7:23).

The unity of the Spirit is one of community, not conformity; of diversity, not uniformity. It is rooted in mutual love, not dogmatism; in freedom, not in slavery. Our peace is a person, not a plan or a program!

Basis of Authority

Mission Messenger (February 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It would appear from articles in partisan journals and from radio addresses on partisan programs that members of “The Church of Christ” feel that the real strength of their appeal in this generation lies in their emphasis on the authority of the revelation of God and its implementation in their practice and conduct. A realistic appraisal of our condition will reveal a great gulf between the facade presented to the world and the actual state of affairs among ourselves. If the new covenant scriptures, as a sole rule of faith and practice, constitute a proper foundation for unity, members of “The Church of Christ” should be of all people the most united. Instead, they constitute the most divided religious movement on the contemporary American scene. There are more than two dozen distinct factions in the non-instrument group alone.

It borders upon hypocrisy for “front men” and publicity agents of these groups to go before the world with an appeal for all to unite upon the authority of the scriptures when they are in constant turmoil and confusion among themselves over the implications of God’s Word. There are more public debates in the United States each year between members of the various “Churches of Christ” than all the rest of the religious world put together. They have not only divided in the past but their philosophy will continue to divide them in the future. This sad state is an open demonstration of what happens to those who proclaim one thing and practice a wholly different one.

Our brethren are sincere in their contention that the word of God is our only source of authority but they cannot distinguish between revelation and interpretation. Revelation is what God has said. Interpretation is what men think he meant by what he said. Revelation is divine. It is the disclosure of the infinite mind. Interpretation is the application of the human mind in an attempt to fathom the divine disclosure. We are bound to recognize revelation as our source of authority because of our relationship to God.

We are not bound to recognize the interpretation of any man as authoritative to us unless it commends itself as truth to our own mind and conscience. We are not to be judged by any man in that realm because in it no man is master of another.

We are not at all divided over what constitutes authority. All of us acknowledge that “God is the head of Christ and Christ is the head of every individual man” (1 Cor. 11:3). It is only when some seek to exercise lordship over others that difficulty arises. Practically every division among us has occurred when men placed a certain interpretation upon some portion of revelation, then substituted it for the revelation and sought to bind it as the will of God. Separation comes as the result of interpretation, not revelation. Every party among us has access to the divine revelation. Each one of them contends fiercely that it is following that revelation. Actually, each faction thinks it has an infallible interpretation and all must kneel to it. This amounts to making our faith stand in the wisdom of men and not in the power of God.

There is little difference in essence between “the infallible interpreter” of the Church of Rome and “the infallible interpretations” in “The Churches of Christ.” The first does make for a united front, whereas the second creates and then multiplies divisions. Both are dogmatic and authoritarian. Both make their traditions as binding as God's revelation. Both are instruments to produce conformity by threats of damnation to those who resist. Both employ the carnal weapons of thought-control, censorship, boycott and excommunication for divergent opinion. Both exercise power over the masses by a top-level dictatorship which stifles original thinking and makes the members mere pawns in the frightful game of political factional feuds.

We must do nothing to undermine faith in God's revelation as our basis of authority. That revelation must be our final court of appeal. As such, it must be magnified and elevated as the communication of God. At the same time we must recapture and re-affirm the right of every child of God to hear the voice of God speaking to him and not through an interpreter. Each must be allowed to approach that revelation for himself free from coercion exercised by any other human being. We will be judged in the last day as individuals, not as groups or congregations.

The understanding is a natural faculty. It can never be made the subject of any command except as that command is itself a reason adapted to satisfy and persuade it. To build up a congregation of "loyal brethren" kept in line by fear of reprisal or by force is to create a congregation of hypocrites. The only truly "faithful church" is one composed of those who are free men and who associate with each other in a congregational capacity because of their mutual love for Jesus our Lord. They are drawn together by him, not driven together through fear. The plea for recognition of the authority of divine revelation is good and wholesome. It needs to be heard in every corner of our land. The practice of substituting partisan interpretation for revelation is evil. It needs to be banished forever from our lives. No man can be trusted to judge for all others, not even an editor, but every man may be trusted to judge for himself. This is the divine order and we disregard it at our peril. Truth is the heritage of free men. It is not as we conform to party norms that we either discover or defend truth, but rather is it in the free exchange of thought. Differences should be stepping-stones not stumbling-stones.

Every factional leader on earth, driven by aspiration for control of others, has a Messiah-complex and indulges in “playing God.” Men who wonder what will happen to the cause of Christ when they die, and who predict its departure upon their demise, end up by being tyrants while they live regardless of good intentions or high motivations. In 1800 Thomas Jefferson wrote, “I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.” With this as our motto we can truly assert the authority of divine revelation free from the domination of partisan spirit.

Brothers at Law

Mission Messenger (March 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The shady grove surrounding “the brick church” as the place was familiarly called, was filled with wagons and buggies. The teams had been unhitched and the horses were now tied by one of the reins to the rear wheels from which position it was possible for them to eat the hay thrown down in the back of the vehicles. The owners had made preparation for a lengthy stay. This Saturday, August 14, 1889, was to be a memorable one at Sand Creek. Fifty-five years the congregation had met in this vicinity, first in a log house, then in a frame house, on land belonging to Tobias Grider. But in July, 1874 James Turrentine and his wife Sarah deeded the present site to “The Trustees of the Christian Church of Sand Creek” and the brick meetinghouse costing thirteen hundred dollars had been erected.

Great changes had taken place in many of the congregations of the reformation in Illinois since John Storm and Bushrod Henry had banded the first little group of disciples together at Sand Creek in 1834. The latter had migrated from Virginia in November, 1830, to begin preaching in Shelbyville. In July, 1831, he started a congregation with nine members in that county seat and by 1834 it had grown to seventy souls. In 1832 he set forth the principles of the restoration in Walker’s settlement, and started a congregation of seven members. In two years the local Presbyterian party disbanded and all of its constituents joined the restoration movement. The tide was running high when the effort was launched in the Sand Creek community and a new log meetinghouse was erected.

But the past half century had seen the introduction of a number of innovations. Since the missionary society had been organized at Cincinnati in 1849 there seemed a general disposition to borrow various items made popular by the sectarian world. The practice of hiring a pastor had become prevalent in city congregations, some of which resorted to various commercial schemes to raise money and even went so far as to bring instruments of music into the public worship. The congregations at Shelbyville and Windsor now had organs. They had taken their stand with the "Progressives" or "Digressives" as their opponents referred to them. But the church at Sand Creek did not waver. The brethren "pursued the even tenor of their way." They were content to remain among the "Antis" as those were dubbed who had more conservative tastes in matters religious.

The leaders viewed with alarm the encroachment of modern methods. The question of what to do in the growing emergency formed the topic of many Sunday afternoon conferences between themselves and the brethren from Liberty congregation, another rural outpost but a few miles away. They consulted with Daniel Sommer, who lived in Indianapolis, and it was decided that a line must be drawn against the "digressive element." It was suggested that such action could be dramatized if a public declaration was issued and representatives from concurring congregations signed it in the presence of the audience. Daniel Sommer pointed out that the Restoration movement began with the "Declaration and Address" read by Thomas Campbell; now it would be saved by an "Address and Declaration" read at Sand Creek.

It was decided that the annual August meeting would provide an unparalleled opportunity to take a stand. Visits were made to Ash Grove, Union, Mode, Green Creek, Gays and Strickland. The leaders of all these places agreed that something must be done and done quickly. Members were already going to Shelbyville and Windsor and taking up with "the foolishness of the Digressives." All agreed that Peter P. Warren was the one to write and read the statement. This aged man had preached in all of these localities. He was respected by all who revered "the old paths." Announcement was made in all of the congregations through the area that a showdown was imminent and that action of a definite nature would be taken at the August meeting at Sand Creek. There was a prospect of "fire works" if some of the Progressives from town were present but Daniel Sommer would be there to keep the situation under control.

And now the great day had dawned. Those who had been designated as representatives by their congregations felt a sense of destiny as they hooked the teams to their wagons. They were going to take a step which ought to have been taken long ago. It was time to mark off the list of faithful brethren those who persisted in having their way regardless of what scripture taught. These delegates had already seen the draft of the address written by Peter P. Warren. As they drove along the dusty roads there came back to mind the statement, "If they do not turn away from such abominations, we can not and will not regard them as brethren." Yes, it would truly be a wonderful occasion for the people of God. It would mark the date of formal separation from the "Modern Schoolmen," as Brother Sommer designated the "innovating disciples."

Daniel Sommer faced the large audience. There were few of them that he had not met. They had driven long distances to hear him in the past. He was the recognized defender of orthodoxy and his position was the more glamorous now that he was editor of the paper which Benjamin Franklin had started and which he employed with such vigor to battle every tendency at departure from the scriptural pattern. On this day Daniel Sommer was in his physical prime. He took great pride in stopping by the blacksmith shop and lifting with one hand a piece of iron which taxed most men to lift with both hands. His deep voice carried without a break or quaver to the remote limits of the crowd. His subject was "Innovations in the Church" and he was thoroughly conversant with the material. He left no doubt in the minds of the hearers that "there is no law human or divine, which innovators hold themselves bound to respect in dealing with those who oppose their devices." He knew of but one scriptural solution— formal division!

Peter P. Warren arose in dignity and read the address. "It is, therefore, with the view, if possible of counteracting the usages and practices that have crept into the churches, that this effort on the part of the congregations hereafter named is made." When he finished reading, he laid the manuscript on the table which would be set the next day with the fruit of the vine and the one bread which symbolized the one body. He signed the document, and then the other Sand Creek delegates, led by A. J. Nance, came forward and affixed their signatures. Four representatives from Liberty followed. After them in succession came the delegates from the other congregations. At last division had been recognized and given official status. From henceforth brotherhood would be determined by a willingness to oppose certain things. The "Antis" were committed to a program of brotherhood by counteraction.

At first the address made little difference. The "Progressives" in Shelbyville and Windsor continued their activities as usual. Visiting preachers coming in hurled the customary blasts at "reactionaries and obstructionists" as they called the "Antis." In private they passed around a cartoon which depicted David Lipscomb of Nashville, Tennessee, as an old woman with a broom trying to sweep back the waves of the ocean of "progress." It was freely predicted that the Restoration movement would again be united on a more liberal basis when a few "old fogies" in country churches died off. Unity would come more quickly by "funerals" than by fighting. The missionary society would convert the world to Jesus and usher in a virtual millennium. Such documents as the "Sand Creek Address" were temporary irritations that had to be endured by a progressive movement.

At Sand Creek and Liberty no difference was noted. There was always a relapse after the excitement attendant upon the "big meeting" in August. The farmers were working early and late getting in their fall crops. When they gathered on Sunday farming conditions made up the chief topic of conversation before and after services. No reference was ever made publicly to the address. When someone came forward during the "invitation song" he was merely asked, "Do you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God?" No one was ever asked about his position on innovations as a requisite to baptism. Gradually, everything settled back to its normal state with the preachers publicly denouncing the innovations, and the membership talking mostly about corn and alfalfa. Only in the homes of the leaders where visiting preachers stayed was there animated talk about "developments." Gradually, the subject of the organ was supplanted by discussion of the founding of Nashville Bible School by David Lipscomb. A "new digression" had started among those opposed to instrumental music and it had now stolen the limelight. The last decade of the fading nineteenth century passed slowly into history.

Almost at the threshold of the new century a series of events took place which were to kindle the fires of the party spirit seven times hotter than they had ever burned before. This time it was the "Progressives" who took the initiative and demonstrated that the implications of the Sand Creek address had been rankling in their hearts for years. Under ill-advised leadership there began a movement to try and take by litigation the property held by those who opposed the innovations. This was to be done on the basis of a technicality. In the inception of the Restoration in Illinois and Missouri no distinctive title was applied to the disciple brotherhood. The condition is best illustrated by this brief prepared by Daniel Sommer for the Sand Creek church.

As far as the name of the church is concerned, we say that all the proof shows that from the beginning of the Reformation of the 19th century, the church has always been known by the names Christian Church, Church of Christ and Disciples of Christ. Any congregation in the brotherhood might adopt either of these names, or any other scriptural name as the 'Church of the First-born,' the 'Church of God,' and thereby take a name approved of by the brotherhood. All of these names were used as synonyms, interchangeably, and meaning the same thing.

The term "Christian Church" had been the most popular one among the members and the people of the community as well. The property was therefore deeded to "the trustees of the Christian Church." This was the name most frequently found above the doors of the church buildings or engraved upon their cornerstones. When "the line of demarkation" was drawn by the Sand Creek address those who opposed the innovations sought to distinguish their party from the others. Gradually they began to adopt as a title "Church of Christ" and to apply the term "Christian Church" to those who used instrumental music. The community knowing little of the reasons for the change still spoke of them all as "The Christian Church."

Those who favored the innovations in various communities were urged to organize as "The Christian Church" and sue for the property held by the "Antis" on the basis that they no longer constituted the "Christian Church" but were a new party formed by secession and created by adoption of the Sand Creek Declaration in 1889. History reveals that such suits were hardly ever entered until local, trivial and unrelated matters prompted personal feeling, but once such litigation was in progress the prominent preachers on both sides flocked to the spot to qualify as expert witnesses on the traditional procedures and practices of the church. A study of the court cases shows that their testimony was contradictory at almost every point but one. All agreed that each congregation was autonomous and “a law unto itself.” Apparently none of them saw their own inconsistency in coming long distances to insert themselves into congregational affairs. Typical of the testimony on this point is that of the Rev. E. A. Hoffman, a Progressive, as given in circuit court in the Sand Creek church trial.

Each church in the brotherhood is entirely independent of the other, and it is in control of its own affairs. There is no ecclesiastical authority over the management of their affairs; there is no higher court than the congregation; they may ask counsel of others, but there is no authority; there is no such thing as presbyteries or synods.

The Hammond Case

The first trial in which the Sand Creek Declaration figured involved the disciples in the village of Hammond, in Piatt county, Illinois. In 1882 it was determined that a number of persons favorable to the restoration principles lived in the vicinity of this village. John K. Warren offered to donate to them a lot for the erection of a meetinghouse if they would organize a congregation and Orlando Powers agreed to give them an adjoining lot on the same condition. A preliminary meeting was held in October and a sufficient amount of interest was manifested so that John Love was instructed to write up a church covenant which would be signed by all who desired to become charter members. On November 25, 1882, they convened and eighty-four persons signed the following “Declaration of Faith.”

We hereby covenant together that the congregation composed of the undersigned unite themselves together in one body as true Christian worshipers, to be known only as ‘The Church of Christ,’ agreeing before God and with one another to take the word of God as our only rule of faith, practice and discipline, repudiating all human creeds; announcing the belief that anything practiced for church duty, not taught in the word of God is idolatrous, hence is sinful, and that we will not give such things our aid but try to prevent others from embracing them; and further promising to honor and obey the officers selected and appointed for the church.

At this meeting three trustees were elected and a certificate of organization was drawn up by George S. Morris, the secretary of the meeting. This certificate was notarized on December 7 and the following day was filed in the office of the recorder of Piatt county. On February 9, 1883, John R. Howell was sent to secure the deed to the lot from John K. Warren. He was accompanied by one of the trustees, Anderson Wacaser. When Warren asked how the deed should be made out, Howell told him just to make it to "the trustees of the Christian Church." This was the way most of the members and the community spoke of it. Later, during the trial in court, Howell testified on cross-examination as follows:

If I had known when I told Warren to write the deed that the local name was Church of Christ, I suppose I would have told him to write it Church of Christ. I didn't know at the time that I told Warren how to write the deed that the local name adopted by the church was the Church of Christ. I didn't know it had more than the name of Christian Church. I don't know; I might have known, too, they are called the Church of Christ

In 1899 a small group of dissenters in the community, knowing that the last of the original trustees, John Love, had died July 24, 1897, met in a hall a few blocks from the meetinghouse and elected three of their number as "trustees of the Christian Church in Hammond Illinois." Learning of this move, the members of the Church of Christ met on July 5, declared the office of trustee vacant and proceeded to elect successors to the original trustees. The three men elected at the hall served notice on the congregation that they were entitled to the property and demanded access to it for their use in worship. They declared that if it was not surrendered voluntarily they would enter it in any event. On New Year's Day in 1900 the trustees of the congregation changed all the locks and fastenings on the doors in order to protect the property against forceable entry. On August 23, 1901, the congregation was served notice that a suit for ejectment had been brought in the name of the Christian Church of Hammond, Illinois, "to obtain possession of said lots and the house of worship erected thereon."

The case was heard in the Circuit Court of Piatt county before the Hon. W. G. Cochran as presiding judge. It was affirmed by the complainants that the property was deeded to the Christian Church, that it was unlawfully occupied by the Church of Christ which was an organization composed of those who had seceded from the Christian Church on August 14, 1889, with the adoption of the "address and declaration" at Sand Creek, Illinois. An appeal was taken by the Church of Christ and because of the nature of the case the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois reviewed the case in the fall term. Their decision was handed down on December 18, 1901. The opinion of the court was read by Mr. Chief Justice Wilkins. It reversed the decision of Judge Cochran and vested ownership of the property in the possessors.

Our concern in the ruling of the Illinois Supreme Court lies chiefly in the findings with reference to the name of the church and the decision regarding the Sand Creek Address. Despite a personal interest in the science of jurisprudence I cannot become involved just now with merely legal aspects of these trials. We are studying the rise and growth of the factional spirit and its effect on the restoration movement. It will be necessary to resist the temptation to explore legal pathways in order to keep to the task at hand. Although "the trustees of the Christian Church" sought to make a play on names (much as the Church of Christ does now) their attorneys had to make certain admissions, noted by the Supreme Court.

Counsel for the appellee say that it is clearly established by the evidence that the original society formed in Hammond was known and recognized by several different names or titles. It was called 'Church of Christ,' 'Disciples of Christ,' and the 'Christian Church,' and these terms were identical in meaning, and used to designate persons of the same religious belief who were members of the same religious denomination.

Acting upon this information and concession, the Supreme Court opinion held, "But certainly it cannot be said the congregation worshipping in the church at Hammond under the legally organized name of 'The Church of Christ' has withdrawn or seceded from the Christian Church." For the information of our readers we furnish herewith their finding with reference to the Sand Creek Address since it was to play a vital part in future litigation.

We do not think the 'Address and Declaration' introduced in evidence by the defendant, made at Sand Creek, Shelby County, August 14, 1889, can have any legal bearing upon the title to the property in suit. At most, that declaration shows that those who made it differed from other members of the church which they claimed to represent, as to proper methods and practice, in the church government and modes of conducting religious worship . . . They differ, if at all, in their views as to what is the true interpretation of the teaching of the Bible or word of God.

Members of the judiciary knew from experience the difference between a law and its interpretation.

The Sand Creek Case

The excitement over the Hammond case had hardly died away when another of much greater magnitude arose to further intensify the feeling on both sides. This one involved the congregation at Sand Creek and because of the location it became a focal point in a do-or-die struggle of the "Progressives." Before the trial was over preachers had been subpoenaed from far and near. The case in circuit court occupied two full weeks and the evidence fills 1635 pages. Practically all of the legal talent in the area was retained by one side or the other. Technically, the case was an attempt to secure possession of a brick-building erected at a cost of thirteen hundred dollars; in reality it became a gripping battle between two philosophies to gain public favor and legal approbation. Those who brought the suit soon became mere pawns. Their original intent was forgotten even by themselves as a bevy of "experts" sought to establish "the orthodox position" which was to distinguish the "true church."

The wise and able jurists who composed the Supreme Court saw through the smoke screen created by the counsel for both sides and in the final opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Hand pointed out the divergent philosophies involved. They designated 1849 as one crucial point and 1889 as another. The first marks the year of the inauguration of the missionary society; the second the year of the reading of the Sand Creek Address. They also note the partisan use of the terms "Christian Church" and "Church of Christ." We cannot desist from sharing their opinion with our readers even as we apologize for the length of the quotation which comprises one paragraph of the decision. We feel that you will do well to read it in full. We could occupy scores of pages in discussion of its implications.

The several church organizations formed by the followers of Alexander Campbell— and they are numerous— at the time of their organization were, and now are, purely congregational in their government; that is, there is no general conference, synod, presbytery or other similar body which exercises supervision over said church congregations, but each organization, in matters of practice, in church government and otherwise, is sovereign, and the congregations so organized have no creed except the Bible, the view of the followers of said Alexander Campbell being, that where the Bible speaks the congregation and its several members are authorized to speak, but where it is silent the congregation and the members thereof should also remain silent. In 1849 there sprang up among the members of said religious sect different views upon subjects of practice to be adopted by the congregations with reference to matters upon which the Bible is silent, one view being, that in the matters upon which the Bible is silent such silence should be construed as a positive prohibition; the other view being, that if the Bible is silent upon a given subject pertaining to church government then the congregation may formulate a rule in that particular for the government of the congregation. The diversion along the lines above suggested seems to have grown as the church membership increased, and in 1889 there was a wide difference of views between the several congregations, and between the members of the same congregation, relative to many practices in the church, such as to the propriety of having instrumental music in the church services; the employment by the congregation of ministers of the gospel for a fixed time and for a fixed salary; the organization of missionary societies and Sunday Schools as separate organizations outside the regular church congregations; the raising of funds for the support of the gospel by holding church fairs and festivals, and perhaps in other matters of a similar character; and in that year, at the annual August meeting held at Sand Creek church, and where there was present a large concourse of people drawn together from different congregations, Rev. Daniel Summer, a follower of Alexander Campbell, preached a sermon upon what was characterized as innovations upon the practices of the church, and afterwards a declaration, known as the "Sand Creek Declaration," was presented to the brethren present for their endorsement. That declaration condemned many, if not all, of the practices above referred to. It was signed by a few, only, of those who were present, and it was not considered binding upon any member of the church or upon any congregation unless signed by the member or adopted by the church congregation, but was considered merely advisory to the members of the church. The division heretofore referred to, from that time forward seems to have spread, and at the time this suit was commenced the evidence shows the followers of Alexander Campbell had divided upon those lines to such an extent that one faction in the church was characterized as progressive and the other conservatives, the members favoring the more liberal view being called "Progressive," while those entertaining the more conservative view were called "Antis." The persons entertaining the progressive view appear latterly to have usually favored and taken in their church congregation the name "Christian Church," while those favoring the conservative view have taken the name "Church of Christ" as the name of their church organizations.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow," and great court cases grow from minor incidents. None of the issues referred to in the Supreme Court decision had anything to do with instigation of the original suit. In 1903 the membership roster at Sand Creek contained 130 names. There were three elders. It had been the custom of the congregation to hold singing schools periodically and to make the instruction available to all, paying the teacher from the general fund. In November 1903, a man by the name of McCoy asked permission to hold a singing school in the meetinghouse. He proposed to finance it by touring the community and signing up scholars on a subscription basis. He announced that he would start the class on a certain Wednesday night.

On the Lord's Day prior to this the elders placed the matter before the congregation. Several urged that it was an inopportune time for a singing school because it was the corn husking season. Two members spoke against having it at the time because they had been summoned as jurors in the fall term of court. No one favored the project openly so the elders announced that no singing school would be held but that the class might be conducted on the following Wednesday night. Instructions were given for any who attended to see that no subscription paper was circulated. When McCoy came for the first session one of the elders informed him that the congregation had decided against having a singing school at the time. He ignored this and announced another class for Thursday night.

The following day McCoy and two members drove about the neighborhood and solicited names. They met another elder who informed them again of the decision of the congregation. On Thursday night McCoy sought to appeal to the trustees of the congregation for use of the building but these decided that they would respect the decision of the congregation. It was on this occasion that one of the chief instigators of the legal suit said they had no intention of tearing down the house or of carrying off the seats and that the church property was deeded to the Christian Church and he had the deed in his house. The singing class was transferred to the schoolhouse, but at a public meeting the spokesman referred to denounced the elders for their decision and stated that since the age of miracles ceased there were no elders and neither the elders nor the congregation had any authority over him.

In February, 1904, this man ceased to attend and after the elders had visited him at length to urge his return with no success, public announcement of excommunication was made. Some twenty-seven others then ceased to attend and began meeting at the schoolhouse. A few days later two of these waited upon the trustees and asked for use of the meetinghouse half the time. They stated that they represented "The Christian Church of Sand Creek." On July 7, 1904 the group posted public notices calling for a meeting to be held on July 16, for the purpose of electing trustees and other officers and to adopt the corporate name contained in the deed to the property made by James Turrentine. At the meeting they adopted the name "The Christian Church of Sand Creek,” and filed a certificate of organization in the Recorder’s Office.

Following this a suit was brought in circuit court. In their Bill in Equity the complainants referred to the bishops as men who “claim to be Elders in some sort of a religious organization called by them ‘the Church of Christ’” and charged that they “pretend they have the title to and exclusive use of the same (property) and fraudulently and wrongfully withhold the same from the Christian Church of Sand Creek.” It was affirmed that the “said so-called Church of Christ and the defendants named herein, claim to base their said action upon certain things that were done at a meeting held at orator’s said meetinghouse sometime in 1889, at which meeting some over-righteous malcontents made a public declaration of what they believed, and undertook to define what your orators and others ought to believe and how they ought to worship.”

The testimony shows that none of the complainants had ever previously indicated any favorable inclination toward the various “innovations” and some of them had actually made extreme statements in opposition thereto. But now, in an attempt to make it appear that there was a difference between the “Church of Christ” and “Christian Church” all of the points of difference were espoused and declared to be “the doctrines, customs, practice and beliefs” of the church. This made it possible to import preachers who qualified as “experts” in these various areas of interpretation. Motivated by a desire to gain the victory each party placed its best men on the stand and the legal contest was prolonged as skillful attorneys sought to use them to win a point for one side or the other.

“The Christian Church at Sand Creek” had two serious disadvantages. All of its expert witnesses affirmed the autonomy of the local congregation, and under examination stated that in cases of disagreement, the wish of the majority should be accepted and respected by the minority. Since there were but thirty who had seceded and about one-hundred who remained, and since none of the elders or deacons had defected, their legal cause was helpless from the outset. It appeared that the main point to be gained was an attempt to destroy the effectiveness of the “Sand Creek Declaration,” and to brand “The Church of Christ” with “acting in an unneighborly, unmanly and bigoted manner, with no fairness,” as stated in the original bill.

In the light of subsequent history there are some interesting facets of the complaint. One charge made by “The Christian Church” was “that Sommer professed to take the Bible and the Bible alone, but instead of that he would receive a member that had been baptized in the Methodist Church without further baptism, that he would receive a member of the Baptist Church that didn’t believe that baptism was essential.” Clearly this was before some of “The Churches of Christ” had adopted the re-baptism theory which crystallized them into a sect, and before some of “The Christian Churches” adopted the practice of open membership which denies the necessity of immersion as admission to fellowship. Time brings great changes!

The Court Decisions

The Hon. Samuel L. Dwight, Judge of the Circuit Court of Shelby County, Illinois, prefaced his decision with the statement, “This case, although not involving a large amount in dollars and cents, is, in some respects, one of importance and one in which a large number of persons seem to be deeply interested.” He commended the attorneys for their great learning and research in behalf of their clients, the members of the two parties for their conduct and citizenship, the witnesses for their religious fervor. He wrote:

The taking of the evidence, consuming as it did nearly two weeks, unfolded the history of the Christian Church— a splendid organization coming into existence perhaps a century ago, avoiding tiresome creeds and looking alone to the Bible as a guide to faith and practice.

He said, “That church has grown and spread throughout the Union and its faith and teachings find a response in the hearts of people everywhere. This church was the only religious body, I believe, to have a headquarters upon the grounds of the World’s Fair at St. Louis.”

His finding was in behalf of “The Church of Christ at Sand Creek.” The case was then appealed to the Supreme Court of Illinois. We have already quoted at length from the decision of the members of that court as read by Mr. Justice Hand. That decision pointed out that even though “the great majority of the church congregations which are professed followers of Alexander Campbell have adopted in practice the innovations from the practice of which defendants in error held aloof” this would not affect the status of the Sand Creek congregation because each congregation is sovereign “in all matters pertaining to church government— that is, each congregation has the right to determine for itself what its practices in the manner of conducting the worship of God in the congregation and its church business shall be, so long as such practices are not in conflict with the positive commands of the Bible.” The Supreme court upheld the decision of the circuit court.

Personal Comments

It is my conviction, after research into the history of the restoration movement, that the cleavage came because of a decay of love and the rise of a factional spirit. I know our fathers were faced with serious problems. They were called upon to exercise their human judgment. They chose division as their instrument to preserve doctrinal purity among the disciples of our Lord. In doing so, they kindled the schismatic attitude. The fruits of this mistaken philosophy are everywhere manifest in the manifold divisions which plague their children today. I renounce the traditional philosophy embodied in "The Sand Creek Declaration" which is one of "brotherhood based upon conformity." It has been destructive of peace and inimical to our welfare. Those who continue in it can never become "agents of reconciliation."

No group of men, regardless of sincerity or righteousness, has the right to come together and declare that others who have been born into God's family shall "no longer be regarded as brethren." This is discipline based on ex familia, out of the family, and it is not within human jurisdiction or prerogative. It substitutes "the wisdom of men" for "the power of God." It is unscriptural and antiscritptural. It removes the salt from the body and the leaven from the lump. It is based on fear and defeatism. It is the foundation of exclusivism and monasticism. Its outworkings can be seen in the narrow concept of the factional groups which have been nourished on it. Unless it is rejected as a basis of spiritual life it will breed other divisive offspring in the future which will be sustained by the pap flowing from factional breasts, until we shall be divided out of existence.

I am opposed to every foreign element introduced into the government and worship of the ekklesia of God but I shall make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. We must repudiate and reject the whole concept of trying to unite the children of God by dividing them. Brotherhood is based on fatherhood, fraternity is based upon paternity— and I must recognize as brethren all of His children. I am sick and tired of the bitter wrangling and jarring of the party spirit. I cannot answer the prayer of Jesus for oneness by the advocacy of division. The traditional attitude of our various fragments and splinters is mere modern Church-of-Christ-ism and as sectarian in nature as most other "isms." If this be treason make the most of it!

Many of my brethren have inherited another spirit, that of innovationism. Under the guise of freedom that has been passed down to them they know no restraints except their own wishes. In a mad scramble for worldly success and recognition they have been tempted to scrap the exhortations to holiness and to wink at sin. If some of us have been touched with the taint of exclusivism, these have been cursed with the blight of “inclusivism,” the philosophy that anything that pleases us must also please God. The word of God is not the real authority at all but the desires of the half-converted cult of the unconcerned ones whose wishes have to be catered to in order to keep them appeased. The exclusivists will allow no one to go with them who does not agree in every particular; the inclusivists agree that anything goes and are not particular!

If we cannot achieve unity by refusing to embrace our brethren in the Lord, neither can we promote peace by embracing those things which are not in the Word. Is it not time for a soul-searching, a re-study of the revealed will, a real return to the spirit and power of the primitive ekklesia? How much longer shall we perpetuate the bitter feuds of yesterday and the unspirituality of our own day? Would it not be better to live on crusts and wear rags with a clear conscience than to dine on “kingly fare” and be banished by the King over there? Let us have a real restoration of the restoration spirit. Let it begin here! Let it begin now!

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide;

In the strife of Truth with Falsehood;

for the good or evil side;

Some great Cause, God’s new Messiah offering each the bloom or blight,

Parts the goats upon the left hand and the sheep upon the right, And the choice goes by forever 'twixt that darkness and that light.

Adventures in Religion (5)

Mission Messenger (March 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The very word “adventure” has a touch of glamor about it. We think of risk and daring when we hear it. There is nothing staid or commonplace in its implications. It is unfortunate that we seldom think of it in connection with the religion of Christ. That religion has lost something in its modern watered down version. It has been reduced to a routine of meeting attendance and this is carried out from a sense of duty or because of fear of divine reprisal. Actually the brand of “Christianity” with which we are familiar has little relationship to the kind of life which was characteristic of Jesus and the primitive saints. It has lost much of its verve and most of its vision.

We have been conditioned to a life of security and safety. Our bank deposits are guaranteed by an insurance corporation. Old age has its social security and pensions. We are sheltered and protected against the storms of life. Every aspect of existence has its safeguards. Religion is no exception. The result is that it has lost its appeal to the fearless and brave. It tends to become primarily the resort of the very young or the very old—the adolescent and the aged. But the “Christianity” we see manifested is no more like the original article than a stroll through the meadow is like climbing the Matterhorn. The very fact that men have diluted and weakened it is proof that they cannot tackle the responsibility involved in its powerful demands.

We hear a great many sermons dealing with the quiet life, and advocating a serene and placid disposition. These have led us to think that Christianity is a rocking-chair existence. We conjure up visions of saints as retired persons sitting in the shade, reading the Bible and conversing with mutual friends about matters of general concern. This is not the picture which the Bible paints. As God reveals it, the believer is a man of action impelled by an inner compulsion that allows no time for rest. He is pictured as a boxer, not in training but in combat. He is not beating the air or punching a bag, he is fighting for his life and willing to die to obtain it!

He is depicted as a soldier, not on leave or furlough, but engaged in deadly warfare. God's word knows nothing about a soldier in civilian dress, but clad in the full panoply of armor with sword unsheathed and pressing the battle against an implacable foe. The Christian is engaged in a race. He is not sitting in the grandstand but is down on the course, running, straining, gasping, sweating, reaching toward the prize. We have become a nation of spectators. The many loll at ease to watch the few fight for victory. Thousands fill the stands to see a handful of persons battle it out on the playing field. This philosophy has invaded the field of religion and our contributions become the price of admission to watch professionals perform.

We need to recapture the sense of personal adventure in the religion of Jesus. We should cease to make safety a fetish or security god. Faith is not a sure thing, it is a risk. It is a leap in the dark but with full confidence that His hands will be there to catch us and bear us up. Anyone who flies in a jet-powered plane six miles above the surface of the earth is taking a risk but not nearly so great a risk as if he were borne into space on an eagle's wings. "But they who wait for the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings like eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint" (Isa. 40:31). We have too many who are grounded by fright, bounded by caution and hounded by fear.

Jesus did not teach men to “play it safe.” He taught them to live dangerously. He implied that it was better to risk and lose than to keep through fear. Do you remember the man with one talent? “I was afraid and I went and hid your talent.” This man expected to be commended for his prudence and discretion. Instead he was addressed as a “wicked and slothful servant.” This seems strong language to apply to one who sought to safeguard another’s property. But it is better to lose through use than to fail through fear. One is wicked when he seeks to “hold his own” when what he owns should not be held. He is slothful when he hides in the ground that which should be in circulation. Non-use is abuse! The master said, “You ought to have invested my money.” When one invests he takes a chance. The one-talent individual pleaded the nature of the master as his excuse but the parable implies that it is that very thing which should prompt one to put what he has to work. The servant was faithful who “went and did;” that one was worthless who “went and hid.”

The New English Bible renders Matthew 16:25, “Whoever cares for his own safety is lost; but if a man will let himself be lost for my sake, he will find his true self.” Men leave home to seek for gold, uranium or diamonds. When they find that for which they are looking a dream comes true. Yet it is a fact that the actual finding is often an anti-climax. It is the anticipation, the searching without knowing what the next minute will produce that is the real adventure. Not so with the man who finds his “true self.” Life really begins when this happens. Millions are doomed to plod their weary way through earthly existence and never make this discovery.

Our lives are “bound by shallows and by miseries” as Shakespeare puts it, because we are afraid to risk everything. We are frightened by what our relatives will say or what the neighbors will think. We fetter and shackle ourselves by rigid conformity. Life becomes a drudgery and a bore. We want to “stay in good” with all of the brethren and we are resigned to insipid mediocrity to do so. “Whoever cares for his own safety is lost.” There are great causes to challenge thinking. There are great crusades which need conducting. There are abuses that need correcting. Those who take up the cross will be ridiculed, reviled and derided. But the heart will beat faster with the spirit of real adventure and when it seems that all has been lost all will be gained. This is the way of the cross!

There is a difference in being at cross purposes with those around you and having the cross purpose for your life. Too many have a martyr complex. These are not killed, they simply commit suicide. They do not lose their lives, they merely take them. They cannot find themselves because they look too close to home. They get in their own way. Note that it is not the man who merely invests his life who will gain. There are thousands who commit their lives to the church and the religious way of existence. You can check their names on the record, you can see them sitting in the pews every Lord’s Day, you can behold their punctilious observance of all the ordinances as given. They will tell you that through habit “the church has become a part of our lives.” That is the trouble— life is partitioned off in little well-defined cubicles. There isn’t anything adventurous about such protected and well-regulated little procedures as they indulge.

Life must be lost for his sake and not undertaken for our own benefit. I tend to be a little skeptical of those who do their duty merely because they are afraid not to. Surely there is little zest about such an existence. One may put in the time when he ought to be throwing in his life. We tend to think of religion as an adventure when it is carried out by missionaries in a reeking jungle compound or in a foreign city with strange tongue and customs. But it is sometimes easier to meet a challenge across the ocean than to meet one across the street. One whose conscience troubles him about race prejudice can more easily go to Africa and preach to the blacks than he can go to the slums and teach a Bible class of Negroes in his own city. There is a difference in losing your life for his sake and running from it for your own sake. It is better to lose your life running into something than to desert it by running from something!

We do not really lose our lives when we shut ourselves off from the rest of struggling humanity, we just lose our purpose for living. The medieval monks had their monasteries, we moderns have our factions. They both serve the same purpose. They keep the salt in the shaker, the leaven in the jar and the seed in the bag. Those who shut themselves in monasteries did not quit living, they just quit and went on living. Many of us have done the same thing. We need to restore the element of risk and adventure to Christianity. One reason the devil did not dare tackle too many of the early Christians was because they were daredevils. When he threatened to tie them to the stake and burn them they did not quail because “they were fit to be tied.” We’ve lost that fitness, and more than anything else in these days we need to recapture it! When we stake all on Jesus we’ve nothing to lose at any other stake!

The Two Spirits

Mission Messenger (March 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

One who surveys the appalling wreckage of the Christian ekklesia, as wrought by the sectarian attitude, cannot help but be astounded and to wonder within his heart how such frightful disintegration could occur. Even among the heirs of the Restoration movement the fabric of brotherhood has been rent and torn with such violence that in many metropolitan areas there will be more than a dozen different splinter groups, each proclaiming that it is “the faithful church” and refusing to have any spiritual intercourse or relationship with others. Those who visit another faction are treated as pagans and unbelievers and are granted no recognition whatsoever.

It is not enough to designate such behavior as childish and immature. True, the apostle says of those who were in such a state, “I had to deal with you on the merely natural plane, as infants in Christ” (1 Cor. 3:1). But there is a reason why grown men act like babies and until that cause is discovered and eliminated we will only perpetuate and intensify our present condition. The actions of infants result from instruction and imitation. When big people act little they but reflect the training and conditioning they have received. All of us are products of our past.

Our outward demonstration of factionalism is but a manifestation of the spirit which motivates us. It is useless to try to change our practices until we change the tenant who dwells in our hearts. The actions we behold are only reflections of that occupant. Our divisions are fruits of the party spirit. Love and peace are fruits of the Holy Spirit (Gal. 5:22). You cannot eliminate sectarianism as long as the sectarian spirit prevails. You cannot maintain division when the Holy Spirit triumphs. For that reason the apostle does not dismiss the schismatic attitude as a mere temper tantrum of spiritually retarded children. He says, "I could not speak to you as I should speak to people who have the Spirit. I had to deal with you on the merely natural plane, as infants in Christ."

"People who have the Spirit" just do not divide and sever themselves into parties. If this is not the implication of the passage I confess that I know nothing of true interpretative procedures. If this is correct, then we need to begin our reconstruction program by recapturing the importance of the indwelling Spirit. It is at this point we have failed. Our factions are but external symptoms of an internal disorder. We are victims of our own philosophy. That philosophy was not so much derived from the scriptures as it was contrived to meet what we regarded as abuses in the sectarian world. In our attempt to avoid and overthrow sectarianism we have been betrayed into becoming sectarian.

Because some placed emphasis upon having a spiritual experience we ridiculed the idea of any personal encounter with God. Because some stressed the emotional aspect to the neglecting of the rational, we stressed the rational to the utter abolition of the emotional. We became a people of keen minds and cold hearts. While others abused the Spirit, we misused the Word and made the fearful mistake of substituting a legalistic formula, forgetting that the new covenant is a "covenant expressed not in a written document, but in a spiritual bond; for the written law condemns to death, but the Spirit gives life" (2 Cor. 3:6).

Like all who trust in legalism we even searched through the scriptures, confusing gospel and doctrine, and marked out our own little distinctive trail. Every man in pursuit of salvation was forced to follow this track like a human bloodhound, sniffing his way from passage to passage, and passing over the intervening terrain without bark or backward glance. As a result we manufactured a sort of kitchen stepladder approach to God's grace. You can see this exhibited in a thousand sermon outlines and designated the "steps to salvation." This expression nowhere occurs within the word of God although it is a favorite one of those who profess to "speak where the Bible speaks." A person who searches the scriptures for himself and takes all of "the steps" but not in the same order does not land in "salvation" but in error and from this state he must be rescued by being immersed over again by a "Church of Christ preacher"— whatever that is! It is somewhat as if Paul had insisted that every person who came to Christ would have to go first toward Damascus.

In our congregations are many who have been convinced of the propriety of "water baptism" who have never been committed to the Christ-life at all. They trust in a name over the door of the meetinghouse or in their conformity to a rite. We do not derogate either of these when we point out that the basis of our hope is our relationship to the Father through the Spirit. This is the reason why the congregations are filled with persons who partake of the Lord's Supper on the first day of the week and partake of worldliness the other six days. It accounts for the action of many who never forget to watch their favorite television program and never remember to study their Bibles. It helps to understand why men will rush from the meetinghouse with the final "Amen" to light up a cigarette and burn the lung-searing incense to the great god Nicotine, spending more for the tobacco they puff into the air than for the support of proclaiming the word to the lost.

There is grave danger in placing our trust in a thing, a proposition, a precept or an institution even if these are divinely created. There is always the possibility of professing one thing and practicing another. When the apostle sought to encourage the Christians at Corinth to overcome the lust of the flesh he did not make his appeal to the fact that they were “members of The Church of Christ” in Corinth. Instead, he asked, “Do you not know that your body is a shrine of the indwelling Spirit, and the Spirit is God’s gift to you?” (1 Cor. 6:19).

In our attempts to line out the sectarians in our sermons we have become sectarian and entangled in our sermon outlines. So legalistic have many become that to them the written word is identified with the Spirit. One man, patting the copy of the testament in his coat pocket said, “I’ve got the Holy Spirit right here in my pocket.” But the book in his pocket said the Spirit should be in the heart.

Peter did not say, “Repent and be baptized, everyone of you in name of Jesus Christ, for the forgiveness of sins, and you will receive a copy of the new testament.” The Holy Spirit cannot be the word of God for it is distinctly affirmed of the penitent on Pentecost that those who gladly received the word were baptized. We receive the word in order to be immersed into Christ and the Holy Spirit because we were.

Man’s heart was not made to be a vacuum. There is actually no such thing as an empty heart although that which fills many hearts is of little value. Man cannot remain at a standstill and still stand as a man. He must be impelled from within. If he is not motivated by the Holy Spirit he will be a slave of the flesh and one of the works of the flesh is the party spirit. God designed that this should be “the age of the Spirit” but men have defied his will by following “the spirit of the age.” They have become conformed to this world instead of being transformed through the Word. We are at home in the world. We are no longer pilgrims but patrons; not foreigners but homesteaders in reverse. The world has staked out its claim in us.

Although we enlisted to fight the world, the flesh and the devil, we have long since ceased to fight either and have turned our weapons against each other. We have split ourselves into segments and fractured ourselves into fragments, and have bathed our weapons in the blood of our brethren. Like savages who dance with fiendish glee about the bodies of their victims before devouring them, we have become spiritual cannibals, biting and devouring one another while forgetting the predicted consequences for such procedure. We have hailed as heroes those who could fling their verbal tomahawks and cleave the skulls of brethren who dared to differ, we have justified dissension and glorified debate.

The secret of unity is the temple image. If we can emphasize and enforce this in our thinking we will repair our present breaches and preclude all future breaks. If we are the temple of God then to destroy that temple is to do injury to ourselves and to invoke the wrath of God. One should no more be inclined to break up the dwelling-place of the Father than he would to chop down the house of his earthly parent. It is a tragedy that, while a man who burns down an earthly abode is arrested as an arsonist, one who inflames the house of God is decorated as a party hero. "Surely you know that you are God's temple, where the Spirit of God dwells. Anyone who destroys God's temple will himself be destroyed by God, because the temple of God is holy and that temple you are."

The reason the temple concept is so important to unity is that it contemplates the structure not as a finished product at all, but as a constantly growing one. The stones that are added to it daily are living, and as all living things, are subject to change, alteration and amendment. The church of God is timeless and ageless. It is flexible enough to receive and incorporate within itself men of varied attainments, abilities, social standing and gifts. Its unity is not that of conformity but of diversity. It does not incorporate within itself liberals and conservatives as such any more than it does Jews or Gentiles. It receives men— all men who are born again— and welds them together by a bond which transcends all national patriotism or rational proclivities.

The temple of God will alter in its external aspects from generation to generation as living stones are quarried from various cultures and civilizations. God does not demand that we forsake our abilities and forget our aptitudes. He only requires that we channel them into a higher and nobler realm of service than the worship of self-interest. The cement of love is elastic, not hardened. It holds us together by the power of the Spirit and not by the spirit of power. It is at the divine center where no change is ever made. The foundation does not grow. It is only those planted upon it who develop. The cornerstone is the same yesterday, today and forever. “In him the whole building is bonded together and grows into a holy temple in the Lord. In him you too are being built with all the rest into a spiritual dwelling for God.” “In him . . . in the Lord” all growth and building takes place.

Ponder the significance of the terms “bonded together in him” and “grows into a temple.” Here are passages which need to be explored because in them may lie the hope of our future peace. If we can remain in him while growing together, if we can tolerate and respect each other while the growth process is taking place, tomorrow will be brighter than today. Our today is the result of our thinking yesterday. We have thought ourselves into division. Can we think our way into unity?

And we must not overlook the expression “you are being built with all the rest.” Who is included in “all the rest.” You do not know and I do not. Only the divine architect can tell. “The Lord knoweth them that are His.” But whoever they are they are a part of that spiritual building in which God dwells. And as “a shrine of the Holy Spirit” I am being built “with all the rest” into a “habitation of God through the Spirit.” God be thanked!

Factional Flames

Mission Messenger (April 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

All such that are guilty of teaching, or allowing and practicing the many innovations and corruptions to which we have referred, that after being admonished, and having had sufficient time for reflection, if they do not turn away from such abominations, that we can not and will not regard them as brethren.

This statement in the “Sand Creek Address and Declaration” read in August, 1889, was an act of “formal division” according to one of its chief proponents. It was written to “draw a line of demarkation between the churches of Christ and our innovating brethren.” Endorsed by Daniel Sommer in the north and by David Lipscomb in the south, this became the orthodox position of the restoration protestants. It has now become sanctified by three-quarters of a century of practice and is generally regarded as the will of God. Its repeated application has shattered the restoration movement into numerous rival and antagonistic factions. In spite of its evil fruits of strife and division it is offended by most parties with such zeal that one who dares to challenge it is regarded as a heretic.

It is “with malice toward none and charity toward all” that we deny the philosophy of separation from brethren is God’s program for his children. We grew up in a narrow factional environment, nourished on the theological milk drawn from the breasts of such a partisan alma mater. We regarded that faction as the church of God. For it, and it alone, God spent four thousand years preparing the world of mankind. For it only did our Lord endure the cruel reproaches of men and die upon the cross. Its members were the saints of God to the exclusion of all others. They were the “loyal brethren” and all others on earth were unfaithful and apostate. The bounds of the kingdom of heaven reached no farther than “our brotherhood.” The one body comprised those congregations only which listened to “faithful preachers” and rejected all others as “false teachers.”

I have a deep compassion for all of my brethren who are fettered and chained by such concepts. I know the surging and tugging of the spirit to be free. I know the inner revulsion of heart against the inconsistency involved in calling upon one to pray whose life is a disgrace, while treating with cool disdain a visitor from another faction whose behavior is saintly but who is outside the pale, treated as a heathen and publican, because he does not concur with our interpretation. I know the sickening feeling when doubt creeps into an honest mind and one begins to question how long he can continue to wink at partisan shortcomings and sins while condemning others wholesale “because they walk not with us.” I now realize that this whole fabric of behavior is not of God at all. It is merely the implementation of human judgment reached by men under stress. He who opposes it does not oppose the will of God. That will can never be done on earth as it is in heaven until we mature enough to reject this human philosophy which has cursed us with division and will eventually damn us unless we triumph over it through the Spirit.

Certainly differences among brethren must be faced! The problems which arise must be met. We cannot become “human ostriches” and thrust our heads into the sand, ignoring those things which threaten us. We do not castigate our brethren for dealing with troublesome issues in 1889. There were innovations which appeared to them as being destructive of the faith. No doubt our fathers did the best they could at the time and under the circumstances. We are in poor position to chastise them for adopting the procedure they did, seeing that we personally practiced it for years without question.

Now that we do question it we have no desire to reflect upon them. We must walk in the light available unto us and the increasing knowledge of truth demands that we adjust our lives accordingly. It does not require that we condemn those who exercised their best judgment under darker skies. No human decision must ever become so sacred that it dare not be reviewed. No human conclusion must ever be so hallowed that it cannot be re-examined. We propose to set forth very humbly our estimation of the nature and results of that philosophy of brotherhood which has become basic Church-of-Christ-ism in our day.

1. The "Sand Creek Address" was a formal statement of what was believed to be a solution to the problem of innovationism. It was a human expedient devised as an emergency measure when other means were considered failures. One of its defenders said, "We have from the first agitation of this subject been numbered with those who earnestly endeavored to find some other solution of the problem than a formal separation." This same writer designated it as containing "the sentiments of the brethren who assembled at Sand Creek, in Shelby county, Illinois, on August 17, 1889."

2. After being adopted, however, it soon became the criterion for measuring the faithfulness of men. Those who cut across all factional lines and respected brotherhood regardless of innovations were looked at askance and were soon driven out as disloyal. By establishing "separation" as the official means of opposing error, two parties were automatically created. After this one could no longer protest against innovations as a non-partisan. He had to "line up" or he would be "lined out." Thus it came to pass that it was not opposition to error but partisan alliance which became the test of loyalty.

3. The word of God condemns separation from brethren as a means of implementing the divine will. It is regarded as a symptom of sensuality. “These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit” (Jude 19). Separation is the resort of the immature and the carnal (1 Cor. 3:1-3). Division among the children of God is a sin, a work of the flesh.

4. The philosophy of separation is based upon a false premise, that in any direct encounter between truth and error, truth must inevitably succumb and suffer defeat. It is promoted by an unreasonable and unreasoning fear that we cannot preserve what we have gained without constructing a human wall about it. This is essentially the foundation of all creedalism and monasticism. It renders impossible the doing of God’s will on earth as it is in heaven, because it removes the salt from the mass, the leaven from the lump and the light from the pathway.

5. The “Sand Creek Address” usurped divine prerogatives and transferred them to fallible men. Only the Father has a right to determine whom we shall “regard as brethren.” Brotherhood is not the result of partisan agreement but of the new birth. Fraternity is based upon paternity, not conformity. The purpose of the decision was to set at nought certain brethren. Granted that these brethren were wrong in attitude and in error in their thinking, yet we are forbidden to retaliate. God will adjust many things at the judgment seat which we have no power to correct here. “But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ” (Rom. 14:10).

6. It is apparent from history that the arbitrary decision to dissolve brotherhood was made with a view to justifying use of the civil courts in property suits. The scriptures are plain on this matter. “I speak to your shame . . . brother goeth to law with brother.” The apostle further declares, “Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you; because ye go to law with one another.” By adopting a position which made it possible to no longer regard as brothers those who differed, court cases were inaugurated all over the country. This was one of the most shameful periods in the history of the restoration movement. To see those who preach unity so divided they cannot even adjudicate their own disputes is a tragedy beyond description.

7. Any theory or system which embodies division among the believers as a necessary part of its constitution must be both unscriptural and anti-scriptural. The doctrine of defense by disunity, of preservation by separation, or of faithfulness by fission, is unknown to the divine revelation given to the members of the one body. God does not demand unity of the believers in one passage and sanction their fragmentation in another. We do not reject the truth of heaven when we refuse to subscribe to this philosophy. It can only breed factionalism and strife.

Recounting Results

It is no pleasure to review the effects of the factional philosophy but the faithful historian cannot ignore them. As we catalog the conditions which were created we will be able to see the fruits of a negative approach. By such an unbiased evaluation we will be in a position to make correction of our attitudes.

1. Since it was the organization of the missionary society which first gave rise to the charge of innovationism many of those who opposed it actually came to exhibit but little interest in proclamation of the gospel to other nations. The faction in which I grew up shrugged off any concern for those in the rest of the world with the oft-repeated phrase, “There are plenty of heathen at our back door without going to other parts of the earth.” Not only did we not encourage men to go to the regions beyond with the good news but we refused to send to any who went forth from other factions. While there are some of the non-instrument groups which have greatly stepped up the tempo of their foreign preaching program, there are many factions which never contribute a cent per year to the proclamation of the word on foreign soil. Many of those who are sent out go to take their divisive and partisan feuds to other nations of the earth and thus spread the sickening blight of American factionalism.

2. The philosophy of separation produced an unfortunate and spiritually unhealthful attitude toward the sacred scriptures. These came to be regarded as a repository of partisan material, an arsenal of factional weapons produced especially to bombard dissident brethren in other splinter parties. Passages were warped, twisted and wrested to justify practices to which they had no relation. Those who have read with unbiased minds the conflicts over instrumental music, bible classes, individual cups, etc., know how party champions both pro and con, have distorted and contorted the revelation of heaven to win a point. As a sense of brotherhood disappeared and those who disagreed were branded as apostates, sectarians or false teachers, nothing was deemed unfair in dealing with them.

3. Inconsistency of the most aggravated type characterized all of the factions. This is ever the case when legalism supplants love of truth and when the letter rather than the spirit becomes the canon of approval. Men who passed the partisan test of fellowship were labeled as “sound in the faith” although their lives were often a disgrace to their profession. Consecrated and godly men from other segments of the disciple brotherhood were treated with coldness and indifference when they visited another faction. They were even deemed unworthy of directing a prayer to heaven. Because they did not belong to “the loyal brotherhood” they were ignored with disdain by those who were inferior in both behavior and scholarship. Thus each faction became “inbred” in thought and faithfulness to God was equated with ability to parrot the party line and to repeat the errors and fallacies in interpretation which had been woven into a spotted pattern of orthodoxy.

4. On the ground of witnessing by withdrawing “The Church of Christ” developed a monastic exclusivism which crystallized it into a narrow and rigid sect. In the faction with which I was identified there was but one “loyal paper.” When the editors of this party organ, as we saw it, defected and “compromised” we held a mass meeting and gave our support to another editor. I can recall when the only literature actually sanctioned in the home consisted of books and tracts produced by members of our own religious clan. Since scholarship was rather limited the variety was not too great. Among us were some who would read nothing else for fear of being defiled. It was not uncommon to hear one say, “I’ve got my Bible and that’s enough for me.” Gradually each faction became blighted by ignorance and intolerance, knowing only the arguments used (or misused) to sustain the party position. It has been an interesting phenomenon to observe partisan champions referring “learnedly” to foreign languages, the implications of which they did not understand, while unable to speak English well or to read it in such a manner as to convey its intended meaning.

As a whole “The Church of Christ” recognizing no brotherhood beyond its parochial limitations has contributed very little to the universal current of religious thought. Its seminaries have concentrated on producing a factional clergy steeped in pedantry. The administrators of these fountains of knowledge have had one eye focused on the Bible and the other cocked at that particular “brotherhood” from which they drew their support. Motivated by fear they have stifled every teacher who was a non-conformist. It became a “kiss of death” for any student to write home that a professor was advocating an idea or interpretation which did not fit the traditional pattern.

The products of these schools, growing up in such an insular environment, have been incapable of furthering the original purpose of the restoration movement which was “a project to unite the Christians in all the sects.” They have had no contact with the flock of God scattered over the sectarian hills. Frequently they do not even know the members of other factions of the movement living in the same city. Thus they have built up confined and illiberal parties in which real freedom to think, speak and act, no longer exists. Although Jesus intended that there should be one community within whose borders men might dwell in harmony despite divergent opinions, the philosophy of separation created a multiplicity of regimented circles in which intolerance is counted a virtue and forbearance is reckoned as a sin.

Multiplying Divisions

With the adoption of the philosophy of family fragmentation to perpetuate purity of doctrine “the decline and fall” of the restoration movement was hastened. After the first cleavage in the fabric of brotherhood the seed was planted which would result in deterioration and decay. The first enemies of the primitive community of saints were from without. Jewish zealots for the law resorted to the naked sword to “make havoc of the church.” It remained for the heirs of the restoration movement to turn “the sword of the Spirit” against their own brothers and wreak havoc once more to this great effort to bring peace to the divided domain of Christendom.

Even while the courts were deliberating on the Sand Creek suit, Daniel Sommer was preparing for an attack on what he called the “New Digressives.” With the inception of David Lipscomb College, the incentive to launch such schools was furnished and one was started at Odessa, Missouri. In February, 1907, Daniel Sommer and B. F. Rhodes met in public discussion at Odessa, and later at Hale, Missouri. In his sixth speech at Odessa, Brother Sommer declared, “My friends, you will find that every argument that he can use in favor of this institution can be used in favor of man-made missionary societies, and every other man-made institution for the purpose of advocating religion.” This position committed Brother Sommer to “no longer regard as brethren” those who endorsed such schools.

In 1908, he began a written discussion with J. N. Armstrong, then president of Western Bible and Literary College at Odessa, and later to become president of Harding College. Not once did Sommer refer to Armstrong as brother although Armstrong repeatedly addressed Sommer as such. After one essay in which Bro. Sommer assailed Bro. Rhodes as “an unfaithful witness, a reckless asserter, and a bold bluffer,” and Bro. Armstrong and others as “bold and blatant, disrespectful and untruthful, in their attempts to defend the colleges that I oppose, and to besmirch me because I oppose them,” his opponent wrote:

I know that my respondent and a very few other preachers are so blinded by their party spirit that they would be willing to rend asunder the body of my blessed Redeemer over the matter. Indeed they have advocated the ‘making of it an issue’ before this unkind speech of Brother Sommer’s. Thanks be to God the brethren love the peace of God’s children more than they do partyism. Should I meet a church that would not ‘employ’ a preacher simply because he opposes this school I would call it sinful discrimination of God’s children. I have never felt the least alienated from any brother in Christ because he opposes the school work. I have condemned the dogmatic, ‘pitch-fork’ style in which the opposition has been waged for I deplore it. It is no way to show a man his error by making a desperate effort to convince the world he is as mean as an infidel, that he is desperately wicked, that he is beyond all redemption.

Again, on page 265 of the printed account of the discussion, brother Armstrong alludes to Brother Sommer’s disregard of him as brother in these words:

Why will Brother Sommer trifle with this serious question by trying to turn this discussion into a wrangle over English construction? Doesn't he want union, peace, good feeling and love, among brethren? Does he really want to stir up ill-feeling, strife, envy, jealousy and division? Is he trying to feed the spirit of party and prejudice? Is he ignoring the earnest entreaty of the Holy Spirit to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace? What have I done that Brother Sommer manifests such bitter feelings toward me? True, I married Harding's daughter but why should his anathemas against Harding reach unto me? Before he ever saw me and knew but little of me he ceased to call me 'brother.' Is his bitterness against Harding so deep that he disfellowships those related to him?

The attitude of Brother Sommer in the matter of "brotherhood" is summed up in a statement recorded on pages 299 and 300 of the book:

About six years ago I began, with much reluctance, to oppose a certain class of colleges, for they had been projected by men whom I supposed were my brethren. But I have tested six of them, and have proven them to be reckless in regard to truth, on the College Question, and slanderers of me personally. As a result I cannot regard them as my brethren, and do not so designate them except through force of habit in form of expression. My opponent, on the other hand, has professed to regard me as a 'brother' but likened me to a cowardly 'dog' in his 3rd essay, and to a 'bull dog' in his 19th. Between these extremes he has been guilty of much vituperation and scurrility, toward me personally. In connection with this I mention again his almost incessant misrepresentation of me and the position I occupy. In view of all this I solemnly state that I question whether the sun has ever shined upon a greater burlesque on education than when such men as I have referred to arose and offered themselves to the Churches of Christ as educators of their children . . . I appeal likewise to all of my brethren to unite with me in daily prayer that God will save his churches from all their enemies, and especially their college enemies.

Members of certain segments of the non-instrument wing of the restoration movement are inclined to castigate Brother Sommer for his attitude toward them and their institutions. This comes with poor grace in view of the fact that his attitude was the natural consequence of the separationist philosophy adopted some years before and which is still the orthodox position of those who opposed Brother Sommer. Actually he was allowing them to taste their own gruel. They “disregarded as brethren” those who endorsed “innovations.” When another innovation was introduced Brother Sommer consistently applied the official policy and refused to “regard them as brethren.” It was the philosophy which needed to be blamed, not Brother Sommer. But many in “The Church of Christ” rejected Brother Sommer and retained the philosophy and have since split themselves into smithereens!

Brother Armstrong’s opinion about those who composed “the brotherhood” proved to be too optimistic. It was not long until those who endorsed the schools referred to their opposers as “Sommerites” and were in turn designated as “collegeites.” The two parties grew farther apart and prejudice was aroused by articles which inflamed passions. Soon there was little recognition of brotherly feeling and the factional attitude prevailed in the hearts of those on both sides. Often this was intensified by sectional feeling. In the non-instrument segment of the restoration movement brotherhood was now determined by an attitude toward religio-secular schools.

This was merely the beginning of sorrows. As congregations began to mature every alteration in method and procedure brought strife and alienation. Local congregations were thrown into furore when baptisteries were installed in meetinghouses for convenience in immersing. There were those who contended that “the pattern” was for baptizing in streams.

Fortunately, an overt break on a wider scale was averted, and the disciple brotherhood escaped the fate of the Mennonite movement, one segment of which is known as “River Amish.” (For the benefit of those who are interested in historic backgrounds it is interesting to note that the American Mennonite movement suffered from division over the same things that divided our restoration movement, and often in the very same period. This is interesting because their background is primarily German and Dutch, whereas ours was Scotch and Irish).

In the early days of the restoration movement the members marched forward each Sunday to lay their financial contributions on the table. This tradition based on a misconception of the words, “lay by him in store,” became so ingrained that when some congregations decided to pass a plate to receive the gifts, strenuous objections were raised on the ground that this was “aping the sects.” In some instances members quit attending, in others there were those who ignored the plate and marched to the table after the service to deposit their contribution in stately but solitary dignity.

Other matters, however, actually invoked the severance policy and the age of factionalism came into full flower in all of its shameful consequences in the first part of our century. Division occurred over “the order of worship” when certain ones dogmatically affirmed that Acts 2:42 contained the sequence in which “the items of worship” must be observed to be acceptable unto God. The doctrine of the autonomy of the local church was flouted as it always is by the factional spirit. Congregations which did not follow “the pattern” as to “the order” were branded as disloyal, in turn those who insisted upon it as “the only scriptural way” were designated as hobbyists. The visiting preachers resorted to insinuation and innuendo and kindled the flames of partisanship.

When certain congregations began to have classes on

Lord's Day for the purpose of Bible study and teaching, a hue and cry was raised which has not yet subsided. An open rupture occurred and the faithfulness of men to the Lord Jesus Christ began to be tested by their personal views regarding a method of instruction. Zealots on both sides pressed their ideas and opinions both by oral proclamation and through the press until membership in the family of God began to be measured, not by the new birth but by an attitude toward Bible classes. Both sides diligently searched the scriptures with a fine tooth comb to find justification for their partisan procedures. One group found sanction for their system in every mention of the word "teach" while the other used the same passages for condemnation. It was not the word of God, nor even the interpretation of it, which caused the division, but rather the philosophy of "preservation by separation" which was adopted in 1889. J. N. Armstrong saw this and said in the debate with Brother Sommer in 1908:

The very spirit which my respondent manifests to such a marked degree is stirring up strife in the house of God over many matters. Even in the Octographic Review family itself there is at present urgent need of peacemakers. Division is threatened and brethren are being set at naught. If the factions forming persist in the effort now making, peace will be destroyed. Brother Denney believes that it is wrong for the church to separate into classes on the Lord's Day to teach the Bible. A host of disciples stand with him. The brethren who oppose this practice believe brother Sommer is not abiding in the word of the Lord, and brother Denney evidently thinks that if brother Sommer persists he (Sommer) should be withdrawn from. This spirit is the crop from the seed brother Sommer and others of the Octographic Review have been sowing for years. They are but reaping what they have sown. I do not doubt that there are whole-hearted Christians on both sides of the question of dividing into classes. Here is a time for forbearance, long-suffering, and patience, on the part of all while, in brotherly love, a deep, earnest search for truth is being made.

I am confident that both Brother Sommer and Brother Denney were sincere in their approach to the class question. Both thought they were doing the will of the Lord. Both thought they were “speaking where the Bible speaks and remaining silent where the Bible is silent.” But they were victims of a human decision which had been reached in an attempt to deal with the first “innovations” introduced into the disciple brotherhood. I was nurtured on the philosophy embodied in that decision. I grew up to regard all who worship where instrumental music was used as sectarians. I looked upon all who opposed classes as hobbyists, or “antis.” I sustained exactly the same relationship to these latter as those who used the instrument sustained to me. If I regarded either group as brethren it was with grave mental reservation. They were spiritual “half-brothers” or “step-brothers.”

There is one aspect of our factional state which I wish to mention. I found it easier to be charitable toward those who opposed classes than toward those who endorsed the use of the instrument. In an honest attempt to comprehend and evaluate this feeling I have come to the conclusion that we resent those who have what we oppose more than we do those who oppose what we have because of a psychological quirk. Those who use the instrument regard us as “antis” while we regard as “antis” those who oppose classes. As so used the word “anti” has certain connotations and overtones of inferiority. I think we regarded those who opposed classes with a sort of patronizing air. They were objects of compassion because they could not distinguish between things that differ. But this very association of the word “anti” made us resent its application to us by those who used the instrument since by our own definition we assumed that they regarded us as a little bit queer.

It should be pointed out that there is a difference between a person being anti-instrument with regard to the corporate worship and an “Anti” as the term is often employed. The first relates to a man who holds a personal conviction as to the use of instrumental music; the second to one who is a member of an anti-instrument party. The same distinction should be made with reference to a position on Bible colleges or any other controversial subject. The man who belongs to a party, or faction, makes the thing a test of fellowship. He conditions brotherhood and family relationship upon an attitude toward that thing. He no longer regards as brethren those who do not concur with his views.

I owe an apology to both those who use instrumental music and to those who oppose Bible classes. In truth, I owe the same apology to those in every other faction than the one in which I grew up. I have not altered my views as to either instrumental music or Bible classes but I have certainly amended my thinking on fellowship and brotherhood. I am saddened and ashamed by my previous littleness and intolerance. I now realize that in our present divided state no faction of the disciple brotherhood is "the loyal church" nor is the restoration movement the church of God. There are some in all of our parties who are as faithful as they know how to be. There are others in all of them who are a disgrace to our profession. I propose to love all of God's children as my brethren, to move among them all as they will permit and when I can do so without giving them offence. I shall discuss with them our differences as brethren and not aliens!

Our formation of parties or factions around various sides of controversial issues is sinful and wrong. Division among brethren is condemned of God. One does not violate the will of God when he rejects division in the spiritual family as a means of furthering God's purpose. Recognition of brotherhood and not rejection of it is our only hope of correcting the ills among us so we may get on with the task of "uniting the Christians in all sects." Our present state has not been produced by following God's word but by implementing the philosophy which produced the initial cleavage. And it will not be enough to go back to a certain stage since we adopted the policy and recognize as our brethren those who have since divided. We must go all the way back and reject the philosophy as such. Then we can restore brotherhood and in that frame of reference examine anew the differences which created our difficulties.

All of our parties exist as fruit of the party spirit. They will continue to exist only so long as that spirit prevails. When love for God and His children is enthroned in our hearts the party spirit must “fold its tent like the Arabs, and as silently steal away.” Our history is one of tragedy and bitterness, of sorrow and division. It can become one of glorious conquest. We can once more join the stream of religious thought from which we have been isolated and insulated. We can bring to bear upon the whole scope of Christendom these truths we have learned as did the Campbells, Stone, and others of their day. The world of sectism can again be made to reel and totter under the impact of a plea for unity and restoration. But the force of that plea will be nullified and neutralized so long as we preach unity and practice division.

Perhaps the saddest day for the restoration movement came when certain ones began to advocate re-baptism of those previously immersed as a requisite to fellowship. Although there are at least nine “designs” of baptism, or blessings accruing from it, set forth in the new covenant scriptures, these arbitrarily fixed upon one and made it their creedal test for the validity of baptism. By demanding that the believer know in advance that his baptism was for this specific “design” they substituted knowledge of a result for faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as the determining factor. In one fell swoop they sought to un-Christianize many of the sheep of God scattered over the sectarian hills. This partisan attempt to stake a factional claim on baptism was unknown to the pioneers of the restoration movement. It was valiantly resisted by David Lipscomb and others when it began to be advocated, but the third generation of restoration heirs had become so crystallized in their party spirit that they confused “The Church of Christ” with the church of God.

This doctrine has so affected the judgment of some that they will not even accept into congregational membership those who come from another segment of the restoration movement unless they submit to re-baptism. It is not an unheard of thing to see an article in some journals arguing that “Christian Church baptism” is not valid. The inference is that “Church of Christ baptism” (whatever that is) is valid. Nothing else that has ever happened has contributed more toward making “The Church of Christ” an insular twentieth century sect than the general adoption of the false premise involved in the dogma of re-baptism. It stems from a complete misconception of the nature of the ekklesia of God. Until that fallacy in reasoning is removed we will never recapture the significance of the statement by Thomas Campbell in the “Declaration and Address” that, “The Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one.” Until we grasp the meaning of that sentence we will simply devote our labors toward constitution of another sect in an already cruelly divided world.

Even as Daniel Sommer and J. N. Armstrong were debating the question of colleges in Missouri, in 1908, the spirit of factionalism was being kindled in other parts of the nation. Brethren were being alienated, congregations were being rent asunder, tempers were flaring and passions were surging. Brother Armstrong remarked about this fact in these words:

Again I say, the spirit manifested by my respondent in this debate will make splinters of the Church of God. Think of the divisions in the state of Texas alone, and be wise. There are brethren there who endorse our school work but agree with brother Denney in the contention among the Octographic Review readers; so brother Denney and these Texas brethren could be one at this point, but could destroy one another on the school question. Texas brethren are setting at nought one another on many questions. Brother Rice is building up a sect over ‘the order of worship,’ then, there is the rebaptism question over which so much strife has been caused, and so many brethren set at nought. There is actually church property in Texas with a restrictive clause in the deed concerning 'sect baptism.' Now, brother Sommer and I agree on the rebaptism question, the classification of children, the order of worship, etc., but he disfellowships me on the school question. There are half a dozen, or more, petty sects in Texas alone, yet they are absolutely one on the great principle that a 'thus saith the Lord' is necessary to establish any religious practice. They are misunderstanding woefully what Christ has said on these subjects.

In the mad surge of factionalism the voices of moderation were drowned out. Those who pleaded for unity despite divergent opinions were branded as compromisers. They were ridiculed as being "soft." Love for the party was substituted for love for mankind. Division became the accepted mode of resolving every difficulty. It was defended and glorified as the will of God. "Gospel meetings" became the excuse for bitter partisan attacks. The advent of radio made it possible for factional orators to dispense their propaganda on a wider scale. The body of Christ was hacked and chopped to pieces under the guise of loyalty to its Head. Humble followers of the Master who could not conscientiously acquiesce in every partisan interpretation were denounced and placed under anathema by those whose moral life could not compare with theirs. The restoration movement, harassed and hagridden, became the most divided of any religious group on the American scene. The philosophy of separation and exclusivism had burst out in full bloom. The seed planted years before had produced a deadly Upas tree.

Now, after many years the axe is being laid at the root of the factional tree. Perhaps there has not been a brighter prospect in more than a century. The problems we face are still many and great. The spirit of division is entrenched deeply in the hearts of some of those whom we love. Doubt, suspicion, and hatred rear their ugly, snaky heads like modern Gorgons. But there is in the hearts of many a yearning for closer ties. There is a recognition of our common origin and a sense of our mutual need of each other. The plea for oneness is heard in the land. In our next issue we will present our reasons for lifting up our heads in hope. We urge you to read “The Decline of Factionalism” because it will strengthen your determination to press the crusade for fellowship and brotherhood among the members of all of our dissident groups. Until next month may the Prince of peace bless you greatly!

Adventures in Religion (6)

Mission Messenger (April 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

There is a constant temptation in our modern culture to identify ourselves with Jesus in word while ignoring his demands upon our lives. It is a matter of personal honor to be regarded as a Christian. In respectable circles of society it is a card of admission. It is a good recommendation when you seek a position as a junior executive. It has come to pass that being a Christian is no more of an adventure than being a minor stockholder in Bethlehem Steel or the Carey Salt Company. A Christian is no more expected to change the world than a holder of one share is expected to change the policy of these corporations. Both are expected to acknowledge the head of the firm and do nothing but conform.

Unfortunately for this philosophy, acknowledgment of the head of the community of saints entails a life of non-conformity to the world. We cannot really recognize his lordship without assuming our own responsibility to change and transform the environment in which we live. Any person who attempts this embarks upon the high seas of adventure. He will become a prophet without honor in his own city. He may be stigmatized and ostracized by the unthinking ones whose hearts he tries to fire with the real message of God. "It is always the same— you never fail to resist the Holy Spirit! Just as your fathers did, so you are doing now. Can you name a single prophet whom your fathers did not persecute?" (Acts 7:51, 52). Those to whom this was addressed proved the validity of the accusation. They stoned to death the one who asked the question. We live in a profit-taking and not a prophet-making society! Our norm is deadly to the spirit. We address Jesus as Lord but serve things as our gods. Thus we are absorbed and assimilated by the culture around us. We talk about adjustment to life and by this we mean adapting ourselves to the standards of the world. We are afraid of being conspicuous by being different. Our witness is stultified, our hopes are crucified, and we become resigned to helpless mediocrity. There is no longer anything heroic about what we call Christianity.

Jesus recognized the temptation to conform and asked, "What is the point of calling me, 'Lord, Lord,' without doing what I tell you to do?" This implies that there really is no point to much of what passes for Christianity in these days. Those who subscribe to it are quick to acknowledge Jesus as Lord but the idea that they should actually adopt the implications of his way of life is remote from their thinking. The "churches" are geared and managed so the spirit is not free. If one should attempt to eat with publicans and sinners he would be treated exactly as was the Master during his personal sojourn on earth. Every day must have been one of genuine adventure to Jesus. It was also one fraught with constant danger.

Our lives are too shallow. It is easier to set up a pre-fabricated structure on the sand than to build a permanent home. The whole world around us is one vast sub-division consisting of pre-fabs and a man who goes in for solid construction is regarded as "an odd ball." If one chooses a course in college which will enable him to serve the needs of humanity instead of to secure a lucrative position, if he reads and studies diligently even to the neglect of the big football game of the season he is a "square." If he expresses a deep conviction in Bible class on the Lord's Day which cuts across the preacher's thinking he is a dangerous influence and will have to be warned. Because of this, religion has become a monotonous and tedious performance. We must recapture the spirit of adventure or die because we have lost the sense of adventure of the spirit.

Here is the way Jesus puts it. “Let me show you what the man who comes to me, hears what I have to say, and puts it into practice, is really like. He is like a man building a house, who dug down to rock bottom and laid the foundation of his house upon it. Then when the flood came and the flood water swept down upon that house, it could not shift because it was properly built.” Note that the test of a properly built house is not its external attractiveness but its ability to withstand times of crisis. The strength is derived not from the superstructure but from the foundation. Before a man can build upward he must first dig downward. If he does not do this any structure he erects will be superficial.

What is “rock bottom”? How do you know when you have dug deep enough? The rock bottom life is one that involves three things— coming to Jesus, hearing His words and putting them into practice. When one adopts as his philosophy one of total commitment to Jesus, when he resolves to reproduce the life of Jesus on earth to the fullest extent subject only to his human limitation that person has hit “rock bottom.” He is then ready to start building. After that, every stone he lays will bring him nearer heaven. What are some of the involvements of the rock bottom way of life?

1. A universal love for mankind, based not upon reciprocity, but upon love for love’s sake. The world cannot be changed by love of force but by the force of love. We must inaugurate a reign of love in our hearts with all men as subjects. “For if you love only those who love you, what credit is that to you? Even tax collectors do that!”

2. An association with men based not upon their agreement with us but upon their need for compassion and understanding. An actual cultivation of those who are outside our group. “And if you exchange greetings only with your own circle, are you doing anything exceptional? Even the pagans do that much.”

3. A renunciation of the rule of gold in behalf of the Golden Rule. This will enable you to disprove the cynical proverb that “Every man has his price.” No one can give his loyalty to some things and be loyal to the creator of all things. It is wrong to worship the creature instead of the Creator; it is impossible to serve them both. “No one can be loyal to two masters; . . . You cannot serve God and the power of money at the same time.”

4. A substitution of forgiveness of failures for a failure to forgive. This is not the same as ignoring failures or merely overlooking them. It requires a recognition of the failures and an understanding of those who have failed and it is not the same as pretending that no failure exists. “For if you forgive other people their failures, your Heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you will not forgive other people, neither will your Heavenly Father forgive you your failures.”

5. A proper sense of values leading to a life free from concern about the merely physical and sensual aspects of existence. The pagans in the days of Jesus were always thinking about things to eat, drink or wear. The neo-pagans of our own day exhibit the same characteristics. Over against these is the wholly committed life. “Set your heart on his kingdom and his goodness, and all these things will come to you as a matter of course.”

Only a house built upon an unshakeable rock will not be shaken or rocked by storm and wind. It costs too much to build cheaply. No house can be better than him who lives in it for “every house is builded by some man.” We build for this age only when we build on the sand, that which is to endure for the ages must be built on the Rock of Ages. Shifting sands and drifting lives will not stand against wild waters and sweeping storms. Take heed how you build!

This Is Life Eternal

Mission Messenger (April 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The Christian religion is perfectly adapted to the needs of man as he is. As man is a creation of the Word of God, so the religion he requires is a revelation of the word of God. It is not a discovery made by man but an uncovering of the thoughts of God for man. It is not so much the result of man's search for God as it is a revelation of God seeking for man. While man is in the flesh he exists in three time dimensions— past, present and future. He lives in the past by memory and in the future through expectation. This exalts him above the animal creation and demonstrates his rationality. It also emphasizes his need of religion.

The Revised Standard Version has the psalmist saying, "What is man that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man that thou dost care for him? Yet thou hast made him little less than God" (Psalm 8:4, 5). This is correct. The word here rendered "God" is elohim, the same as found in Genesis 1:1, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." One who is "little less than God" must be a responsible being and thus ever aware of shortcomings and frailties in the flesh. At the same time, he must revolt against the thought of the utter termination of his existence and the extinction of his personality. Crushed between the sins and failures of yesterday and the dread of death tomorrow, he has no present. He is here in the flesh but his mental self, the real being, is elsewhere, existing in one of the other dimensions. Man is said to be depressed when he is compressed or crushed between two weights. The guilt of the past creates anxiety and the fear of the future produces anxiety. Caught between these he becomes a helpless victim with the walls closing in upon him. As the present shrinks and he dwells more and more in the past or future, both of which are now unreal, he eventually withdraws from all reality. He then has no real existence except the physical and even this is affected and impaired in his morbid state. The whole purpose of Christianity is to enable man to recapture the present, for only the present is life.

It is true that Jesus Christ is said to be “the same yesterday, and today, and forever,” but that is accommodative language. There is no past or future for that which is uncreated and eternal. The purpose of the Christian revelation is to make man more like God, to fit him for fellowship with the divine, and this requires making man ever conscious of the present. When Moses watched the flock of Jethro in the wilderness about Horeb, and his mind reverted to the circumstances of his exile and contemplated the possibilities of freeing his people from slavery, his reveries were disturbed by the voice of God. But before God could arrest his attention he had to arouse him from the distractions of the past and future.

The record of the event is very enlightening. The angel appeared in a flame of fire in the midst of a bush. First, Moses looked, then began talking to himself, “I will turn aside and see this great sight.” “When God saw that he turned aside to see, God called to him out of the bush, ‘Moses, Moses!’” Moses replied, “Here I am.” God then instructed him to go to the slaves and say, “I AM has sent me to you.” When a man can truly speak to God and say “Here I am” then the I AM will be there. God can never be “I Was” or “I Will Be” for Deity has no past or future tense.

If man is to have fellowship with God and with the Son he must recapture a sense of the present, that is, he must experience eternal life. He must be freed from the burden of guilt in the past and from his fear of death in the future. It was to accomplish precisely this state that Jesus was manifested to the apostles who heard him, saw him and handled him. “The life was made manifest, and we saw it, and testify to it, and proclaim to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us . . . so that you may have fellowship with us; and our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ” (1 John 1:2, 3). It is ridiculous to talk about eternal life being merely a future prospect, for there is no such thing as living in the future. When the future arrives it is the present. If a man does not have eternal life in the present he will not have it in the future. “And this is the testimony, that God gave us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has life; he who has not the Son has not life. I write this to you to believe in the name of the Son of God, that you may know that you have eternal life” (1 John 5:11-13).

One who has the Son has life for the simple reason that he has recaptured his present through Christ. Guilt and anxiety shrink our horizons to nothingness and the world closes in upon us. Our guilt is simply our past “open and laid bare to the eyes of him with whom we have to do” (Heb. 4:13). It becomes a complex because we are able to do but are unable to undo. Our problem is that we have not the power to regard the past as past, we project it into the present. We cannot simply stop and start over because every time we start we are stopped by thought of our past.

Only God can remedy this and he does so by making us a new creation in which the past actually passes. “Therefore, if any one is in Christ, he is a new creation, the old has passed away, behold, the new has come” (2 Cor. 5:17). Note that the new is present, not future. It is not something “to come” but a state that “has come.” It is present. But, can we forget our past, so long as we can think? It is not necessary that it be forgotten by us but that we have a consciousness it has been forgiven by Him. The sense of guilt stems not so much from the act committed as from the fact that it is unremitted.

Jesus took our past by assuming our guilt. “For your sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21). Paul recalled that he “formerly blasphemed and persecuted and insulted” Jesus (1 Tim. 1:13) but he could say, “Forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal” (Phil. 3:13). The reason is clear. “I received mercy because I acted ignorantly in unbelief, and the grace of our Lord overflowed for me with the faith and love that are in Christ Jesus . . . but I received mercy for this reason, that in me, as the foremost, Jesus Christ might display his perfect patience for an example to those who were to believe in him for eternal life” (1 Tim. 1:13, 14, 16).

Just as Jesus took our past upon himself by being made sin, so he removed our anxiety for the future by becoming our hope (1 Tim. 1:1). This he accomplished by devitalizing death. “Since therefore the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise took part of the same nature, that through death he might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong bondage” (Heb. 2:14, 15). It is an incongruity to think of a son of God being frightened by death. Only the sons of men have such fears. So the Son of God became the Son of man that the sons of men might become the sons of God. Through him we are “more than conquerors.”

The cross of Christ removed our fear of the past, the open tomb our fear of the future. The grave is not the end but the beginning of a richer experience. A Christian does not leave home at death; he goes home. So Jesus can say, “Therefore do not be anxious about tomorrow, for tomorrow will be anxious for itself” (Matt. 6:34). The world no longer closes in upon us but opens up before us. Our horizons are pushed back behind and before us so that there is no setting sun “and night shall be no more” (Rev. 22:5). “Forgetting the past” and “having no anxiety for tomorrow” we live in the divine present as well as in the divine presence, and we live in the first because of the last.

The pressures of the world are still there. They are all about us but they are rendered helpless by a superior force within us. “Greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world.” The reason is given by Jesus, “In the world you have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world” (John 16:33). It is true that we are in the world but it is also true that we are in Christ and he is in us. So long as we are in him the world cannot overcome us; so long as he is in us we can overcome the world. We are protected because we are in him; we are powerful because he is in us.

“We know that we ourselves are children of God and we also know that the world around us is in the power of the evil one. We know too that the Son of God has actually come to this world, and has shown us the way to know the one who is true. We know that our real life is in the true one, in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the real God and this is real, eternal life” (1 John 5:19, 20).

Decline of Factionalism

Mission Messenger (May 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It seems to us that a knowledge of Ezekiel 34 is a must to every member of the fellowship of the concerned. This is especially true if their concern leads them to conclude that the answer to the problem of division lies in a restoration of the spirit of the primitive community of the saints. In this chapter, filled with pastoral imagery, the people of God are regarded, not as a unified whole but as a scattered flock. Two reasons are assigned for their dispersion. One is the selfish indifference of their shepherds, the other the cruel arrogance of some members of the flock toward others.

The shepherds are accused of feeding themselves at the expense of the flock. They refused to strengthen the weak, heal the sick, bind up the crippled, bring back the strays or seek for the lost. They were charged with ruling with force and harshness. There is a significant statement, "So they were scattered, because there was no shepherd." It seems contradictory to condemn shepherds while at the same time declaring there was no shepherd. In verse 8 occurs this statement, "Since there was no shepherd, and because my shepherds have not searched for my sheep, . . ." It must be remembered that shepherding is a function and one who does not tend the flock is really not a shepherd. However, there are those who assume the title without accepting the responsibility. They regard themselves as shepherds because of position, God disregards them because of their disposition. Instead of such shepherds guarding the flock, the flock must be protected from the shepherds. “Thus says the Lord God, Behold, I am against the shepherds; and I will rescue my sheep from their mouths, that they be not food for them.”

The entire blame for the scattered condition does not rest upon the shepherds. It is necessary for God to judge between sheep and sheep (verse 17). There are those who regard God’s pasture as a private possession and they resent the intrusion of others where they have staked their exclusive claims. In defence of their assumed rights they are callous and brutal toward the weaker ones who are driven off. “I myself will judge between the fat sheep and the lean sheep. Because you push with side and shoulder, and thrust at all the weak with your horns, till you have scattered them abroad, I will save my flock . . . I will judge between sheep and sheep” (verses 20-22).

Not all who drive others away are cruel and harsh. Some are merely unconcerned about their needs. So long as they are filled they do not care what happens to those who follow. They are indicted because they feed on the good pasture, then trample the remainder into a muck; they drink the clear water at the springs, then foul the rest with their feet. The spiritual world has frequently become one of defiled and corrupted spiritual food and drink, obnoxious to the hungry and thirsty sheep.

The prophet was not pessimistic about the ultimate result. It was the will of God that the flock be united. He heard the voice of God saying, “I myself will search for my sheep . . . I will rescue them from all places where they have been scattered on a day of clouds and thick darkness . . . I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David and he shall feed them . . . I will make them a covenant of peace . . . I will send down the showers in their seasons; they shall be showers of blessing . . . And they shall know that I, the Lord their God, am with them and that they are my people.” The purpose of God will not always be thwarted. This is the hope of the saints.

The condition which existed in fleshly Israel is today duplicated in spiritual Israel. God's people are now scattered over all the face of the earth. They wander over every sectarian hill and every denominational mountain. Helpless and forlorn, many of them become a prey to evil influences. They have passed through "a day of clouds and thick darkness." Many, viewing their plight and distress, look upon their condition as hopeless. They conclude that the sheep are so entangled in the wilderness they can never be extricated and are doomed to continue in their divided state until they are consumed by fate. Actually this is a symptom of unbelief which ignores certain undeniable facts.

The Unifying Cross

1. In the days of old, God called his people back from Babylon and restored them to their own land as a unified whole. He pointed out that this was not for their sake or because they deserved it but to vindicate his holy name (Ezek. 36:21). We must realize that the Christian way has been profaned among the heathen once more because of our Babylonian captivity and God will not allow his purpose to fail on the earth.

2. The power of the cross is sufficient to unite the people of God. By it we were reconciled when we were enemies of God. Certainly we can be brought together now that we are the friends of God. The reason for our sectarian division is not that the cross has failed, but we have failed the cross. We have sought unity by conformity instead of community, by organization instead of by personal reformation and consecration. We have not planted the cross as a rallying standard but we have planted churches made after our own image and likeness, and then designated them as the body of Christ. The cross is not so much an emblem of death as an encouragement to life—the life of the Son of God. That life embodied in ours will draw us closer to one another. “For if while we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, now that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life” (Romans 5:10).

3. God has already demonstrated a power to unify divergent elements much more widely separated than those which today profess faith in Jesus Christ. The Jews and Gentiles were filled with animosity toward each other. They regarded each other as dogs. They did not recognize the same God. “But now in Christ Jesus you who once were far off have been brought near in the blood of Christ. For he is our peace, who has made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility” (Ephesians 2:13, 14). If the barrier existing between Jew and Gentile could be dissolved through the blood of Jesus there is no existing hostility between us which cannot be terminated.

4. Jesus would not pray for an impossible condition. On the very night before his betrayal, Jesus prayed for the unity of all who believe in him through the testimony of the apostles. He asked for this unity to become a reality for two reasons: first, that the world would know that God had sent him; secondly, that the same world would know that God loved the believers as he loved Jesus. This implied that the purpose of God as related to Jesus and the disciples can never be fully exhibited to the world until the believers are a unit. The world will never accept the testimony of the divine Sonship from a divided church, neither will it recognize the divine love for the ransomed ones until they constitute a redemptive fellowship. This state is to be accomplished by recognition and acceptance of a divine gift—the glory of God. “The glory which thou hast given me I have given to them, that they may be one even as we are one. I in them and thou in me, that they may become perfectly one, so that the world may know that thou hast sent me and hast loved them even as thou hast loved me” (John 17:22, 23).

We have been seeking for unity through means which make it impossible of attainment. We have sought to bring it about by coercion, compulsion, dogmatism and debate. We have been trying to envision it while we had a veil of partisanship over our faces. It is not to be achieved except by that attitude of humility which makes us see clearly the real glory of the Lord. In other words we cannot have the unity of the Spirit until we have the spirit of unity. This can only be produced in us as we are personally transformed by the Spirit. “And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit” (2 Cor. 3:18).

5. Many of us bear in our own hearts the living testimony that the factional spirit can be changed and crucified. God can do for others what he has done for us. Some who were once bitter and contentious can now share in love and bestow it. The spirit of brotherhood pervading the heart can prompt us to yearn and seek for a greater fellowship in Jesus. “He who did not spare his own Son but gave him up for us all, will he not also give us all things with him?” (Rom. 8:32).

Our skepticism about attaining unto unity is an indication of human weakness. Because we cannot see how this will be done we conclude that it cannot be done. Because we doubt that it can be done we oppose any attempt to bring it about. Our unbelief makes us victims of the cynical spirit. The apostles were once confronted by a man who brought his demon-possessed son to be healed. Apparently they tried their customary formula of exorcism with no success. Jesus walked into the crowd, and seeing their predicament, rebuked the evil spirit. “And the demon came out of him, and the boy was cured instantly” (Matthew 17:18). The disciples privately asked why they could not cast the demon out and Jesus informed them, “Because of your little faith.” Simply because the evil party spirit appears too strong for us is no indication that it is too great for God.

The fact that the Holy Spirit is working mightily in the hearts of men in this very generation, leading toward unity and oneness, is amply evident to every one who sees with unveiled face. The signs are evident and manifest to the interested observer. We are standing at the threshold of a new day. Obviously many do not see this because their eyes are closed. Thoreau wrote, "Only that day dawns to which we are awake." Some may ask why this is any more the case now than in the past. The answer is simple. We have been made ready by circumstances and events for this day. Certain factors have combined to prepare us as instruments of the spirit to achieve the divine purpose. Let us list a few of those things which contribute to this state or condition. These are by no means all of the factors and they may not be the most important but they are worthy of consideration because they serve to explain the altered attitude which makes us "vessels fit for use by the Master."

The Crumbling Walls

1. A sense of shame because of our involvement in the divided state of the believers. Many of us no longer regard any faction as the church of God. We do not try to defend separation as the divine means of securing unity. We recognize that division is a sin and the party spirit a work of the flesh. We do not attempt to justify our previous attitudes. We deplore them. This position makes us akin with all of the real thinkers and leaders in all of the splinter parties in the world today. One who is apologetic for division among God's people shows how dated is his reasoning.

An American theologian has written, "Disunity in the name of Christ is a scandal and a shame." The Methodist Church in Australia includes in its prayer the statement, "Forgive, O Lord, the hypocrisy of the Church in attempting to reconcile the world when its own life is sundered apart by bickering and bigotry." Before we can have a serious attempt at unity we must have a common base from which to start. We are finding it in the growing abhorrence of the frightening sectarian status quo.

We should not become discouraged because there are still those who proclaim unity and practice division. The party spirit is subtle and enduring. Satan will release his hold upon us with great reluctance. His greatest weapon has been the divisive spirit and he will not surrender it readily. It can be wrested from his grasp only by humility and confession of guilt. We are coming to the place where we can see the shame and mockery of our philosophy of separation. We are starting to flow together in a recognition of mutual failure to keep the peace and this will become a compelling tide.

2. A realization of the futility of the policy pursued in the past. All of us are becoming convinced that no one faction or party will be able to absorb and assimilate all of the others. In the past we have split over every matter of difference that has arisen. This has crystallized the party spirit and made it difficult to resolve the problem. The cleavage always became wider with the passing of time and was augmented by the agitation of preachers on both sides. There was no real exchange of thought on a rational basis. The only procedure was public debate in a tension-charged emotional framework.

There is a growing conviction that such public debates as have been conducted have seldom done much permanent good. These have not really been forums for the mutual search for truth but spiritual gladiatorial combats by chosen champions. We are aware that no faction has all of the truth and that all of us have something to contribute to the others, while all of us can learn from others. We need not sacrifice any truth we hold in order to listen to others. In our divided state no one faction is the loyal church to the exclusion of all others. We are fast giving up the “loyal church fallacy” in our thinking and returning to the concept of one body composed of all those individuals who are joined to the head— our Lord Jesus Christ. Although these are members of the one body they may be divided by unfortunate circumstances which have arisen in the past to plague and trouble the restoration movement. While deploring these differences we can recognize our common standing in Christ.

3. An increased educational scope with training in the art of thinking. The greatest enemy of parochial and provincial thought is education. Through it, the doors of the mind are opened to greater vistas and nobler heights. The narrow sectarian spirit fears true liberal education more than anything else. Our young people are being exposed to knowledge as never before in our history. The great thoughts of the ages are filtering through and are affecting the consciousness of our generation.

Men who are enabled to evaluate things properly and look at them in the right perspective will not be content to allow the great relationships of life to be disturbed by matters of an inferior or secondary nature. Those factions which desire to maintain their identity should retire behind barricades and refuse to educate their young. The party spirit simply cannot survive under the searchlight of naked truth. Through the medium of the educational process the walls of sectism are being battered down.

4. The depreciation in value of those things which have been credited with division in the past. One of the favorable by-products of war is the result of uprooting people and transporting them into new areas where they are confronted with varied situations. Soldiers and civilians are sent into other parts of the world where the things which seemed so important at home are unknown. That which formed the chief topic of religious nature in their previous setting seems incongruous in an area where it has never been heard of.

Ours is an era of greatly augmented travel. People are brought into contact with each other and become convinced that there are many who are sincerely seeking to serve God besides those in the faction to which they belong. At home they would not dare to attend at another congregation of divergent practice because to do so would bring down upon their heads the suspicion and wrath of those with whom they are allied. Away from home they feel a greater sense of freedom and are thus given a better insight into the attitudes and motivations of others.

The proof that additional contact and exposure is detrimental to the maintenance of the party spirit is found in the extreme attempts of factional leaders to keep their adherents from going to hear those who differ with them. They employ threats, coercion, boycott, and false accusations to hold their members "in line." There is increasing evidence that many are beginning to think for themselves and are coming to resent the dogmatic and authoritarian whip-cracking tactics of preachers who wish to be regarded as the authorized interpreters for the splinter party. As the dignity and rights of the individual are restored and the priesthood of all believers is re-affirmed men will come to realize that we have but one high priest and he is not on earth. Factions are maintained by factional leaders.

We must not overlook the contribution being made by the mass media for the dissemination of knowledge. The printing press is the modern "gift of tongues." Obviously the press, radio and television, make possible the circulation of a great deal of error but at the same time much truth filters through to the hearts of the honest. It is a fact that many factions which take no part in the drives to stem the flow of harmful pornographic material through the mails go all out in an attempt to keep their members from reading material published by their brethren in other segments. A faction survives only through rigid exclusivism. When barriers are broken down factionalism withers and dies on the vine.

5. A feeling of urgency relative to the world situation. In pioneer days news was conveyed very slowly. One part of the world might not know for months what had taken place in another sector. A great catastrophe— tornado, tidal wave, or hurricane could devastate an area and the rest of humanity would not learn of it for many weeks. The situation is very different now. All of us have been forced to join the human family. That which affected Burma, Cuba, or the Congo yesterday, is the theme of discussion at our breakfast tables today. As our world grows smaller our hearts must grow larger if we are to survive. Gone are the days when oceans were private moats around our national fortresses.

There was a time when it was sufficient religious exercise to defend our local party against frontal assaults by traveling preachers who came into the isolated community advocating a divergent view about cups, classes, or colleges. Now the whole Christian concept is being challenged as never before and we are made to realize that we are just a small part of the whole. It seems a rather feeble performance to make a great ado about whether Jesus wants the fruit of the vine in the communion of his blood to be fermented or unfermented while the savage forces of atheism surround us crying that there is no God. It is like arguing over whether we shall have tea or coffee for luncheon while an Indian raid is in progress, or like tacking a shingle on the garage roof while the house is on fire.

In the days of the American Revolution when the various colonies were fiercely contending with each other over their own rights, Benjamin Franklin sought to bring unity out of partisan chaos by pointing out that “we must all hang together or we may all hang separately.” There is little hope that a narrow faction will continue if Christianity goes down in our nation under the iron heel of world communism. Surely there must be some area in the realm of the spiritual where we can stand together against the dialectical materialism which threatens all that we hold dear — and that we all hold dear! The world ferment in the winepress of wrath has reduced to the realm of the trivial our little contentions about fermented wine as the cup of the Lord.

6. Recapture of implications in the language of the Spirit. We are very fortunate to live in an age when much research is being done in the field of spiritual linguistics. We ought never to be afraid of what honest study will uncover. Alexander Campbell in giving a synopsis of reformation goals placed the discovery of the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit first in order. We are convinced that it deserves this distinction since practically all else is dependent upon it. As we see the true import of the spiritual words we can detect the fallacies in our previous reasoning, and we are thus enabled to correct our errors.

Only eternity will reveal the full import of discoveries related to Greek terms such as koinonia, hairesis, schisma and apostasia— all of which have been transliterated in order to become a part of our English language. What a difference it makes to realize that our fellowship in Christ is not endorsement, that it is not contingent upon unanimity of opinion, conformity in interpretation, or attainment to a specific degree of knowledge. How wrong we have been in branding others as heretics and apostates merely because they disagree with us upon some matters.

While we are being led to see the significance of these matters we must exercise a great deal of patience toward those who continue to advocate human traditional definitions and positions which we now know to be in error. We must regard with charity those who ridicule and make light of growth and advancement in knowledge, realizing that all such brethren are motivated by fear and driven by fright. Men must have time to mature in their thinking, and the maturation process is always hindered when partisan alliances enter in. We will gain nothing for the cause we love more than life by personal attacks upon those who cannot concur in our thinking. Indeed, such personal attacks are always the resort of weak men with weak causes. One who is Christ-centered in thought seeks neither to elevate men nor to derogate them.

7. Loss of importance of traditions in the space age. We are being driven into a greater appreciation of the divine power which made the universe and now sustains it. The immensity of the firmament with its whirling galaxies, the potency in each atom which makes it a world in miniature, all of this increases our sense of awe and reverence. It makes us realize that man in his exercise of creativity is truly but a “little lower than God” as a correct rendering of Psalm 8:5 would have it.

Our scientific discoveries are forcing us to make certain adjustments in our thinking about the material universe. Our frontiers are being extended beyond the planet upon which we live. Instead of this lessening our appreciation of God it serves only to increase our reverence and awe. We dare not leave God out of our meditations now. This is demonstrated by a return to religion upon the part of the scientists themselves. But there is a recognition of the fact that if the terrestrial sphere is so much greater than we had dreamed, it is possible that the kingdom of heaven is more glorious than we had suspected.

The things about which we have fought and argued begin to appear trivial in the light of the eternal purpose. It seems incongruous that God spent thousands of years preparing mankind for the coming of Jesus, that our Lord suffered, bled and died at Calvary, and that he arose from the dead, all for the one purpose of planting a small sect confined to one nation (or to two or three states in that nation) to carry on a constant warfare for a particular way of breaking the bread or passing the fruit of the vine at the Lord’s Supper.

It is not difficult to understand how the “many angels, numbering myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands” (Rev. 5:11) are involved in and concerned about the titanic struggle between Light and Darkness, but it is not easy to see how this innumerable host of celestial beings would be greatly exercised about a debate over fermented wine in Texas, or individual containers in California. The perspective of some has become so shortened that “the kingdom of heaven” now consists of a dozen or so small conformist groups in which “the faithful preachers” can be numbered on the fingers of one hand. There are actually some who feel that their demise will cause the church of God to sink into oblivion. They regard Jesus as sitting at the right hand of God to preside over a dying faction.

In the past some have thought of the church of God as a kind of American institution and have regarded the kingdom of God as one which depends for its existence upon the support of American money, much like “the democratic way of life.” We are now becoming increasingly conscious of the fact that there may be a great difference between the church of Christ and “The Church of Christ.” The first has always been catholic and timeless; the second is somewhat indigenous to America. It helps us to realize that “the Lord knoweth them that are his,” but there is no indication that we know them all. And it does no harm to realize that John saw “a great multitude which no man could number, from every nation, from all tribes and peoples and tongues, standing before the Lamb, with palm branches in their hands, and crying with a loud voice, ‘Salvation belongs to our God who sits upon the throne and to the Lamb.’” The kingdom of heaven is not an English-speaking institution and does not have its headquarters in the United States. Surely many of the things which have caused division in the disciple brotherhood in the United States have little relevance to the universal struggle waged between the Prince of peace and the prince of the power of the air, except as they have engendered feelings and attitudes which have unwittingly placed us in the camp of the latter and made us a part of “The Black Legion.”

The Growing Hope

We are standing at the threshold of a brighter era for the heirs of the restoration movement. With an increasing awareness of our destiny in the religious panorama, we will be able to see a sense of brotherhood rekindled and thus will be able to make our witness felt once more in that domain from which our unfortunate philosophy of separation has excluded us. We are the outgrowth of a "project to unite the Christians in all the sects." We have allowed ourselves to become the most seriously divided of all the contemporary religious movements. But there is becoming evident in every faction a stirring of hearts for unity. There is a "sound of marching in the tops of the balsam trees" (2 Samuel 5:22) and men are beginning to bestir themselves, for the Lord is going before us and is also our rear guard.

Many are sympathetic to the crusade for brotherhood recognition but they dare not express it openly at present. They would only arouse fierce animosity in the party of their allegiance and would be ostracized by those whom they dearly love and cherish. They are secretly thankful for the plea that is being made although they cannot declare this publicly. Their prayers ascend for the ultimate success of the effort to restore the spirit of restoration and these prayers are very essential to our wellbeing. For years there has been a deep surging inward feeling of dissatisfaction with their position in the hearts of the real thinkers in every faction but they have not known what to do to alleviate the condition. It is encouraging to them to know that there are others who cherish and share in the same concern as expressed in this little journal. It is essential that we respect their confidence and keep their own feelings confidential.

In some sections of our nation brethren are able to do something of a positive nature to implement their desire for unity. Members of the several factions in some communities meet regularly for discussion of the problem. True, there are those who still regard fellowship as endorsement and equate community with conformity, and who thus retard any significant progress toward a closer working relationship. However, the very fact that men have now grown sufficiently mature that they can meet and talk with proper respect for each other is good.

Men of courage are arising whose thinking transcends the narrow partisanship of the groups with which they are affiliated. These twentieth century pioneers of unity in the disciple brotherhood are willing to go wherever God opens up a door and share their views without dogmatism or coercion of others. The historians of the future who record the events of this age will not be able to ignore the contribution toward kingdom extension made by those congregations which have dared to blaze the way by arranging for rallies consisting of brethren from all the splinter parties who have met in love and mutual regard to open up new vistas of service and sainthood. The sheep on the hills are lifting their heads and starting to come toward each other so that they may, in some future day, form one flock under one Shepherd. The sunlight is dispelling the dark and cloudy day.

In some of my recent speeches on fellowship I have been listing seven signs of hope for brighter days to come. Since these betoken the decline of factionalism I shall list them here for the encouragement and strength of all the members of the fellowship of the concerned ones in all of our splinter parties.

1. A restored vision. Every ideal must first exist as an idea. There can be no tangible creation unless it is preceded by a mental image. The finished picture must first exist in the mind of the artist. There can never be a united church unless someone first sees it thus in his heart. The sculptor must see the angel in the rude stone and then labor to remove the mass around it. At last there are those who have the concept of a united church. So long as they can see it they can strive to remove the partisan debris and restore the image in their hearts. The Creator will work with them in this act of creativity.

2. Dissatisfaction with the status quo. All reformation grows out of discontent with an existing and intolerable condition. We are coming to recognize that division multiplies our problems rather than solving them. It augments our troubles rather than lessening them. We cannot fracture ourselves into fraternity nor fragmentize ourselves into unity. We must purge out the party spirit.

3. Increasing consciousness of brotherly love which transcends artificial and partisan barriers and makes rational discussion a possibility. We are finding an affinity which pulls us together with greater power than those things which pulled us apart. In the joy of a common Fatherhood we find a common purpose more important than factional emphasis.

4. A maturity which recognizes public partisan debates on an emotional and personal level as offering no real or permanent solution. There is an increasing awareness that such debates aggravate our problem.

5. The favorite climate in the entire religious world which provides increasing opportunities for propagating our plea. Great doors and effectual are being opened up by the Spirit as the hearts of all are turned toward unity of the believers in Christ.

6. A correct estimate of our problem, rejecting childish oversimplification and slogans on the one hand, and refusing to be daunted or intimidated on the other hand by morbid pessimism created by the gravity of the situation into which we have fallen.

7. Meetings where representatives of all parties and factions may meet as equals with due respect for each other as brethren, study and reason together about the problem and strive to assist each other in discovering a solution.

In this more intelligent atmosphere the partisan champion, waving signed propositions, blustering, daring, challenging all comers, is dated as to method. He is clearly behind the times for serious brethren have outgrown the childish partisan method of thrusting a chosen gladiator into the arena to represent a clique.

No one can represent another person before the tribunal of minds any more than at the judgment bar of God. In quiet effective ways the leaven of unity is working. The magnetism of the Holy Spirit is drawing the hearts of the concerned ones closer together. Like attracts like! We have lived to see the ebb tide of factionalism. The churning waters of hate are receding. The divisive spirit is being conquered by the love of God and love for the brethren. Great things await the children of God. Look up, take heart, the best is yet to be!

There remains one fear. It is expressed over and over. By what means do we propose a reformation of the restoration without the effort terminating in a new party or another division. In the light of history no question is of greater importance. We must face this without evasion. In our next issue, God willing, we will detail for you the reasons for saying there will not be another division as a result of this crusade. But in the meantime, remember that you are living in one of the greatest decades of a century. It is your privilege to see the forces of division beat a retreat and those of unity surge forward.

No longer does the trumpet make an uncertain sound. A great invincible spiritual power is beginning to pass like a shudder over the frame of an inert body. The spiritual eyes are awakening; the spiritual muscles are flexing. The saints are gathering. The sheep are coming home. Eyes fixed on the cross as their goal they are approaching from all directions, getting closer to each other with every step nearer to Him. God bless them and help them! God be with us and help us to help them—all of them! They are His and He is ours! Praise be to Him for all things!

The Hands of Folly

Mission Messenger (June 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

“Wisdom builds her house but folly with her own hands tears it down.” These are the words of Solomon, wisest monarch who ever sat upon an earthly throne. They are peculiarly appropriate in the study of religious reformation. Every attempt to offset the sectarian spirit has resulted in the formation of another party. Satan seems to delight in thwarting noble purposes and in diverting them back into the channel they seek to avoid.

After almost a century of division and factionalism in the disciple brotherhood which grew out of the early nineteenth century restoration movement, we are again engaged in an attempt to recapture the spirit which animated our fathers. The revival of the restoration arouses mixed feelings among the adherents of every splinter party. Questions are being asked, doubts are expressed and positions are being challenged. All of this is a good omen. In any work of such momentous importance we should proceed with caution. Careful examination of every step is essential to assure proper and scriptural procedure. We need to face up fearlessly and unhesitatingly to the queries that are being raised.

One of the most frequent points of interrogation concerns how we propose to avoid creation of another party. It has often been pointed out that it is possible to develop an anti-party faction. We should confess frankly the difficulty involved in maintaining a purely non-partisan position. We are not as brilliant as many who have preceded us nor any more consecrated to God than they were, yet their reformatory attempts ended in new sectarian alliances. A consideration of this fact is very humbling, saddening and frightening.

It may happen that well-meaning but overly zealous individuals will employ such methods as would abuse our plea and turn this crusade into a factional movement. While we deplore such tactics we may be powerless to prevent them. However, it is our intention to labor for peace based on a destruction of all sectarianism and we feel there are certain basic considerations which can prevent another division and another party. Parties occur as the result of schisms and if we can prevent a rent in the fabric of fellowship we can keep formal factions from being created to the further disgrace of the cause to which we have committed our lives unreservedly. In this article we propose to enunciate the principles upon which we rely.

1. We will regard division among brethren as a sin against them and Christ. So long as we look back upon it as a reserve weapon to be used as a last resort in defence of self we will justify its employment. The apostle classifies “strife, jealousy, anger, selfishness, dissension, and party spirit” among the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:20). It appears in a list which also includes immorality, idolatry, and drunkenness. He declares that those who belong to Christ have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires. One can hardly indulge in that which he has crucified.

We should no more condone the party spirit than we should sanction idolatry or drunkenness. Idolatry is not a legitimate means of expressing an inner sense of reverence for a superior force in the universe; drunkenness is not a proper manner of satisfying thirst; neither is division a divinely authorized method of correcting error. Our problems in the fellowship are like all problems of human relationship, they are deep and complex. In seeking a solution we should be wary of any answer which appears to be cheap and easy. Separation in the religious realm is like separation in the domestic domain—it is an admission of failure. It is also a means of evading the real problem which is one of adjustment. It is easier to run away than to face up to reality.

Like drunkenness, which is another work of the flesh, division is a form of escapism practiced by the insecure and socially incompetent. By visualizing division as God does we will come to look upon it as abhorrent, destructive of the family relationship, and alienating God's children from each other. Under such circumstances we will no more consider forming another party than we would practice any of the other sins of the flesh. Our best protection against the creation of another faction is a realization of the real nature of factionalism.

The Indwelling Spirit

2. We will become ever more conscious of the role of the indwelling Spirit in our lives. It was not the intention of Jesus to leave us as orphans during his absence from the earth (John 14:18) and he has sent another Counselor to abide with us through this age (14:16). It is actually to our advantage that Jesus has gone away and the Spirit has been sent, for while Jesus was in the flesh he could be but one place at a time. The Holy Spirit is not subject to limitations of the flesh but can be everywhere on earth and dwell in all of God's children throughout the world (Cp. John 16:7). It was not merely an accident that Jesus spoke of peace to his followers in direct conjunction with their reception of the Spirit. (John 20:21, 22). The Holy Spirit is the divine agent through whom peace is secured.

One of the chief causes contributing to the present factional state is the loss of the significance of the Holy Spirit in the lives of the believers. This has made of Christianity a cold legalistic system and such a system always intensifies problems of human relationship without settling them. "It is these who set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit" (Jude 19). If divisions are set up by those who are devoid of the Spirit, it is obvious that only men who are filled with the Spirit can restore peace to a troubled world. It is the Spirit which links us with God and ties us to each other. I am one with every other person in the world in whom the Holy Spirit abides. If I can grasp this thought in all of its glorious fulness God can use me as a humble instrument to bring love, joy and peace to the hearts of men, for these are fruits of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22) in the lives of those who walk in the Spirit.

The partnership of the ransomed ones is really "the fellowship of the Holy Spirit" (2 Cor. 13:14) which, like the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God, should abide with all of us. That fellowship obligates us to have a mutual concern for unity. One can no more practice or defend division among brethren than he could practice or defend any of the other works of the flesh. We must not get the divine order reversed. Our fellowship does not grow out of thinking and feeling alike, but these result from our fellowship. It is not because we have a common concern for unity that we enter into the fellowship, but because we are in the fellowship the care for unity follows in the hearts of all who are true disciples. This is clearly portrayed in a remarkable passage written by Paul. "If then our common life in Christ yields anything to stir the heart, any loving consolation, any sharing of the Spirit, any warmth of affection or compassion, fill up my cup of happiness by thinking and feeling alike, with the same love for one another, the same turn of mind, and a common core for unity" (Phil. 2:1, 2).

The hands of folly have torn down the house of wisdom by ignoring the cementing influence of the Spirit and substituting conformity of opinion, unanimity of interpretation, or attainment to a certain level of knowledge as the basis of community. These things are responsible for every creed that has been written by men. They are the very elements which have swept over the Christian structure through the ages and left a trail of destruction in their wake. It is as impossible to have peace upon such a foundation as it would be to build a Christian character upon the works of the flesh. These have occasioned the bitter quarrels and the cruel fights that have marred the history of Christendom. The only hope of offsetting them lies with the Spirit. "If you go on fighting one another tooth and nail, all you can expect is mutual destruction. I mean this: if you are guided by the Spirit you will not fulfill the desires of your lower nature" (Gal. 5:15, 16).

The party spirit cannot dwell in a heart that is filled with the Holy Spirit. Factionalism is a symptom of the lower nature, of that which is carnal within us. "Can you not see that while there is jealousy and strife among you, you are living on the purely human level of your lower nature?" (1 Cor. 3:3). It is impossible to change a man's nature by law. So long as we seek to overcome the problem of strife by law we will only create more strife. We must have divine aid to overthrow the lower nature. It is at this juncture we should grasp the importance of a statement of the apostle with reference to "the desires of your lower nature." He writes, "That nature sets its desires against the Spirit, while the Spirit fights against it . . . But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under law" (Gal. 5:17, 18).

We recognize the weakness and frailties of our human nature. That nature prompts us to engage in quarrels and disputes. It causes us to contend jealously for our own opinions and ideas. It inspires a feeling of revenge and retribution. It is responsible for rivalry and personal vanity. All the laws ever passed will not overcome these tendencies for nature is not altered by law. Even the divinely ordained law which was "holy and just and good" (Rom. 7:12) could not transform man.

“What the law could never do, because our lower nature robbed it of all potency, God has done . . . our . . . conduct no longer under the control of our lower nature, is directed by the Spirit” (Rom. 8:3, 4). The Spirit not only fights against the lower nature but is victorious over it. That nature is put to death by the Spirit. “It follows, my friends, that our lower nature has no claim upon us; we are not obliged to live on that level. If you do so, you must die. But if by the Spirit you put to death all the base pursuits of the body, then you will live” (Rom. 8:12, 13).

Since law has no power to transform and our lower nature robs it of potency, it appears that if we are to overcome such works of the flesh as strife, division and party intrigues, we must live on a plane above “the purely human level.” This is the equivalent of saying we must reside in a domain which transcends law, a realm in which law is not operable. In such a realm one is not guided by laws which are external but by an inner power. The fruits of such a life are not regulated by any written code. “The harvest of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, fidelity, gentleness and self-control. There is no law dealing with such things as these. And those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the lower nature with its passions and desires. If the Spirit is the source of our life, let the Spirit also direct our course” (Gal. 5:22-25).

What we are striving for is no mere reformation of our thinking but a complete and absolute resignation of self, the whole self, to the Spirit. Certainly this will effect a radical change in our thought patterns but only as such mental concepts are part of the entire being. Our problem in the past lies in the fact that our religion has been only a part of our lives. It is an area reserved in the heart or mind to find expression on certain days, in certain places, or in doing certain things. To the true Christian there should be no specific “sacred” days, places, or things. Wherever he is, whatever he does or whenever it is done, all must be done to the glory of God. No one can divide the family of God and do it to His glory. To think that he can do so is to think evil if division is evil.

It is our aim to recapture the significance of the greatest commandment, the one which must come first. “Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind.” The word “all” leaves no department of life untouched. It provides no possibility for making provision for the flesh to fulfill its desires, not even the desire to get away from those who are problems to us. Note the term “all your mind.” This lifts religion from a purely pietistic level and makes it a practical something. One must analyze himself and his associates with a view to solving problems, not creating them. We shall stop short of nothing less than the wholly committed intelligence of all.

How will this avoid division in the spiritual ranks? The answer is quite simple. Division and strife belong on the “human level of your lower nature” (1 Cor. 3:3). When men, through surrender to the Holy Spirit, move off of this level to a higher one they will no longer resort to those means which they formerly employed. “You must be made new in mind and spirit, and put on the new nature of God’s creating, which shows itself in the just and devout life called for by truth” (Eph. 4:23, 24). There will be a recognition that the Holy Spirit can be grieved but there will be studious avoidance of those things which would offend this royal guest. “Do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, for that Spirit is the seal with which you are marked for the day of our final liberation. Have done with spite and passion, all angry shouting and cursing, and bad feeling of every kind. Be generous to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another as God in Christ forgave you” (Eph. 4:30-32).

Being Genuine

3. We shall avoid the creation of another party by endeavoring to remain “genuine” even amidst the clamor of partisanship. The apostle wrote to the divided congregation at Corinth, “In the first place, when you assemble as a church, I hear that there are divisions among you and I partly believe it, for there must be factions among you in order that those who are genuine among you may be recognized” (1 Cor. 11:18, 19). This demonstrates that one can be non-partisan even in a congregation with factions formed in it. How did Paul establish that he was genuine? Did he create another party known as “the loyal church”? Not only did he not do this at Corinth but he refused to recognize the party lines that others had drawn. He regarded them all as brethren and refused to be aligned with any group to the exclusion of other brothers, not even a group calling themselves by his name. He simply ignored the party walls which men had erected.

To Paul, those who assembled as a divided church, still constituted “the church of God which is at Corinth” and were “the called saints” (1 Cor. 1:2). They were in the fellowship of Jesus Christ our Lord (verse 9). In the very passages where he mentions their strife he addresses them as brethren. It appears that he did this deliberately to show that in spite of their schisms the relationship with him had not been dissolved. “It has been reported to me by Chloe’s people that there is quarreling among you, my brethren” (1:11). “But I, brethren, could not address you as spiritual men, but as men of the flesh, as babes in Christ” (3:1). It was in connection with his teaching against striving for special honor and exalting self that Jesus said, “You are all brothers” (Matthew 23:8). A recognition of the extent of brotherhood and the equality which grows out of it will preclude all factional ambition.

One who is genuine has a proper evaluation of men. He realizes that Apollos and Paul are mere servants through whom men believe. One of them may plant, the other may water the plants, but only God can give the increase. “He who plants and he who waters are equal” (3:8) so it is foolish to “be puffed up in favor of one against another” (4:6). In view of this one should not “boast of men” (3:21) but, “as it is written, ‘Let him who boasts, boast of the Lord’” (1:31). The Corinthians were urged to become imitators of Paul (4:16) and Paul simply refused to recognize the denominational lines drawn in the congregation. He regarded his allegiance as belonging to Jesus and not to a party. To him the kingdom of heaven was greater than any faction and he did not propose to allow his vision to be shortened by factional limitations.

The genuine believer recognizes that Jesus is central and everything revolves around him. He refuses to be sidetracked or stampeded by any philosophy which puts human interpretation as primary and the Son of God as secondary. One of the chief causes of factionalism is that of “taking sides” or of “lining up” with this group or that. Many do not see that the factional spirit cannot be overcome until someone is able to rise above it and recognize that being in the party is not the equivalent to being in Christ. It is possible to oppose evil tendencies and error without creating a party through which to do so. Much that passes for faithfulness in these days is merely fidelity to the party and men will do virtually anything to make the faction succeed. Pride is the basis of much of our contention in these days. We reject it with all of its implications as containing no hope for a better future.

Open Hearts

4. It is our conviction that the philosophy of the “wide open heart” will preclude the possibility of another party. When Paul faced the factionalism at Corinth he did so in this spirit. We must not overlook the fact that the intent of certain of these factions was to exclude Paul and those who labored with him. The congregation was admitting and listening to men whose sole purpose was to turn them against Paul. In this emergency the love which values others even more than self was clearly demonstrated. “Men of Corinth, we have spoken very frankly to you; we have opened our heart wide to you all. On our part there is no constraint; any constraint there may be is in yourselves. In fair exchange then (may a father speak to his children?) open wide your hearts to us" (2 Cor. 6:11-13).

It is pointed out that those who are factional and opposed to the crusade for unity may drive us out. We are asked if this will not automatically create another party. Drive us out of what? No man can drive us out of Jesus Christ our Lord! The only thing men can do is to exclude us from their hearts for over those hearts we have no control. But they cannot remove themselves from our hearts for over these they have no control. And we simply refuse to be separated in heart from any of our brethren. If we go among them and they refuse to recognize us, when they come among us we will welcome them. We will pray for them, help them, share with them to the extent they will permit; and when they will not permit we will love them just the same. We will still visit them and go among them when we can even though they ignore us.

It is our intention to engage in no party intrigues, to sanction no political alliances against any of God's children. We will not form any power blocs nor seek for advantage through human cleverness. When men employ such measures against us we shall not retaliate in kind. It is our honest feeling that God can be served by our dishonor as well as our honor, by the blame heaped upon us as well as the praise bestowed upon us. "Honor and dishonor, praise and blame are alike our lot: we are the impostors who speak the truth, the unknown men whom all men know; dying we still live on; disciplined by suffering, we are not done to death; in our sorrows we have always cause for joy; poor ourselves, we bring wealth to many; penniless, we own the world" (2 Cor. 8:9-10). Of course it is very difficult to maintain this ideal under pressure but God will strengthen with might those who plead for peace. "Blessed are the peacemakers"

We will not sever ourselves from our brethren. If we go to communities where they are divided we shall see beyond the walls and envision our brethren on both sides of the barriers. We will call upon those to pray with whom we cannot agree upon many things; we will give brotherly recognition to those whose hearts are filled with personal bitterness against us. Our entreaty to them will be, “Do make a place for us in your hearts! We have wronged no one, ruined no one, taken advantage of no one. I do not want to blame you. Why, as I have told you before, the place you have in our heart is such that, come death, come life, we meet it together” (2 Cor. 7:2, 3). If Paul could feel thus toward the Corinthians I have never seen a congregation toward which I could not feel the same way. Bad as are some of the congregations I know, I am not aware of any as far gone as was the church at Corinth when the apostle wrote of “the place you have in our heart.” My brethren just cannot remove themselves from my heart. The key to it belongs to Jesus!

A Common Fallacy

5. Perhaps the greatest safeguard of all against the creation of new parties is our repudiation of the “loyal church” fallacy. This is the mistaken idea held by many that one faction in our divided state is loyal to God to the exclusion of all others. This stems from the view that the discovery and emphasis of a certain truth, or what is considered to be a truth, makes of the party which stresses that truth, the church of God, while those who do not see it are relegated to a position in which they are regarded as being either sectarians or hobbyists. This childish and immature approach to the Christian concept is based upon ignorance of the nature of the called of God. So long as this view is cherished it will fragmentize the saints and maintain tribal conflict.

No faction is the “loyal church.” This is a myth which has become traditional in spite of the fact that it is opposed to both scripture and sense. No doubt every faction has discovered some truth, although quite frequently the point of factional emphasis is mere opinion. But no faction has discovered all of the implications of God's word for our generation and adoption of the factional attitude precludes the possibility of arriving at further truths. Every faction is circumscribed by an unwritten creed. An invisible circle has been drawn beyond which no amount of study or research can take one because as long as a faction regards itself as "the faithful church" to go beyond the party interpretation is considered as "transgressing and abiding not in the doctrine of Christ." It is the very essence of factionalism that it equates its partisan brotherhood as "the Church of Christ" and its party line as the revelation of God.

Factional representatives urge their adherents to study to show themselves approved, but the word "study" is a loaded term. It does not mean to do unbiased research but to search the Bible for additional arguments to defend the partisan status quo. The party hero is the one who can twist and wrest the most passages to make the factional position appear more plausible in debate. The real student of God's word is regarded as a heretic and soon driven forth. There is nothing more dangerous to factionalism than real objective research of God's message to mankind. The last thing any faction wants to see is for its members to start truly studying and thinking for themselves.

Since every faction has discovered some truth but no faction has discovered all truth, the exclusivist attitude makes it impossible to share the truths we have learned or to share in the truths which others have learned. The party spirit is inimical to all non-sectarian growth or development. The result is that the thinking of every party becomes inbred and sterile. It ceases to be original and creative. Minds become rusty and hearts become barren from mere repetition of traditional explanations and accepted interpretations. Those who doubt are driven out, those who question are made unwelcome. The faction becomes a gloomy fortress to preserve musty thought which the free world has long since outgrown in its onward march toward greater knowledge. Yet, in our current state we do not recommend going from one fortress to another. We suggest that all of them throw open their windows and let in the fresh air and drain their moats and provide free access. There are good brethren behind all of the somber and forbidding walls.

The “loyal church fallacy” has driven brethren to a practice in the past which is divisive in its very nature. When members of one faction learned a truth from a member of another faction, they forthwith concluded that the party of their former allegiance was not faithful and transferred to the other. In many instances they began a campaign to win as many of their former associates as possible and thus intensified the feeling which was already aroused against them as “traitors” and “apostates.” The spirit of rivalry is always kindled by such injudicious procedure. One is not in any party long until he discovers that, while it is strong in some things, it is very weak in others. Disillusionment is the inevitable fate of all who change affiliation to find the “faithful church.”

Our recommendation is that the brethren in the various factions stay where they are and act as leaven for good. What is needed is not the creation of a new segment called “the loyal church” but people who are loyal to Christ Jesus the Lord in spite of the unfortunate schisms which have occurred in the past. One who has grown up in a faction understands its motivations and is in better position to share with its members the truths he gains than one coming from a different background. Moreover, when one transfers to another group he loses his effectiveness for reformation among those with whom he has been associated, and often is regarded with suspicion by those to whom he goes. It is contrary to the spirit of Jesus for us to abandon those whom we deem to be sick in order to associate with those we consider to be well. If we learn a truth we can do very little to spread it among those who already have it but we could do a great deal in sharing our knowledge with those who have not yet ascertained it.

Congregations are made up of human beings and all of them will be beset by the same problems which confront persons. It is not being a member of “a faithful congregation” but being a faithful member of the one body that counts. The congregations planted by the apostles of our Lord fall very far short of heaven’s ideal. Paul planted and Apollos watered at Corinth but the congregation was far from perfect. Now if Paul could not start a congregation that remained “faithful” on what grounds do we flatter ourselves that we can do so? It is for this reason that not one of the apostles ever commanded brethren to pull out and start a “loyal church.” With all of the tragic sins infecting some of the seven churches in Asia Minor Jesus did not instruct the members of any of them to withdraw and start “a faithful church” across the street. Surely those who planted them in the first place were faithful and if they could depart so far from the original intent, any other congregation started by an elite corps would terminate the same way.

The attempt to start faithful churches by separation from brethren can only fill the earth with unfaithful factions! There is only one church on earth. There never was but one, there never will be another. Starting a faction is not planting the church. There are people in all of the factions who are members of the church. Some in all factions are as faithful as they know how to be, some in all of them are a disgrace to the Christian profession. A faction does not become “the faithful church” by a particular position on colleges, cups, and classes, because a faction is not the church at all. The church is greater than any faction, greater than all of them together, greater than the restoration movement, greater than “The Church of Christ” which is one segment that grew out of the restoration movement.

If a man has grown up in a narrow intolerant party and increasing wisdom demonstrates to him that it is not the church to the exclusion of all others, let him not leave his brethren and go join another faction. Let him stay where he is, love those with whom he has labored, exhibit patience and forbearance in sharing his newly-found knowledge. “The servant of the Lord must not be quarrelsome, but kindly towards all. He should be a good teacher, tolerant, and gentle when discipline is needed for the refractory. The Lord may grant them a change of heart and show them the truth, and thus they may come to their senses” (2 Tim. 2:24, 25). Instead of refusing to associate with congregations which were wrong in profession and practice, it was precisely that kind of congregations which the apostles proposed to visit and to which they sent evangelists. Their letters were not all written to “loyal churches.” There was hardly a “new testament congregation” which would not have been split by modern adherents of Church-of-Christ-ism.

The “leaven concept” of kingdom extension is directly opposed to the “loyal church” fallacy. The first operates by keeping the truth in contact with those who do not as yet have it; the second operates by removing the truth from contact in order to preserve it inviolate. The first has as its goal the saving of men; the second has as its goal the saving of truth. The fallacy lies in a misunderstanding of the nature of truth. Truth is incapable of destruction. We do not need to take steps to save it or protect it. It is eternal and invincible. Actually, men do not lose truth. They stray from it and become lost. It is the men who are lost and not the truth. To take truth from those who do not have it in order to preserve it is like taking medicine from the sick in order to keep the medicine. Jesus knew this so he deliberately chose to associate with social and religious outcasts. The Pharisees, whose very name means “Separatists” could not understand this. Their counterparts in our own day still do not understand it.

All of our factions have grown out of the “loyal church” fallacy for this is the natural fruit of an arrogant party spirit. When one rejects this whole concept he will not clutter up the religious landscape with another useless party. He will not try to get men to leave where they are and cleave to him, but stay where they are and cling to Christ. The only ones who should leave where they are at present are those who have deserted their brethren in the past because of an erroristic philosophy. They should repent of their error in thinking and return and inform the brethren they were sorry that they separated from them. This does not mean they must admit they were wrong in accepting new truth but simply that they made a mistake when they allowed an increasing knowledge to sever them from those whom they love. Of course, it will no doubt be true that most of these can labor better in their new and present relationship, but it will serve the cause of unity if they are big enough to express regret for their former action in separating.

We are striving for a fellowship of the concerned ones in every party instead of having concern for another party. This will establish fellowship on a horizontal rather than upon a vertical plane. The fellowship in Christ is always horizontal. It cuts across all barriers and penetrates all walls— social, racial, national and political. The factional fellowship is always vertical. It draws a line of demarkation down through the saints. We must recapture a sense of fellowship which reaches through these lines. This means that those who are among the concerned will actually feel a closer kinship with those who are concerned in other parties than they will with the unconcerned in their own party. This fellowship will be based upon spiritual affinity and not upon mere geographical proximity. It will be a union of kindred minds and not merely a gathering of persons in the same building. To take the concerned ones out of all the parties and create a new party composed of these would be a tragic error. It would do the very thing we oppose. Moreover, it would convert many of the concerned into unconcerned ones for it is in time of greatest challenge that we exhibit the greatest concern. There is little incentive to propagandize among those who share our every conviction because there is no need to do so.

This horizontal fellowship will touch the good and honest hearts in all of the parties and the work of peacemaking will be extended. Those who are in Christ are in the church wherever they are. Any person who must leave where he is and join something else to be in the church is not in Christ to start with. Here is the real solution to the problem of creating a new party. It would be ridiculous to separate brethren and band them together into another faction to plead for unity. It is wrong to create a faction even to propagate truth. Let brethren remain where they are, share the truths they learn and learn additional truths. It is not necessary to change parties to practice truth. This has been our childish procedure in the past and every reformation among us has created a new party. It is impossible to form a new faction if every man stays where he now is. Truth is not a party possession and belongs to no faction. If you were to start a new faction truth would no more be its private property than it is that of the factions already in existence.

There are those who urge that this is providing “an easy way out” but such is not the case at all. Nothing is more trying or difficult than to remain where brethren do not agree with you. This requires tolerance and forbearance. It taxes the patience and tests Christian fortitude. It would be much easier to “pull up stakes” and leave just as it would be easier for a doctor to spend all of his time with people who are well. The factional way is the easy way because it is the path of evasion and escapism. Those who are shopping around to find a group which agrees with them on every point are looking for something which does not exist unless they locate a party of bland conformists. And if the bland lead the bland they will both fall in the ditch!

It is argued by some partisans that certain factions are more nearly right than some others and one should get in the one that is “nearest right.” Our observation of these “nearest right” groups is that they judge the degree of rightness by the intensity of contention for certain partisan tests while in spirit and attitude they are very smug and self-righteous. Many of them do little, if anything, to take the message to the world. They are satisfied and complacent, contentious and exclusive. But who is to judge the proportion of error in a congregation which makes it imperative that you leave, or the degree of righteousness in another which makes it “loyal.” Who is to set the standard or formulate the criteria for measurement of the status of righteousness? One thing I do know and that is the congregation is far from right which sets brethren at nought and holds them in contempt because of opinion (Romans 14:3). Congregations, like Pharisees, can pray, “Lord, we thank thee that we are not as others.”

Unfailing Love

6. A true conception of brotherly love will militate against our gravitating into another sect. It is essential that ours be a true grasp of the significance of love since every man possessed of a narrow partisan spirit protests that he loves the brethren. He may even argue that this is the reason why he will not recognize or associate with them. Such puerile thinking actually condemns Jesus for coming into this world and associating with those whose lives he could not endorse. It was precisely because he could not endorse them that he desired to associate with them. But if one reveals his love by refusing such association, then Jesus did not love us at all. The self-righteous do not truly love others in a real sense. Theirs is an unwholesome love for self. In a final analysis love for party is an egotistic infatuation because it is a love only for those who agree with one. It results in a man becoming his own god.

A man does not separate himself from those whom he loves. Separation is the result of sin, selfishness and sectarianism. Love is the bridge that spans the gulf created by these evil forces. Sin separates; love unites. The prophet declared, “Your iniquities have separated between you and your God” (Isa. 59:2). The apostle writes, “But Christ died for us while we were yet sinners, and that is God’s own proof of his love toward us” (Rom. 5:8). One is drawn toward those whom he loves and separation produces agony of heart until reunion occurs. No one ever voluntarily separates from an object of his wholehearted affection and when uncontrollable circumstances conspire to create such separation there is constant longing for the joyous occasion of meeting once more.

If we accept as factual the glorious attribute of love as presented in 1 Corinthians 13:4-7 we can never again separate from our brethren and we must labor to heal those breaches already existing. These majestic phrases describing love should be engraved upon our hearts in livid letters of flame. They should not be merely memorized but memorialized in our lives. God help us to understand the urgent need in this time of crisis of this divine fruit so that we may reach forth our hands to pluck it and make it ours. "Love is patient and kind; love is not jealous or boastful; it is not arrogant or rude. Love does not insist on its own way; it is not irritable or resentful; it does not rejoice at wrong but rejoices in the right. Love bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things."

The hands of folly will tear down any house that wisdom builds if allowed to do so. We have seen the piles of wreckage and the heaps of debris which mark the ruin of a glorious restoration movement. It is time once more to "rise up and build." Let us forego the wrecking bar and take up again the tools of the artisan. Let us "seek peace and ensue it." Let us find the way to keep the fabric of brotherhood intact despite our differences. We must decide whether we shall bequeath to posterity a temple of righteousness or a gloomy ruin. If we continue to shiver and shatter our "breaking will be that of a potter's vessel which is smashed so ruthlessly that among its fragments not a sherd is found with which to take fire from the hearth, or dip water up out of the cistern" (Isaiah 30:14).

There is no greater ideal to which the child of God can be consecrated in these days than that of the unity of all believers in Christ Jesus. This is the answer to the world's problem! It is our only hope of survival! Let us banish from our hearts the spirit of factionalism. Let us enthrone Jesus in our lives until he rules and reigns in every department of our existence. Then we can help to bring about that glorious state for which he prayed.

Adventures in Religion (7)

Mission Messenger (June 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The most startling fact about human existence on earth is that it confines in a temple of clay a spirit which was meant to be free. There is ever a struggle; on the one hand of the occupant to divest himself of the tent in which he is forced to dwell, on the other hand of that tabernacle to enfold and involve him until he cannot escape. What we are pleased to refer to as life is not really life at all but a constant death-grapple. Life in its fullest may begin after what we call death. "Flesh and blood can never possess the kingdom of God, and the perishable cannot possess immortality" (1 Cor. 15:50). True life lies in possession of the kingdom of God.

The spirit is timeless and designed for timelessness. It is only as it dwells in the fellowship of the Eternal One that it experiences that state in which it thrives. While we are in the body there are limitations of time and space and these cannot be overcome during our sojourn in the flesh. Man can free himself from the pressures of weight by launching into space but he is only one place at a time and his fellows can time him at that place. He will always displace a given space and do so at a specific time while he is in the body.

But we must not assume that because the spirit is temporarily imprisoned in the flesh it is powerless to experience any sense of timelessness, or eternal life. "Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage.” The spirit is still spirit even while enshrouded in the tent. It may rise above the flesh, in a sense, and repose in God. When it does so it experiences in such a fellowship that eternal life which is invested in the Eternal One. “We here declare to you that eternal life which dwelt with the Father and was made visible to us. What we have seen and heard we declare to you, so that you and we together may share in a common life, that life which we share with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ” (1 John 1:2, 3).

The flesh conspires to make us feel that it is in gratification of the physical that we really live. When we taste the heady wine of the sensual and are momentarily transported outside of self in a grand paroxysm of forgetfulness, we are apt to call that living. But we return to the realm of the prosaic with the realization that “desire shall fail and man goeth to his long home.” It is in the encounter of the soul with God where each awakening is to a brighter prospect and a more glorious aspect that the true adventure lies.

In the physical relationship called marriage, two persons “are no more twain, but one flesh.” They are together in the relationship, yet there are moments of great intimacy to which the apostle refers as “coming together again” (1 Cor. 7:5). They do not live constantly in the throes of ecstasy. These constitute the climactic periods heightened by expectancy and sanctified by abiding love. Thus it is in the relationship of the spirit, for “he who links himself with Christ is one with him, spiritually” (1 Cor. 6:17). There are those moments of encounter with the Spirit which leave us exhausted with the very thrill of the experience and which constitute a foretaste of the delight which awaits us over there. Life takes on a whole new meaning, phrases from the sacred word leap forth in nobler perspective, the burdens of the world pass from us as the world itself shall some day pass.

The timelessness of God is beautifully expressed in 2 Peter 3:8, a passage which begins with the admonition that we should not lose sight of its content. I am persuaded that many have not yet caught sight of its meaning. "And here is one point, my friends, which you must not lose sight of: with the Lord one day is like a thousand years and a thousand years like one day." This is not just two ways of saying the same thing. These are wholly different things. In this figure of speech, to say, "A thousand years is like one day" is the ultimate in contraction; to say, "One day is like a thousand years" is the maximum of expansion. Both are expressions of timelessness because the power required to compress a thousand years into one day and that required to amplify one day into a thousand years must be eternal.

It is a source of comfort to know that with the Lord a thousand years is as one day. This is a pledge of the inviolate nature of the divine promises. There can be no forgetfulness because with God there is no past, only an eternal present. But the expression, "one day is like a thousand years" contains a promise in itself. To him who enters into intimate fellowship with God in a transcendent spiritual experience it is like living a thousand years in a single day. With the tug of the flesh and the demands of our nature it is doubtful that many of us will share in a full day of superlative encounter. But a thousand years is 365,000 days, and if each day is like that, then even a minute projects itself into a thrilling occurrence.

The secret of the timeless experience is utter loss or surrender of self and complete identification with God. There is a sharing in the divine purpose and through it a participation in the divine nature. Selfless consecration to the vocation which is known as "the high calling" will make possible a mountain-top communion with the divine. God is met at different places by different persons. It may be the encounter will come when one resolves to take the good news to some blighted region of the earth, or when he resolves to lose himself in an unstinted effort to answer the prayer of the Savior for unity. It may occur when a Christian woman resolves to devote herself to cheering the last days and final hours of cancer-stricken patients in a large city hospital, or when a high school girl interests her friends in devoting a part of their vacation period to working in a children's ward, not for spending money but for spreading happiness.

A group of young people who visit the aged, infirm and shut-ins, to sing for them, will have a rewarding experience. It is not uncommon to hear such unselfish ones declare that a day spent in such a fashion is the finest of all days. Why should it not be, seeing that it is projected into a thousand years, and that angelic hosts, although unseen by human eyes, join in praise for such a noble effort. One may rise above himself as he gazes at purple mountain majesties, as he walks on a lonely beach where white breakers foam out their dying efforts, or as he sits in a shady wilderness grove with only the sounds of the bird songs about him. But one may also experience such an encounter as he sits on a tractor and watches the cool brown loam turn up behind his plow while blackbirds dart down into the furrow to pick up worms and beetles. Or a housewife may know the encounter with God when she watches the school bus recede into the distance bearing her children to a place of educational training. On such occasions high resolves are made and promises given.

“The Word was made flesh and lived among us” (John 1:14). He was no less the Word when he was flesh than before. He shared our flesh that we might share his glory. To effect this our transformation is as essential as was His. As he was the Word translated into flesh, so we in the flesh must be translated into the Word. When this happens we will be partakers of life and light eternal— life and light. “In him was life and the life was the light of men.” To become a sharer with God, a partaker of the divine nature, a partner in the purpose of the ages, this is the supreme adventure of all. We should keep our eyes alert and our hearts open to find God and to experience His presence.

Does not Heaven begin that day

When the eager heart can say,
Surely God is in this place,
I have seen him face to face
In the loveliness of flowers,
In the service of the showers,
And His voice has talked to me
In the sunlit apple tree.

Explaining My Position

Mission Messenger (July 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

We want you to read a letter we received recently. It is typical of many which cross our desk these days. It will serve as an explanation and apology for rehearsal of what many of you have heard so often in the past.

I am a young preacher who has been greatly worried about the divisions among our brethren. Our position seems so inconsistent in a lot of respects. We draw the line against people who are so much better than some we fellowship. Several months ago I started receiving MISSION MESSENGER. I do not know who sent my name to you but the paper has given me renewed hope. I can see that you have written a great deal in the past which I have missed. Can you briefly explain your position on fellowship? One of the brethren told me that you feel there is a difference between fellowship and endorsement. Is this true?

Fellowship is a state or condition like partnership, companionship or sonship. We enter this state by response to the call of God. "God is faithful, by whom you were called into the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor. 1:9). That call is issued through the gospel. "To this he called you through our gospel, so that you may obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. 2:14). The gospel is the Good News concerning Jesus of Nazareth. It is the message that "Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:3, 4). Paul, who was set apart for the gospel of God, identifies this as “the gospel concerning his Son” and declares he was “designated Son of God in power according to the Spirit of holiness by his resurrection from the dead, Jesus Christ our Lord” (Romans 1:1-4).

The gospel does not consist of abstract propositions. It is not a code of laws, a compilation of letters by inspired or uninspired men, nor the history of an institution. It is news. It has to do with relation of certain facts pertaining to a person, intended to prove that person to be the Son of God. The prime condition in this proof is that “This Jesus God raised up, and of that we all are witnesses” (Acts 2:32). By their enemies these witnesses were accused of “proclaiming in Jesus the resurrection from the dead” (Acts 4:2). The purpose of witnesses is to testify to facts and facts have to do with things. Accordingly, when Jesus expounded the old covenant scriptures to those who were to testify, he “said unto them, Thus it is written, and thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day,” and he added, “And you are witnesses of these things” (Luke 24:48).

The proper response to the testimony of credible witnesses is belief of their testimony. Since the witnesses in this instance are concerned only with creating belief that Jesus is the Messiah and God’s Son they have limited their testimony to facts which support that conviction. All testimony must be confirmed to be credible. Supernatural testimony must be confirmed by supernatural demonstrations. The witnesses of the Sonship have been selective, by the aid of the Holy Spirit, in recounting a sufficient number of mighty works to induce faith in Jesus. “Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name” (John 20:30, 31).

It is obvious that belief of the testimony that Jesus is the Messiah will entail a reformation of life and surrender to his will in loving obedience. He must be coronated Lord as well as Christ in every believing heart as well as in heaven. To this the first public proclamation of the witnesses gives strength. “Let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you have crucified” (Acts 2:36). While it is true that news is either believed or disbelieved, it is also true that there is an element of obedience growing out of the very nature of the news concerning Jesus. Mere intellectual assent is not enough. The acceptance of such testimony demands a transformation of life and character. One of the witnesses thus testifies, “To him who is able to strengthen you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ . . . according to the command of the eternal God, to bring about obedience to the faith” (Romans 16:25, 26). He further asserts that the witnesses “received grace and apostleship to bring about obedience to the faith for the sake of his name among all nations, including yourselves who are called to belong to Jesus Christ” (Romans 1:5, 6).

It is evident that those who are the called belong to Jesus Christ and those who belong to him are those who have become obedient to the faith. These have been called by the gospel and that gospel is summed up in one great fundamental fact, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. One who believes that fact believes the gospel. One who acts in obedience to that faith obeys the gospel. This one fact is the foundation upon which the community of Christ is planted (Matt. 16:18). One who believes that fact is built into that community upon implementation of his faith.

Just as there is but one fact that must be believed in order to respond to the call of God, so there is just one act essential to demonstration of that faith in order to establish covenant relationship. Jesus said to the witnesses, “Go into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation. He who believes and is baptized will be saved” (Mark 16:15, 16). Preaching the gospel is issuing the call. Believing the news that Jesus is God’s Son and being baptized on the basis of that belief is responding to the call. One accepts testimony by belief but he can only acknowledge Lordship by obedience.

It is an arrangement of divine beneficence that we “belong to Jesus Christ” upon belief of one simple fact and obedience to one simple act. “God desires all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4). This includes the unlearned as well as the learned, the foolish as well as the wise. It embraces the ignorant, illiterate and unschooled. If we came into the fellowship with God through complex explanations of doctrine or by interpretation of difficult portions of divine revelation, then only a few wise men would be among the called. Yet the apostle writes, “For consider your call, brethren, not many of you were wise according to worldly standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth” (1 Cor. 1:26). We become sons of God by faith that Jesus is His Son. We enter into Christ, that is, into the state of fellowship with him, through baptism “For in Christ Jesus you are all sons of God, through faith. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ” (Gal. 3:26-27).

Every sincere immersed believer in Jesus Christ is in the fellowship. He enters that fellowship by belief of one concrete proposition and obedience of one concrete act. He may know little of the new covenant scriptures and may be wrong about much of what he does know, but this does not debar him from the fellowship for access to it is not based upon knowledge of a book but upon faith in a person. Certainly an acknowledgment of the lordship of that person will entail a constant effort to know his will and a sincere attempt to obey it as learned, but learning and knowledge are the result of study and study is a slow, methodical process. To be in the fellowship is to be in the family of God and one enters that family by birth. Fellowship as respects God is based upon sonship; as respects other members of the family it is brotherhood.

The suffixes “ship” and “hood” indicate a state into which persons enter. Fellowship is a mutual relation between “fellows” or comrades, just as companionship is a mutual state enjoyed by companions and partnership is a relation between partners. We are called into this state by the gospel. We enter it by being born again. Just as the physical birth makes all who are born to the same father and mother brethren to each other, so does the spiritual birth. Every person on this earth who has been born again is God’s child and my brother. A person may be ignorant about many things but this does not affect brotherhood or fellowship, which are one and the same. Brotherhood is based upon common fatherhood and fraternity is based on common paternity.

Fellowship and Knowledge

Although it is a common thing to attempt to condition fellowship upon attainment to a certain degree of knowledge this is both unscriptural and impossible. Knowledge is based upon mental exercise and past experience. The minds of men are as varied as their physical beings. They differ in perception, analytical powers and retentiveness. No two persons on earth are identical in the degree of knowledge possessed.

In 1 Corinthians 8, the apostle Paul shows the futility of basing fellowship on knowledge because of three factors. While it is true that “all of us possess knowledge” it is equally true that “If any one imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know” (verses 1, 2). All knowledge is relative but when we accept knowledge as the ground of fellowship we always use our own knowledge as the criterion. This means that we always have an imperfect standard to which we demand perfect adherence of others. This actually amounts to “playing God” with our fellows.

In verse 7 the apostle shows that there are varied degrees of knowledge in the church, even with reference to behavior connected with “eating meat offered to idols.” “However, not all possess this knowledge.” In verse 10 he designates one member as a “man of knowledge” but in verse 11 he refers to another as a “weak man.” It is such a weak man who would not even be regarded as a brother today, or if so regarded, would be called “a hobbyist.” Yet Paul refers to him as “the brother for whom Christ died” and implies that to sin against him is to sin against Christ (verse 12). Instead of ousting one from the fellowship whose knowledge was inferior every attempt was to be made to avoid “causing my brother to fall” (verse 13).

The third reason why knowledge can never become the basis of community existence is because it is always conditioned on past teaching and even if such teaching were correct, the inferences we draw from it might not be so. “There are some who have been so accustomed to idolatry that even now they eat this food with a sense of its heathen consecration, and their conscience being weak, is polluted by the eating” (verse 7). All of us are creatures of environment. Our teachers have been human and we are human. They have passed on their imperfections in knowledge and we have imperfectly understood much of what we have read and studied for ourselves. This need not discourage us because freedom from error is not a condition of reaching heaven. If it were, heaven would have no population. Entrance to the eternal abode is conditioned upon our attitude toward error, upon our willingness to correct our concepts when we become aware of truth. Regardless of our attitude all of us will die with mistaken ideas about many things. Certainly this chapter (1 Corinthians 8) effectively eliminates equality in knowledge as the foundation for fellowship.

We should be reluctant to predicate fellowship with our brothers on a condition which would make it impossible for us to be in the fellowship with God and Christ (1 John 1:3). It is an established truth that “with the judgment you pronounce you will be judged, and the measure you give will be the measure you get” (Matt. 7:2). If we demand that our brothers be our equals in knowledge and in grasp of truth to be in our fellowship, then God will demand that we have perfect and infinite knowledge to be in his fellowship. We thus damn ourselves by the law we devise to exclude others. It is clearly taught that when we judge others while we are inconsistent we “presume upon the riches of his kindness and forbearance and patience” (Rom. 2:4). Instead of excluding our brethren who do not see things as we do we should, “Be humble always and gentle, and patient too. Be forbearing with one another and charitable” (Ephesians 4:2).

Fellowship and Opinion

Fellowship cannot be conditioned on unanimity of opinion. The opinions of honest and sincere men will always differ in certain areas. This is not to be deplored and is not alarming. It is the natural result where persons are trained to think for themselves. Trouble results only when there are those who seek to bind their opinions as matters of law and make them tests of admission to the community of saints. This is dogmatism and it is one of the greatest foes to spiritual peace. It is assumed that all division is caused by men adding to God’s word and that it is the result of a spirit of innovation. This is not true for frequently it is the spirit of Diotrephes (Cp. 3 John) which produces the dissension.

We have no right to make anything a test of entrance into the fellowship which God has not made a condition of entrance into salvation. It is not our business or our right to catechize one concerning his view on the millennium, the manner of the Lord’s coming, the security of the believers, or anything else which he may hold as an opinion. There is room in Christ for differences of opinion. The apostle forever precludes debates over such matters with the words, “As for the man who is weak in faith, welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions” (Romans 14:1). Our brethren do not stand or fall before us but before the Master. They do not belong to us and we have no right to pass judgment upon them (verse 10). We are to “pursue what makes for peace and for mutual upbuilding” (verse 19). Experience will teach us that arguments about opinions do not produce faith and tend to tear down. “Your personal convictions are a matter of faith between yourself and God, and you are happy if you have no qualms of conscience about what you allow yourself to eat” (verse 22).

Fellowship and Interpretation

Fellowship is not to be conditioned on uniformity in interpretation of the documents which make up the new covenant scriptures. There is a difference between revelation and interpretation. Revelation consists of what God has said, interpretation of what men think he meant by what he said. Revelation is an act of the divine mind, interpretation is the result of applying the human mind. There are some very foolish ideas advanced about this matter One such idea is that the scriptures do not need interpreting, they merely need obeying. The absurdity in this position can be seen in the actions of those who make the statement. They have their Bibles marked full of explanatory notes, they conduct studies of an expository nature, they print and distribute papers and tracts in an attempt to make their understanding of the meaning of the scriptures clear. If it is true that the sacred scriptures require no interpretation we ought never to hand a person anything except a copy of the Bible. It would be inconsistent to explain to him the bearing of a single passage. Jesus did not subscribe to this theory for when he found men who failed to understand and were slow to believe, “beginning with Moses and all the prophets, he interpreted to them everything in the scriptures that referred to himself” (Luke 24:27).

Just here we are reminded that some are disturbed by the passage which says, “No prophecy of scripture is a matter of private interpretation” (2 Peter 1:20). This has nothing to do with expounding the meaning of the scriptures, for Peter himself explained the prophecies to the Jews who had studied them for years (Acts 2:16, 25, 34). At Thessalonica Paul spent three weeks during which “he argued with them from the scriptures, explaining and proving that it was necessary for Christ to suffer and rise from the dead” (Acts 17:2, 3). The expression in 2 Peter 1:20 has to do with the origin of the prophecies contained in the sacred scriptures and not with an explanation of them. This is shown by the immediate context. “No prophecy of scripture is a matter of one’s own interpretation, because no prophecy ever came by impulse of man, but men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God.”

The prophets did not see events which occurred and then interpret them. The prophecies do not represent their personal judgment about matters. Prophecy did not come as a result of private observation. Instead, men under the direction of the Holy Spirit predicted in advance the things that would transpire. Of course prophecy has to be interpreted as our Lord himself demonstrated in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16-21), and as Philip showed on the road through the Gaza Strip (Acts 8:35). It is generally true that those who insist the scriptures require no interpretation are the most arbitrary in binding their interpretation upon others. They confuse their interpretation with the word of God.

Another false impression is left by some who teach that the word of God is so plain that it requires little effort and no research to understand. The truth is that there are many difficult and challenging things in the scope of the sacred volume. One of the most common faults of our day is that of over-simplification. We need to be somewhat wary of those who know all of the answers. One of the inspired writers said of Paul, “There are, of course, some things in his letters which are difficult to understand” (2 Peter 3:16). Our own limited study bears out this observation. Fortunately those things which are central to salvation are simplest, while those things which are peripheral are increasingly obscure. It is not necessary that one be able to correctly interpret every passage of divine writ to come into Christ. It is necessary that he accept the testimony of the qualified witnesses that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God.

Those who acknowledge the priesthood of all believers (1 Peter 2:5) must recognize the sacred right of each individual to approach the scriptures for himself. To take that right from others is to lay the foundation by which it may be taken from ourselves. In the exercise of that right one must judge for himself what the implications of scripture must be. To do this demands the use of reason. All men acknowledge the place of reason in forming spiritual convictions because they all produce evidence by which they hope to influence reason. Yet many deny the right of an individual to arrive at a conclusion different than the one they have reached. In a final analysis this amounts to saying that those who thus act feel they are infallible interpreters.

Fellowship and Reasoning

The right to employ reason must involve the possibility of being in error unless one concludes that human reasoning is infallible. That no man is infallible is evidenced by the fact we are told, "Let every one be definite in his own convictions" (Romans 14:15). This indicates that while no man can be trusted to judge for all others each man may be trusted to judge for himself. This avoids pride and arrogance on one hand and menial subservience on the other. It allows the dignity of the individual to remain unimpaired and provides that "your faith might be built not upon human wisdom but upon the power of God" (1 Cor. 2:5).

To forbid a man to change his view or opinion under threat of excommunication may make a hypocrite out of him but it can never make an honest believer. A congregation composed of such persons is not a tribute to God and truth but is a monument of deceit and spiritual dissatisfaction. No one can authoritatively interpret the word of God for another person. If he could interpret it for one he could for ten, if for ten then a hundred, and if for that many he could do it for all. It is of such fiber the fabric of papacy is woven. For this reason God did not condition the fellowship of the saints upon conformity but upon community, the sharing together of the divine life in spite of individual differences.

Even those who deny the unity in diversity are forced to practice it. There is not a faction on earth whose members all concur in the meaning of every scriptural passage. Many of them are at odds over a multitude of scriptures. Their class periods are frequently given over to warm discussion of varied views. They respect these differences in every area except the one which the faction arbitrarily regards as the test of fellowship. On this one matter every person must agree or be thrust out. On every other they may differ seriously. Often the area of their disagreement is more vital to the spiritual welfare than that upon which uniformity is required. No two preachers agree upon explanation of every scripture, not even those who proclaim loudest that the members must see everything alike or be damned.

It is true that fellowship in Christ is not to be equated with endorsement. We are in the fellowship with many who do things we cannot endorse; we endorse many things done by those with whom we are not in the fellowship. Fellowship is from koinonia and relates to the state into which we are called by God. It is brotherhood and is entered by proper response to the good news, that is, by being born again. Endorse is from the Latin en, on, and dorsa, back. It means literally “to sign on the back,” and thus to sanction. Of course those in the fellowship hold views that are divergent about many things, but this does not affect their fellowship.

Paul and Peter were not out of the fellowship when Paul withstood his fellow-apostle to the face (Gal. 2:11), although Paul certainly did not condone his actions or endorse his “not walking uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel” (Gal. 2:14).

Paul was not out of the fellowship as related to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 1:9) although they were guilty of many things he could not endorse. He did not once hint that any of them should come out and start “a faithful church” nor did he threaten to do so if he came. Instead, he said, “The rest will I set in order when I come” (1 Cor. 11:34). We need to face up to the fact that the congregation at Corinth was in much worse state than most of those which have divided in these days. Paul demonstrates the attitude we should manifest toward congregations which engage in some practices we cannot endorse. We should not regard them as wholly right or completely in error. In 1 Corinthians 11:2, he writes, “I must give you credit for remembering what I taught you and adhering to the traditions which I passed on to you,” but in verse 11 he says, “But in giving you the following rules, I cannot commend your conduct.”

If we had been members at Corinth we would probably have split the congregation over the matters which we could not commend. It is astounding that we have developed a theory about fellowship (which means joint participation) that always results in unjointed separation. Our problem is that we have completely missed the basis of our fellowship. We are not partakers of mutual opinions but sharers together in the promise made in Christ Jesus (Eph. 3:6). Diversity of opinion does not cause division. It is dogmatism which produces schism. There is room in Christ for men to work together who have divergent views, but there is not room enough on earth for men to work together who have a factional spirit. We must either develop a healthy love for our brethren or continue to shatter the fabric of brotherhood by an unwholesome love of opinion.

So that there will be no mistake about my personal position I shall be as plain and explicit as possible. I regard as my brothers in the Lord Jesus Christ all sincere immersed believers in Him on this whole earth. Since fellowship is brotherhood these are in the fellowship of which I am a partaker. The brotherhood which I recognize is limited only by the new birth. I am in the fellowship with all who are in Christ Jesus. I do not agree fully with a single one of these. I do not give a blanket endorsement to the ideas, interpretations, or spiritual ideologies, of any of them. I endorse a universal brotherhood of all of God's children but I do not endorse fully any brother who is in it, nor do I demand that any fully endorse my views and opinions. I am bound to all of them by love and not by conformity.

I do not regard the restoration movement as the church of God. I have no doubt that God has children on this earth, and I have brethren in Christ, who have never heard of this American phenomenon. But I do regard as in the fellowship those who are heirs of this movement regardless of their current views about instrumental music, orphan homes, colleges, classes, individual cups, fermented wine in the Lord's Supper, and all the host of other things which became controversial and were elevated to divisive status. Brotherhood is not based upon an attitude toward any of these. It results from the fatherhood of God. I shall love and respect all of His children as my brothers. I will go among them, speak to any of them, and show love and forbearance to all of them. When they come where I am, I will recognize them, call upon them and allow them the full right of sharing in the fellowship of which I am a part. I shall simply ignore the walls and barriers erected by factional men. I shall see my brothers on both sides of these walls.

I must retain my integrity before God and thus refuse to sanction or condone what I personally conceive to be contrary to His design or purpose for my life. But I shall neither seek to lord it over my brethren nor to constitute myself as their judge. I shall allow them to answer to the Master to whom they are amenable as well as myself. I am sick and tired of the warring and jangling of party strife. I shall have no part in it. Instead, it shall be my aim to labor that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven.

These are my views on fellowship and endorsement and for them I must answer unto God in the last great day. “It is a prime requisite in a trustee that he should prove worthy of his trust. But, as a matter of fact, it matters very little to me what you or any man, thinks of me— I don’t even value my opinion of myself. For I might be quite ignorant of any fault in myself— but that doesn’t justify me before God. My only true judge is the Lord” (1 Cor. 4:2-4). It is in his glorious fellowship I have learned the true meaning of fellowship.

The Common Life

Mission Messenger (July 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

One of the tragedies of this age is our tendency to take the majestic concepts revealed by God and reduce them to the trivial and commonplace, to be bandied about by glib tongues often speaking from unconsecrated hearts. In the crucible of human reason, heated by the fires of partisanship, we simmer away the glorious and ennobling truth and leave only the dross. We tend to drag down to the dust that which was designed to lift us up to the heavens. There is hardly a great word of the Christian revelation that has not been “stripped and robbed” and left to languish along the highway of modern theology.

There is no better example of what we mean than the current use of the word “fellowship” by members of “The Church of Christ.” The Greek koinonia is a term of such grandeur that no single English word is adequate to express its varied aspects. The Holy Spirit selected the word which always involves the idea of sharing and employed it to designate our participation in the divine nature and in the redemptive society composed of the ransomed ones. In either case, whether in its divine or human relationship, this fellowship is the sharing of a common life made possible by the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ our Lord.

The very idea of this fellowship was the hidden purpose of God. “He has made known to us his hidden purpose namely, that the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ” (Eph. 1:10). The apostle calls this “the secret of Christ” and identifies the secret as the fact that “through the Gospel the Gentiles are joint heirs with the Jews, part of the same body, sharers together in the promise made in Christ Jesus” (Eph. 3:6). Notice the words “joint heirs” and “sharers together.” These are terms descriptive of fellowship and they are applicable to those who are “part of the same body.”

What makes us “joint heirs?” Is it that we hold the same opinions or have the same views as to the implementation of the apostles’ doctrine? Not at all! “The Spirit of God joins with our Spirit in testifying that we are God’s children; and if children, then heirs. We are God’s heirs and Christ’s fellow-heirs, if we share his sufferings now in order to share his splendour hereafter” (Rom. 8:17). “If children, then heirs!” That which makes us a child of God makes us an heir. What is the condition upon which we continue as such? It is the sharing of a life. On this earth we share a life of suffering; in the hereafter we shall share a life of splendour. In whatever state we are with him, here or hereafter, we share in his life. This is fellowship!

It is obvious that those who share the common life, who are in association with each other because of attachment unto him, will constantly seek to harmonize their opinions and interpretations. But such harmony is an ideal toward which those who are in the fellowship ardently strive. It is not fellowship and should never be confused with it. We share in the common life before we understand everything alike. We share in it though we shall never understand everything alike in our human imperfection. No apostle ever exhorted any congregation of brethren to achieve unity in order to be in the fellowship. Every such command was given to those in the fellowship and because they were in that state.

The family of God is like our physical family. We become sharers of the common life by coming into the family. That which brings us into the family brings us into the common life, makes us sharers of the family relationship. We enter that relationship by birth. Those of us who enter it do not have the same opinions about everything when we enter it nor is it necessary that we ever do in order to remain in it. The family relationship is not contingent upon that. Anyone who predicates fellowship upon unanimity of opinion or understanding lays the foundation for the dissolution of all fellowship. Such a position is unscriptural, impractical, and impossible of attainment. We share in the common life, not because we have the same opinions, but because we have the same parents.

If you want to see how much harmony is produced by basing fellowship upon conformity all you need to do is to examine the status of those who do so. You will find them splintered and rent, challenging and debating each other, refusing to recognize one another as brethren, and generally presenting a disgraceful spectacle to the religious world. If a philosophy is to be judged like a tree, by the fruit it bears, here is one which needs to be cut down, refused and rejected by all thoughtful persons. It breeds exclusiveness and arrogance, it confuses party allegiance with faithfulness to God, it confounds human tradition with divine truth. It makes absolutely impossible the harmony which it demands.

Our fellowship has both a divine and human aspect. On the divine side it is a mystical union and participation in the life of the Lord Jesus Christ through the gift of the Spirit. On the human side it is a fellowship of brethren whose mutual relations are transformed through the gift of the Spirit which they receive. This state is described as one in which “men have been once enlightened, when they have had a taste of the heavenly gift and a share in the Holy Spirit, when they have experienced the goodness of God’s word and the spiritual energies of the age to come” (Heb. 6:4, 5). The fellowship in the Holy Spirit is directly linked with the grace of Christ and love of God. “The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and fellowship in the Holy Spirit, be with you all” (2 Cor. 13:14). Our relationship with the Godhood is established by grace through love and it is a divine fellowship.

Out of the common life in Christ and the sharing in the Spirit comes the urge for thinking and feeling alike. The shared life creates a mutual concern for unity. “If then our common life in Christ yields anything to stir the heart, any loving consolation, any sharing of the Spirit, any warmth of affection or compassion, fill up my cup of happiness by thinking and feeling alike, with the same love for one another, the same turn of mind, and a common care for unity” (Phil. 2:1, 2). The Holy Spirit is not bestowed on a factional basis. He is not a sectarian gift or possession. He will not be confined or restricted by the party walls which men erect about themselves. For that reason the fellowship in Christ Jesus transcends all partisan barriers and embraces and encompasses all of the children of God.

It is regrettable that God’s sheep are still a scattered flock. It is saddening to think of the parties and sects which men have created. But wherever there is a sincere child of God, whether in this faction or that, the Spirit of God dwells in that child and he is in the fellowship because the Spirit is in him. And all such Spirit-filled persons are members of the one body. There is only one church now, there never was but one, there never can be but one. It is the ekklesia of God composed of the “called out” saints. Whoever has heard the call and responded to it is a part of the ekklesia. No splinter, segment or section of our currently divided religious world represents the church of God in its fulness. The sheep have not all been gathered into one partisan corral. While our task is to “unite the Christians in all the sects” it is not to bring them into the fellowship. They are already in it. The fellowship is a divine creation like the ekklesia, indeed it is the ekklesia. It is the fellowship of the called out ones, the saints! It is precisely because they are already in the fellowship that we should seek to bring about a united witness so the members of the one body may be able to function harmoniously that the world may believe that God has sent Jesus!

William Temple said on August 3, 1937, “The church is not an association of men, each of whom has chosen Christ as his Lord; it is a fellowship of men, each of whom Christ has united with himself.” This eminent theologian saw the difference between association and fellowship. More important than that, he saw the difference between a human action and a divine creation. We are a part of the fellowship by an act of God. We cannot purchase a gift of the Spirit nor purchase the Spirit as a gift. We have no power to deprive a man of the Spirit in whom he seeks to dwell. We can deprive such a man of our association but when we do so we suffer inestimable loss and we may not especially harm the man.

We have been deluded and deceived by the Arch-foe into equating that divine state called fellowship with our petty arguments over cups, classes, colleges, fermented wine, orphan homes, music, and a score of other things. In a world where men are distraught, disturbed and dying, where the fiery maw of hell is being furnished fuel by the death of untold, unsaved millions, we have taken the time to turn the sword of the Spirit against God’s children and slash and shiver them to bits over how to break the bread or pass the emblems. While the gray wolves of atheistic communism surround the camp of the saints with their slaver jaws dripping in readiness for the crunching kill, we are indulging in the reckless folly of fratricidal strife. The wolves are united and the sheep are at the throats of one another. Is there more power for unity in a godless ideology than in the crimson tide which streamed down the side of Jesus?

What have we contributed to the world by our philosophy of unity by separation and fusion by fission? Have we restored the church of God? Does someone answer that we have established “The Church of Christ”? We have done more than that. In the United States we have created more than two dozen “Churches of Christ” each of which is the loyal church in the eyes of its partisan adherents who will not even recognize the members of the others. Have you ever watched or listened to a preacher as he was forced to admit reluctantly that one in another faction “may be a brother in error”? Have you noticed how much more emphasis is placed on “error” than on “brother”? While we are separated, segregated, strife-torn, and self-willed, we are all “brothers in error” and those who say they are not make the biggest error of all!

Where was “The Church of Christ” when Thomas Campbell wrote and read his “Declaration and Address” in 1809? There was not a congregation of people on the face of the earth who worshipped under that title. Had the church of Christ become extinct? Was Jesus a king without a subject, a shepherd without a sheep, or a head without a body? To what did the faithful martyrs belong who died during “The Dark Ages” and who are clothed in white raiment, having palm branches in their hands? They were not members of a “local Church of Christ” for there was no such thing known among them. Is it possible that a man can be a member of the one body without holding “membership” in a “Church of Christ”?

When did the Restoration movement become “the Lord’s church”? On what date did the last Christian in the sectarian world desert his sect to become a member of “the faithful church”? In what year was the last wandering sheep gathered in? When did God’s people at last become identified with one American movement or party, so that henceforth all others were sectarians and there were no sectarians left in “The Church of Christ”? When did baptism into Christ become the exclusive right of the party adopting the name “The Church of Christ” and to whom did this sacred rite belong prior to this time so that someone could administer it to one who replanted “The Church of Christ”? Or, should we ask, when was it transferred from the ekklesia of God, catholic and universal, to become the sole possession of an indigenous American party which grew out of a nineteenth century restoration attempt?

It will not be necessary for you to warn me of the consequences of asking such questions. I know what partisan hate and animosity can do. But these things must be faced. Too long we have been blinded by prejudice and hoodwinked by vain tradition. We must be shocked into a return to sanity or we will continue to multiply factions under the false assumption that each new party is a re-creation of the church of God. We have forsaken the goal of the restoration fathers, but even worse, we have betrayed the trust of the Son of God. We have been tricked into denying brotherhood with many of God's children, we have rejected many whom he has accepted. Many whom we have rejected are closer to God than some we have accepted!

“The Church of Christ” today occupies the same relationship to the church of God as did the “Christ party” in Corinth (1 Cor. 11:12). While others were saying, “I am of Paul” or “I am of Apollos” or “I follow Cephas,” a member of this party would say, “I am Christ’s.” But he did it for the same reason that the others said they belonged to various men, to draw a line of demarkation between his party and others in the church of God. Perhaps it was to this arrogant group who sought to make Jesus a party chieftain that the apostle addresses his first question, “Is Christ divided?” It certainly must have been to this faction he wrote, “Look facts in the face. Someone is convinced, is he, that he belongs to Christ? Let him think again, and reflect that we belong to Christ as much as he does” (2 Cor. 10:7). Perhaps this could well be said to many of us by thousands of God’s dear children in the world today.

Fellowship in Christ Jesus is not joint participation in the Lord’s Supper conditioned on either leavened or unleavened bread, fermented or unfermented wine, one container or individual cups, with the bread broken before distribution or broken in turn by each one to whom it is passed. Fellowship in Christ Jesus is not joint participation in Bible study, either in classes or one group, with or without uninspired literature. Fellowship in Christ Jesus is not joint participation in this or that program of preaching or charitable work. It is not joint participation in the song service with or without instrumental accompaniment. All of these things have created problems among those who are in the fellowship and they have been approached and resolved in various and divergent ways. All of them, in view of the orthodox philosophy of maintaining purity of doctrine by separating from brethren, have been allowed to become divisive. This is a shameful tragedy in our history.

But fellowship is infinitely greater and more wonderful than all of these. It is sharing in a life, in the divine nature. It is joint participation in the Holy Spirit, the gift of God to all of his children. We must not conclude that the Holy Spirit enters us only when we recognize and confess error and leaves us when we make a mistake. The Holy Spirit is our assurance of life and our Father in heaven no more kills his children when they make a mistake than I would kill one of my children for the same reason.

The indwelling Spirit is not an indication that one is free from error or he would dwell in none of us. The Spirit is a testimonial to the fact that we are sons of God. "The Spirit bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God." We may grieve the Spirit and often do; we may quench the spirit and no doubt we do so, but the Spirit does not leave us when grieved any more than a father deserts his children when they aggravate him.

Let us grant that brethren are wrong in their reasoning when they adopt individual cups, Bible classes, uninspired literature, instrumental music, etc., still these do not destroy the fellowship for it is not based upon any of them, nor upon all of them put together. Those who adopt them are still brethren if they were before. Fellowship is not something we can extend or withdraw. It is a divine relationship which God has created. It is brotherhood! A mistaken idea at this juncture causes many to plaintively ask, “How can I be in the fellowship with someone who uses instrumental music in the worship?” They ask, “If I recognize such a person as in the fellowship do I not jointly participate in his music which I believe to be wrong?”

Like the apostle I shall use a human example. There were six children in my father’s family. Suppose that two of them played cards for recreation and I was opposed to the practice. Would my recognition of them as my brothers mean that I jointly participated in their card game? No one would be so foolish as to say it did. Would our honest difference over this form of activity negate the family relationship? Would I be unable to cooperate with them in anything at all seeing that I could not do so in this one particular? Would I be unable to jointly participate with them in painting the house on Tuesday seeing that I could not jointly participate with them in their game on Monday? The fact is we did not become brothers because we played cards or did not, but because we had the same parents. We were sharers in the family life although we could not in good conscience all jointly participate in the same activities. The fellowship in Christ is the sharing in a life and not in an opinion or interpretation!

We need to mature in our thinking and exhibit that moral and spiritual stature which will enable us to see and speak of fellowship in its true and majestic magnitude. Let us cease to equate it with endorsement or subservient conformity and recognize it for what it is— the mutual sharing in the life of our Lord through the gift of grace. As for me, I regard every sincere baptized believer in the Lord Jesus as in the fellowship. While distressed by the differences which plague us and the divisions which beset us, I shall allow none of these to dissolve the divine relationship. I could not do so if I would for it is not in my power to do so. Jesus is greater than the church and the church is greater than any faction or sect. It is greater than all of them together. It is the redemptive society composed of all of the redeemed. It is the fellowship of the holy ones, the brotherhood of the saved.

How Far Is Too Far?

Mission Messenger (July 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

Since I began to devote my efforts primarily to promoting unity of all believers in our Lord Jesus I have become the object of attention of a goodly number of preachers who previously ignored me. They do not know exactly what to do with me for the simple reason that I no longer represent any splinter, segment or faction of the disciple brotherhood. If I would limit my association with, and visits to, one particular group, they could categorize me. This would be a big relief because they know how to handle another partisan. They are not so adept at dealing with a free man in Christ who can love them all regardless of their variegated opinions and interpretations.

Those who now come to question me on the basis that they wish to know what to tell those who ask them about me, generally end up by saying they appreciate my attitude but they think I have gone too far. I appreciate their attitude also because for a good many years a lot of them have been telling those who asked them that I believed a lot of things I never dreamed of believing. I suspect it would still be a little better if they would tell those who ask them about me to ask me and let me tell them. But how far is too far? A careful analysis will show that in every instance those who make the statement are perfectly willing to go along with much of the teaching on “fellowship” provided they can retain the party of their allegiance intact and undisturbed. The problem is not so much that I am advocating anything startling or new. My approach is revolutionary because I insist on practicing what a lot of preachers have always hinted at.

A number of brethren in the past have written in the “orthodox” journals and spoken in college lectureships the same things I write and say. The difference is that with me these ideas are not just liting propaganda but life principles. I propose to implement them in my life and this is the thing that some cannot take. The members of the non-instrument “Church of Christ” party would welcome anything I could do to get the factional adherents to cease fighting over Herald of Truth, institutional homes, colleges, the one-man preacher pastor system, Sunday schools, uninspired literature, unfulfilled prophecy, individual cups, fermented wine, the order of worship, and all of the motley group of other things which have shaken and shivered them to fragments. So long as I am willing to restrict my efforts to the factions which oppose instrumental music I can be tolerated, but when I regard those who use instrumental music as my brethren and move among them in love I am going too far.

I am constantly besieged by anxious querists asking, “How can you fellowship the Christian Church?” Patiently I go back over the ground and explain to them that they are using the word “fellowship” in a sense in which the Holy Spirit never used it. I point out that I do not “fellowship” the “Christian Church” or the “Church of Christ.” I am in the fellowship with all of God’s children who are in these segments and with a lot of others who are in neither of them. This concept of brotherhood is as far above the thinking of the average “Church of Christ preacher” as the heavens are higher than the earth. With him it is not enough to be opposed to instrumental music but one must also be a member of a non-instrument party (his particular one) in all of its ungodly and unwholesome exclusivism.

This is not the end of sorrows! My brethren in the so-called Independent Christian Churches, sometimes called the “Conservatives,” cautiously welcome my brotherly treatment of them. They have been blasted, stigmatized and assailed with such animosity and venom by non-instrument zealots in the past that it is hard for them to realize that a man can oppose instrumental music and still regard them with fraternal love. I present a problem to them from several angles. Some of them regard me with outright suspicion. They still think there is “a catch to it” and if they allow me too much freedom among them the time will come when I will go berserk, and like Carrie Nation, snatch a hatchet out from under my cloak and start smashing their electric organs and grand pianos. They are always a little uneasy when they invite me to speak and heave a gentle sigh of relief when it is over.

However, the real problem with the “Independents” is that I regard myself as being in the fellowship with all of God’s children who happen to be in the “Disciples of Christ” denomination. They are grateful that I do not make instrumental music a test of fellowship or brotherhood in Christ, but for me to exhibit brotherly regard for the “Disciples” and to speak at their invitation is going too far. They would much prefer that I be affiliated with the “Conservative” party but since I refuse to do that they will still tolerate me if I “draw a line” against the Disciples. It is not enough to be opposed to “open membership” but I must enroll in a closed party to oppose it.

Of course I do not restrict my regard for my brethren to those only who are in some segment of the Restoration movement. I am no longer suffering from the vain delusion that this movement is the church of God. The flock of God in this age is a scattered flock. All of the sheep have not yet been led or driven into one exclusive corral. Every sincere immersed believer on this earth is God’s child and my brother. Some of these sheep are caught in strange thickets. I do not think I’ll help their plight by belaboring them over the head with rod and staff because they allowed themselves to become thus entangled.

Because they are sheep of God they are a part of the flock of God even though still in the wilderness. While they are seeking to extricate themselves I will recognize them, call upon them and help them when they are where I am. I know how difficult it is to extricate oneself from partisan brambles and briers.

How far is too far? In each instance the party spirit cries out that one who goes beyond the party limits goes too far. Each faction has drawn its line on the shores of time and declares, "This far and no farther shalt thou come!" To all partisans unity is based on conformity and the party norm is the will of God. I refuse any longer to allow my conscience to be regulated by fallible men and my love to be circumscribed by human tradition. I regard the party spirit as a sin of the deepest dye. I shall respect every child of God as my brother, commending what I can and condemning what I cannot commend.

The reaction to my stand by entrenched partisans is interesting. Because I steadfastly refuse to become aligned with any of their parties and retain the right to think for myself "without benefit of clergy" they assume that I am not sincere and am a mere self-serving opportunist. They just simply cannot conceive of how any man can love those who differ with him, so they consider that my love is not genuine. They are waiting (somewhat wistfully in some instances) for me to crack up and reveal the same old bitter factional attitude which I once manifested. They wait in vain. There have been too many long nights of weariness and praying, too many tears, too much heartache to return to the narrow, bigoted, intolerant, selfish, arrogant attitude of yesteryear, forged by the chains of orthodoxy. Whatever happens to me now, whether I live or die, it will be to the Lord and to no party. I shall face any eventuality as a free man in Christ Jesus. Praise his holy name!

More than any other person on earth I realize my own weaknesses. I am not at all above the temptation to go too far. My judgment is not infallible, my strength is not supernatural.

But no man can go too far in recognition of his brothers when he goes only as far as God goes. God recognizes all of his children as children. I cannot go too far when I regard all of them as brethren. They are God's children while scattered abroad, they are his before they are gathered in one. "He prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation, and not for that nation only, but also that he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad" (John 11:51, 52).

With the bonds and restraints, the ties and the straitjacket of the party spirit holding us back the temptation is not that we shall go too far but that we shall not go far enough. If we mark out our own limits and draw our own lines we will always be sectarian. Whether a man is "a liberal sectarian or a conservative sectarian" makes but little real difference, for it is not being of a liberal or conservative bent or turn of mind that is a sin, but being a sectarian! Any artificial barrier erected to exclude brethren from brotherhood makes of those who remain within such barriers a sect. No one can go far enough until he removes that barrier and regards all of God's children as brothers— and treats them as such. It is the transformity of the new creation and not the conformity to old tradition which makes us children of the Most High. If one listened to a lot of brethren he would not go too far because he would never go at all! He would die as he lived— a partisan!

It is useless to appeal to the sect of the satisfied or to the cult of conformity. But there are those in every party who are members of the fellowship of the concerned. Our plea is to all of these. Let us discard "the yoke which neither we nor our fathers could bear." Let us rise above the narrow confines of legalism and restore the concept of the glorious church without spot of schism or wrinkle of rancor. May party cries cease! May Jesus Christ be enthroned in our hearts as he is in heaven. This is a work for heroic men and not for cowards. The trumpet is sounding! The call of God goes forth! Let us not fail him in this hour of destiny!

Adventures in Religion (8)

Mission Messenger (July 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

Real vital faith makes men “too good for this world.” I am not speaking of the watered-down version of belief which characterizes most of us in these days. Saturated as it is by doubt and diluted with disgust, it produces characters which are adapted and adjusted to the world, and these are more affected by the world than they affect it. There isn’t anything particularly heroic about the average Christian because he is more inclined to be “average” than Christian.

The spiritual sterility which passes for religion is no doubt the result of a good many factors. In the first place, it is considered in bad taste to demonstrate one’s religion openly. If he would avoid the charge of radicalism or fanaticism, he must cleverly conceal the fact that he believes. Our world has undergone a complete transformation since the days when Jesus was upon the earth. In those times men wanted to appear more religious than they were. They would disfigure their countenances so they would appear gaunt and hollow-eyed and others would give them credit for fasting. They had a trumpet sounded to announce a great contribution to charity. No longer do men want recognition for such gifts except when filling out their income tax blanks.

One of the big problems Jesus faced was to keep everyone from getting in early to secure a front pew. He was pretty stern in his denunciation of those who hurried to meeting to grab a chief seat in an elevated position where all the other worshipers could see they were present. If Jesus were to see the average congregation in these days he would be surprised at how well his teaching is being heeded. Unfortunately, the motivation is not quite that sincere and wholesome. The “amen corner” is as unpopular as a spoken “Amen” is presumptuous. It is amazing how those who yell like Comanche Indians at a Saturday night ball game sit like wooden cigar store Indians on Sunday morning. The quickest way to lose status now is to “go all out” for religion. It generally embarrasses your associates in the congregation, especially if they have friends who are not members. You are expected to “play down” any enthusiasm for real Christian service, to treat it lightly and jokingly. Of course, you are expected to do your share but it must be in nonchalant fashion, with a sort of “don’t care whether school keeps or not” attitude. It will not do to attack the matter seriously or soberly. If you do someone will start calling you “preacher.” This is an indication that religion is now a business to be run by professionals, and amateurs have no business “monkeying around” with its management.

It is true that many have developed two sets of religious attitudes. One is reserved for the public services. Surrounded by stained glass windows filtering in an eerie glow they have a sanctimonious expression as they sing, “Rescue the perishing, care for the dying.” As soon as they get out of the door of what they call “the sanctuary” and get a filter tip lit up, they engage in good-natured chaffing and banter about the very message which a few minutes before they pretended to hear with earnest concentration. The difference is even more apparent the next day at work or on the golf course. It is quite obvious that religion has come to be merely a buffer to ward off or soften the blows of fate. It is like a fire insurance policy which one purchases because of the personality of the salesman. It isn’t necessary to know anything about the home office if you keep your premiums paid up.

Faith has succumbed to fashion. Loyalty to Christ has been swallowed up in looseness of life. It is easier to belittle than to believe, to trust in luck than to trust in God. We have a “form of godliness but deny the power thereof.” Our hope is not in the hereafter but in what we are after here. We estimate spiritual growth by the figures on a bulletin board. Our standing is determined by statistics. Success is a matter of attendance and accounts. It is not so much a statement of conviction as the statement from the bank which is of vital concern.

If we are to alter this state of affairs and recapture the significance of the transforming power of the Spirit in our lives we must be willing to “launch out into the deep” in the realm of faith. True, it is safer to let down our nets closer to shore, but that which is safest may not be sanest, if the object is to catch fish. Faith involves a risk. There is a difference between being saved and “playing it safe.” The real heroes of faith were not those who proved they were as good as anyone else in the world, but those who demonstrated that they were “too good for the world.” The world got rid of many of them because they had already rid themselves of the world. The motto of the world is “Conform them or crucify them!”

One of our crucial mistakes is to think we must wait for some big crisis in which to demonstrate faith. But the quality of faith does not depend upon the magnitude of the problem which confronts us. Besides that, the church is always at crisis while in this world. A high school student who has been sitting with the group in the back of the auditorium may become a leader if he starts sitting on the very front seat, exactly as one demonstrated non-conformity in the days of Jesus by sitting in an inferior position. It may take faith to deliberately choose to lend your influence to a small congregation where you can truly help rather than to go where all is made ready to your hand. A large congregation is frequently a hiding place where one may “lose himself” figuratively— and literally!

There is a raw recklessness about genuine faith which makes it border upon madness to the casual and indifferent. It is not mere coincidence that the terms “the cowardly” and “the faithless” appear together in the category of the condemned. Nothing is more disconcerting to any sect than for one to rise above conformity and “preach the good news of the faith which once he tried to destroy” (Gal. 1:23). To fling oneself into such a task with utter abandon can only bring the charge, “You are raving; too much study is driving you mad.” But to all who confuse faith with fidgeting and floundering around in what is called “religious activity” in these times, we recommend a reading of the account of the truly faithful. Read it slowly and seriously!

“Through faith they overthrew kingdoms, established justice, saw God’s promises fulfilled. They muzzled ravening lions, quenched the fury of fire, escaped death by the sword. Their weakness was turned to strength, they grew powerful in war, they put foreign armies to rout. Women received back their dead raised to life. Others were tortured to death, disdaining release, to win a better resurrection. Others, again, had to face jeers and flogging, even fetters and prison bars. They were stoned, they were sawn in two, they were put to the sword, they went about dressed in skins of sheep or goats, in poverty, distress, and misery. They were too good for this world. They were refugees in deserts and on the hills, hiding in caves and holes in the ground” (Hebrews 11:32-38). Think of this the next time the congregation spends an hour in business meeting arguing over whether to secure cushions for the pews!

Getting Untangled

Mission Messenger (August 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It was Rupertus Meldenius who coined the slogan, “In essentials unity; in non-essentials, liberty; in all things, charity.” Those who are heirs of the Restoration movement have generally altered this to read, “In matters of faith, unity; in matters of opinion, liberty; in all things, charity.” Unquestionably, the formula was originally pronounced as a basis for encouraging unity through promotion of charity in all things. In application, however, it has produced division through argument over the first two points. It is not an exaggeration to say that we are a people splintered by a slogan.

While our disunity is regrettable and disgraces our profession it is not wholly bad. It is apparent that it is an indirect result of a motivation that is commendable. There has been a constant attempt to preserve what men conceive to be “matters of faith” and a determined resistance against erosion of spiritual values by allowing “matters of faith” to be relegated to the realm of “matters of opinion.” It is possible that, in an attempt to avoid the chaos of anarchy, we have adopted the coercion of dogmatism, but we have done so with a view of defending the faith.

It is our personal view that our fathers when confronted with the problem of innovations were betrayed into adopting a philosophy of attempting to preserve doctrinal purity by separation from brethren. This was no doubt the result of fear prompted by a love for truth. We do not censure them for their decision. No doubt they did the best they could under the circumstances but they passed along to us not only a heritage of disunity but the thought-pattern which will continue to divide us every time someone is forced by conscience to dissent from the party norm. We have lived long enough to see what our fathers could not see— the fruit of the seed which they planted. If we expect to eliminate the fruit of strife we must stop planting the seed of division.

It is apparent that our philosophy for settling problems is not of God, for He is “not the author of confusion but of peace.” To continue blindly along the road to disunity under the mistaken idea that every time we create a new faction we please God and plant his church anew is to perpetuate a species of folly which does no honor to our mental processes. Nor can we retain the philosophy and half-heartedly settle our lesser difficulties on a different basis. We must reject and renounce the whole theory that brotherhood is based upon conformity and that we please the Father by treating some of his children like pagans and pariahs. We must go all the way back to the place where the philosophy was adopted and began to be applied and restore a sense of brotherhood and family relationship in which to approach our varied problems from a totally new perspective.

In an honest attempt to do this very thing I propose an investigation of our accepted slogan. I shall be quite candid and forthright for no other attitude will achieve what needs to be done in restoring the framework of peace. I am aware that what I am about to say will run counter to what most of us have always been taught but it is what we have always been taught that has created our partisan position and shivered us into splinters. We can never regain unity by merely promoting and parroting the party line which is responsible for our disunity.

It would be easy and pleasant for me to deal only with the divisions that have occurred by opposition of brethren to those things approved by the segment with which I have been associated. We can brush aside their arguments as inconsequential and look upon them with a kind of tolerant compassion. For example, we have always had Bible classes on Lord's Day. By the same token, I think we have always regarded those who oppose such classes as being somewhat immature and childish. We knew that classes were in the realm of opinion and why any one should make a great ado about it was beyond us. The fact that the opposition regarded classes as in the realm of faith we discounted as being characteristic of "hobbyists."

The same thing is true regarding individual containers for the fruit of the vine in the Lord's Supper. In our particular faction this was a mere matter of opinion. We were not seeking to bind the practice on anyone. We used individual cups but if others wanted to use one drinking glass that was their business. We would not disturb them and we didn't want them bothering us. We could smile benignly upon those who "ignorantly" regarded such things as matters of faith and patronizingly pray that the Lord would open their eyes so they could see as well as ourselves.

I could ingratiate myself with the members of the party in which I grew up, some of whom think I have "gone liberal" as they quaintly express it, if I would confine this article to a defence of what we have. I could make it clear that we regard those who oppose cups and classes as brethren, that we do not propose to bind these things upon them, and we will tolerate them while they are "growing up" to our ideal stature. This would reassure my associates who have not known quite how to regard me or what to do with me. They would feel that I was "back in the fold" and that I was "safe" and "sound."

But there is another side to the story. There are those who have adopted things we have always opposed, such as institutional homes, a professional pastor system, missionary societies and instrumental music. In these things the shoe is on the other foot and the same brethren who are so anxious for me to label cups and classes as matters of opinion now insist that I regard these other things as matters of faith. But the brethren who have them look upon them as matters of opinion and they are a little bit amused that we create such a furore over them and regard them as matters of faith. They are not generally seeking to bind them upon us and they are perfectly willing to tolerate us if we will “stay out of their hair” and not agitate them about matters they consider to be opinions.

I confess I would feel a little forlorn about our faction if it were not for the fact that almost every other faction is in the same boat, or in another boat on the same pond. Each faction belongs both to “the haves” and “the have-nots” with the possible exception of the one on top and the one on the bottom of the party pile. To the one on top everything is a “matter of opinion” and they have no faith; to the one on the bottom everything is a “matter of faith” and they have no opinion, that is, they do not think. The first is pro-everything and the second is anti-everything! In between these two are all the rest of us striving to distinguish between what we call “faith” and “opinion.” Is there any alleviation possible for our divided state or must we be doomed to constant dissension and strife? Perhaps we are too optimistic but we would like to suggest that a non-partisan evaluation of our state may provide a better framework for our future association. Before we make any suggestions let us observe the following points which may serve as a foundation for our study.

1. In our currently divided state anything which is possessed by one faction and opposed by the members of another is regarded as a “matter of opinion” by those possessing it and a “matter of faith” by those opposing it. Thus, everything which is credited with contributing to division is regarded by some brethren as in the realm of faith and by others as in the realm of opinion. Missionary societies, instrumental music, colleges, the one-man pastor system, orphan homes, classes, individual cups, fermented wine, and all the host of other troublesome issues are either “matters of faith” or “matters of opinion” depending upon the perspective from which they are viewed.

2. In our naive vocabulary a sectarian is one who has what we oppose; a hobbyist is one who opposes what we have. In the faction in which I was reared those who endorsed instrumental music were sectarians; those who opposed classes and individual containers were hobbyists. In turn, we were categorized as sectarian by those who opposed cups and classes. All of the factions regard others as sectarian or hobbyistic except the farthest extreme groups. To one of these everyone else is a hobbyist and there are no sectarians; to the other everyone else is a sectarian and there are no hobbyists.

3. The divine revelation affords no specific catalogue of what we term “matters of faith” and “matters of opinion” and does not use these terms to designate or define separate areas. Principles are laid down which are to be used as guide-posts of interpretation and warnings are issued against the dogmatic spirit. If you were to give one hundred men each a sheet of paper and ask them to list all matters of faith on one side and all matters of opinion on the other side, it is probable that no two lists would be the same, unless the authors indulged in partisan collusion and consultation.

4. Every party is built around certain points of emphasis and these are made central in the thought and essential to the existence of that party. These points are always based upon interpretation of certain scriptures or upon inferences drawn from the scriptures. They are not matters of positive revelation and for this reason are not concurred in universally. Although agreement is demanded upon these matters in order to remain in the good graces of the party, wide divergencies of viewpoint are entertained and tolerated in other areas.

Faith and Opinion

It is clear to any unbiased observer that we have a double standard; one by which we judge those who have things we oppose, another by which we judge those who oppose things we have. In the first case we demand of others what we ourselves are unwilling to do in the second. When certain ones oppose what we have we insist it is our right as the ones who possess the things to determine they are matters of opinion. When we oppose what others have we deny them the right to determine what is in the realm of opinion. Let us be specific. This is crucial since it involves our consistency and integrity.

Take the average non-instrument “Church of Christ” which has Bible classes, for example. When others oppose their classes the members insist upon acceptance of their decision that this is in the realm of opinion. But when opposing instrumental music they insist that those who have it also accept their decision that it is in the realm of faith. They are to be supreme judges in every case. On what ground can one party argue that it is the sole repository of truth and all others must kow-tow to its decisions and distinctions? If we demand that those who use the instrument, which they regard as a matter of opinion, give it up in behalf of unity, are we not by the same reasoning obligated to give up classes and individual cups, which we regard as matters of opinion, in order to have unity? Who determines which one of our more than two dozen parties is “the faithful church” to whose infallible pronouncements and irrevocable decisions all others must do obeisance?

It is this web of inconsistencies and maze of absurdities into which we have fallen that make so many despair of our ever attaining to any degree of workable unity. I do not agree with their pessimistic outlook. On the contrary I regard our divided state as one which clamors so loudly for correction that something will be done because something must be done. Something is being done! We will not alleviate the situation by trying to untangle each knot in the snarled up mess. We must go back and re-think our position on the basis of righteousness, truth and love, without reference to partisan prejudice. We cannot solve our problem, for instance, by attacking it as members of two warring clans— “The Christian Church” and “The Church of Christ.” We can only solve it by approaching it as brothers in the Lord and members of the one body. Let us study it in that light just once and see what a difference it makes.

Simply because the problems involved in the use of the instrument have been so great I want to deal with it in this discussion. Perhaps no other question has troubled the heirs of the Restoration movement any more than this one. I have previously analyzed for our readers the historical, temperamental and psychological factors which elevated it to a status not commensurate with its value. I cannot now review those things, but it is generally recognizable that this is a major barrier in our relationship. If we can resolve it or even lessen the tensions it has created we will by that very achievement do much to adjust other and lesser problems. Regardless of other points of dissension we have two great segments of the Restoration movement today which are distinguished from each other by their respective attitudes toward instrumental music in the corporate worship. They are even frequently referred to as “instrumental” and “non-instrumental,” thus demonstrating that this is a prime issue.

Those who oppose instrumental music generally assert that it is in the realm of faith; those who endorse it affirm that it is a matter of opinion. Both sides agree that no opinion should be made a test of fellowship and that we should be tolerant with divergent opinions. However, so long as one side regards the use of the instrument as being in the realm of faith it appears there can be no fraternization until the other is willing to renounce the instrument. Accordingly, those who oppose the instrument refuse any brotherly recognition to those who employ it. Generally they will not even call on such a person to lead in prayer if he visits their meetings; frequently they refuse to acknowledge him as a child of God or a brother in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Those who use instrumental music in corporate worship are convinced that their opposers are making laws which God did not make and are seeking to bind such laws upon them. They feel their Christian liberty is at stake and to relinquish the instrument at the demand of the opposing forces is to “surrender to the antis.” They rebel against the very thought of acknowledging that to be a sin which their conscience leads them to believe is a matter of indifference. The two attitudes create a stalemate and make it appear there is no way by which a real sense of brotherhood can be restored until one side or the other “gives in.” Neither side can conscientiously do so with their current views.

Which viewpoint is correct? Is the use of the instrument in the realm of faith or is it in the realm of opinion? Because there are two answers given we may find a solution which will allow us to regard each other as Christians and make it possible for us to work together in some areas although we may not eliminate all of the points of tension and friction. This will certainly be better than the present state of absolute isolation from each other. We must begin by a recognition of each other as brothers. This is easily done if we will visualize a congregation worshipping together as brethren in Christ. Certain ones begin to suggest that they would like to see an instrument used in the praise service. The controversy eventually waxes warm and they separate from each other. Those who desired to have the instrument now begin using one. So there are two groups of worshipers in the community; one with the instrument, the other without. But if they were brothers before, they are brothers still. Putting in an instrument did not negate the new birth by which they entered God’s family.

Each must admit the honesty of the other. Opposition to an instrument does not make one honest; endorsement of the instrument does not make one dishonest. So we have two groups of honest brethren differing as to the scriptural propriety of instrumental music. Since we are obligated to avoid “setting at nought a brother” each must treat the other with proper respect and regard for the divine relationship. It will help to remember that the new covenant scriptures nowhere specifically brand the use of instrumental music as a sin. Those who conclude it is a sin do so by deduction from certain scriptural principles. Those who endorse the instrument say that such deduction is not warranted by the facts in the case. Whether or not the use of the instrument is justified is a question of interpretation.

It is the opinion of one group based upon study of God’s revelation that the use of instrumental music is wrong; it is the opinion of the other group based upon their study of God’s word that its use is justifiable. It is a matter of opinion then whether the use of the instrument is a “matter of faith” or a “matter of opinion.” Since all are agreed that we dare not divide over opinions, we are obligated to respect the views of each other until such time as we can decide whether the question is in the realm of faith or opinion. When we can all agree upon whether it is one or the other the question will be settled, for all of us are anxious to have unity on matters of faith, and to avoid division over matters of opinion. Meanwhile, one side of the issue cannot dogmatically assert it is one or the other and force brethren into conformity contrary to conscience. All we can do is to avoid making it a test of fellowship until we arrive at the point where we can sincerely agree upon its status.

But suppose we never reach such agreement? We must continue to love and respect each other as brethren until we stand before the judgment bar of God. He will adjust all of those matters in conformity with his own will and eternal purpose. “But why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at nought thy brother? for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ” (Romans 14:10). All matters not clearly revealed will finally be adjudicated by Him to whom all of us, instrumental and non-instrumental alike, claim to direct our praise and homage. We are not commanded to love instrumental music but we are commanded to love our brethren and not to “set them at nought” over matters of opinion.

Does this mean that in many communities the brethren will continue to meet in separate locations? Certainly so. In some areas, through love which transcends all else, there may be a gradual integration of forces which will enable all to maintain spiritual integrity of individual conscience. In most cases this will not soon occur, in many cases it will never do so. But there will be a recognition of brotherhood and a realistic application of the principle of local autonomy of the congregation which will enable both groups to respect the opinion of each other. The oneness for which we plead is not a geographical unity but a spiritual affinity. There are many areas besides singing in which we do agree and in these we may lift up a united witness and testimony. We should not allow our views about one facet of service in which we disagree to negate all of those areas in which we agree. Because one light is burnt out in a chandelier is no excuse for bursting all of the other bulbs and creating a total blackout. If someone throws a ball through the front window we will gain nothing by smashing all the others out!

What can one do whose conscience forbids him to join in the praise service when an instrument is used? He can refrain from singing under such circumstances and should do so. He need not be impolite or boorish, but remember the injunction, “Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God” (Rom. 14:22). He can meditate in silence and be grateful to God that an increasing passion of love for the brotherhood makes it possible for him to respect those whose views and opinions are so divergent from his own. At the same time he can pray for the day when an even greater sense of fellowship and unity will dispel the clouds and clear the mists away.

Would it not be better for such a person just to stay away from meetings where the instrument is used? This depends upon the person. Each must be allowed the liberty of private decision. As for myself, I cannot stay away from those whom I love and regard as brothers. I feel obligated on the basis of 2 Corinthians 2:8 to confirm my love to all of my brothers. I think this must be done through association and by overt acts. I want to learn from my brothers regardless of how much I differ with them on certain things. I do not want to impoverish my spirit by an attitude of exclusivism.

I am sometimes asked how I am received by those among whom I go. I can truthfully state that a majority of the brethren in all of the various factions and segments are kind and considerate. There are always exceptions, of course. In one school where I spoke in the chapel service, one of the professors declared I was not in fellowship with them, contrary to my avowal, because I did not join in the singing when the instrument was played. Upon several other occasions the brethren have exhibited some resentment because I stood in respectful silence during the song service. I overlook these little childish demonstrations of the party spirit toward me because I realize there is a deeply ingrained fear of and animosity toward the “Antis” by every group. It is difficult for many to see how one can be opposed to the use of instrumental music and not be a part of an “Anti-instrument party.” Actually, those who demand that one sing where the instrument is used are clearly making the instrument a test of fellowship. It will take a long time to outgrow our traditional feelings and we will need to make a good many allowances for each other.

I cannot help but feel that it is best for us to face up frankly and openly to our differences. I do not mean that we should argue about them all of the time as if these were the only matters of value in the Christian life. Most of them are not central to the Christian concept at all. But we should not be wishy-washy and namby-pamby. When I call upon a brother from the “Christian Church” who attends my meetings I have no illusions about his views. I know he does not agree with my ideas about instrumental music. If I waited to call upon one who agreed with me on every interpretation I would never call upon anyone. When I move freely among those who use instrumental music they know my position. It is precisely because we differ and recognize the fact that makes our joint association so effective in dispelling the evil influence of the party spirit.

Because I believe in congregational autonomy I do not demand when brethren invite me to address them that they silence the instrument. When they voluntarily do so out of deference to my feelings and the views of those who accompany me, I rejoice, not because the instrument is not used, but because of the manifestation of brotherly love and courtesy which are the ornaments of Christian humility. Ornaments may not make a person any better but they may make him more attractive.

Instrumental music is not our only problem. It is just one of many. I have referred to it because, in the eyes of many, it is the gravest one. Indeed, there are those among the two dozen non-instrument factions who would gladly discuss settling the differences among themselves if we would exclude the brethren who use the instrument from consideration. This is a childish approach and will never really settle anything. We are divided because we have inherited a philosophy of maintaining doctrinal purity by division among brethren. This fallacious and unworkable system was devised by our fathers and first applied by them when instrumental music was introduced. It is useless to try and adjust our problems which have arisen since that time while retaining the false concept which gave them birth.

The axe must be laid at the root of the tree. We must go back to the initial cleavage and restore the concept of brotherhood in spite of differences. There is little use to grub out the sprouts while the roots lie untouched for we will only provide for other divisions in the future. What I have said in this essay about instrumental music is applicable to charitable institutions, colleges, individual cups, Bible classes, uninspired literature, fermented wine, and all of the other troublesome issues. Many who are upon both sides of these questions are honest, sincere, humble saints of God. They want to serve Him acceptably. They do not want to be uncharitable and divisive. They realize the sad state in which Zion languishes.

But they have grown up in parties, or grown up and come into parties, each of which thinks it is the church of God to the exclusion of all others. They cannot see how they can be true to God and love those who differ with them to the extent that they can cut across the party lines. The hope for the future lies in the fact that without a single exception everyone of these will affirm that we dare not divide over opinions. Now we do not ask those who use individual containers to regard this as a matter of faith and seek to bind their use upon others. We would oppose that. Neither do we ask those who oppose individual containers to regard it as a matter of opinion and begin to adopt them. We would oppose that as a flagrant violation of conscience.

Here is our proposal. Since honest brethren sincerely disagree over whether the use of individual containers is a matter of faith or a matter of opinion, let us remember that it is a problem of interpretation. The big question now before us is an opinion as to whether the use of cups is a matter of faith or a matter of opinion. Since we cannot force another to see the things as we do let us respect each man's right of opinion as to which category is correct. In this fashion we can at least maintain a relationship which will allow us to work together in many areas as brethren with hope that time, love, and the Holy Spirit, may bring to pass a better day. No one need give up any truth he has ever learned, no one need sacrifice one item of conscience. Let congregations determine their own procedure with utmost love for others who differ. Let us visit each other and share with each other in such meetings as do not demand sacrifice of spiritual integrity.

To those who put Christ first and exalt him above all else a sense of brotherhood is greater than any view about music or cups. As the divine magnet who draws all men unto himself, he should exert enough power to hold us close enough to him that we shall remain together. So long as Jesus is our only creed this will be true; when we allow other things to become a creed we will dissolve over differences. If Jesus is central in our concept of The Way, our agreement in him will be more powerful than our disagreement about things on the rim of Christianity. We will be transformed by him rather than conformed to each other.

But we are asked if a man can reach heaven who is in error? Certainly so, else there would be no one in heaven. Freedom from error is not a condition of reaching heaven; it is attitude toward error which determines our worthiness or unworthiness. One cannot renounce a thing as error until he learns it is an error. There is a difference between being evil and being mistaken. No man is infallible so no one is free from error. We must not equate wrong notions with rebellion against God. One can misunderstand a parent without revolting against his authority. There are some in every party who are dishonest and unjust; there are many who are honestly doing the best they know how to do. None of us know all there is to know about everything; all of us have much to learn. We can learn more readily and help each other more fully, if we will treat one another with brotherly kindness and courtesy. This is the way of love!

Christ and the Church

Mission Messenger (August 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

We doubt that any serious thinker will challenge the observation that error is tolerated and needed reforms postponed because of fear. To question a traditional mode of thought or procedure jeopardizes the future of one who exhibits sufficient courage to do so and few indeed are willing to brook the scorn or withstand the opposition incurred by criticism of that which has come to be accepted as truth. In full awareness of this state of affairs we very humbly submit that we feel our brethren are generally incorrect in their evaluation of the church the ekklesia of God. It might not be of sufficient concern to merit this article were it not for the fact that the misconception causes men to trust in the wrong source for salvation and actually may substitute worship of the creation for that of the Creator.

Any hesitancy about expressing our position in this article is caused by apprehension that we may appear to be speaking derogatorily of the church. This is not our intention and such an application of our words would be a decided injustice. We have the greatest respect and deepest reverence for the church of God, but it is not our Savior, nor is it upon an equality with Him. To place the church in its proper perspective is not to reflect against it at all. That the church consists of those who are saved we do not doubt but that the saving power is invested in it we seriously question. It is possible to so emphasize the church that men will idolize it rather than glorifying God. The tendency to do this is seen upon every hand.

The shepherd is greater than the flock. That is why it was a remarkable thing for the Shepherd to give his life for his sheep. No one regards the sacrifice of sheep for the sustaining of the life of the shepherd as an extraordinary thing. It has been going on for centuries and dates back at least to the time when Noah left the ark and God made a covenant with him. Now the church is simply the flock of God composed of those who acknowledge Jesus as being “the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls.” We are but “the sheep of his pasture.”

It is also axiomatic that the creator is superior to the created, and the church is a creation, not a creator. Of Jesus it is affirmed, “He is the head of the body, the church; he is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead, that in everything he might be preeminent” (Col. 1:18). It is a fact that this passage is seldom quoted for the purpose for which it was written as expressed in the last clause. It is fitted into sermon outlines on the identity of the church, but the apostle referred to the subservience of the church under the headship of Jesus as an argument for his universal prerogatives.

Even more pointed is the example of the church as a building or house. To the congregation at Corinth Paul wrote, “We are fellow workmen of God; you are God’s field, God’s building” (1 Cor. 3:9). Peter wrote, “Like living stones be yourselves built into a spiritual house” (1 Peter 2:5). But it is distinctly said, “The builder of a house has more honor than the house” (Heb. 3:3). The context goes on to say, “But Christ was faithful over God’s house as a son. And we are his house . . .” (verse 6). When we honor the church to the same degree, or on the same plane, as we do Jesus, we are in error.

Although it may sound like treason, we unhesitatingly say that we are not saved by the church, or even through the church as an instrument. The church is not a Savior but requires one. “Christ is the head of the church, his body, and is himself its Savior” (Eph. 5:23). Since there is only one Lord there is only one church. There never was but one, there can never be but one. There is only one church on earth now and it is composed of all the called out ones. Every person in the world who has heard the call and responded to it has been constituted a living stone in God’s house. No man has power to attach another as a member of the body, no man has power to detach another from the body. “But as it is, God arranged the organs in the body, each one of them, as he chose . . . Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it” (1 Cor. 12:18, 27).

Our modern stress upon the church is often the result of a competitive denominationalism. We proclaim “the church” and not the Lord. Our energies and efforts are directed toward aligning men with a specific viewpoint or opinion relative to this doctrine or that. We see announcement of such topics as “To Which Church Should One Belong?” which implies there is more than one and that man has a choice. The fruit of our vying and contention is everywhere seen but no place more clearly than on farflung mission fields where simple pagans who were united under heathendom are divided against their fellows under “Christianity.”

In the midst of our modern Babel there are few voices now lifted up to declare that “the Church of Christ on earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one” as was announced by Thomas Campbell in 1809. Incidentally, when Mr. Campbell issued this statement he was a Presbyterian. He continued a Calvinist until death, a matter which occasioned considerable friendly argument between himself and his son Alexander. This concept has been lost and the various parties and factions have obscured the vision since we have glorified them as “churches” as if God could have more than one group of “the called out” or as if one man on a creedal basis could call others out.

Our task is to preach Christ and him crucified. The nature of sin has not changed and the remedy for it has not altered. We need not be concerned about getting men into “the Lord’s church” for this is the Lord’s work and it should be marvelous in our eyes. Nor need we be worried that any person who is brought to Christ will be added to any other church. There is no other church!

While we are facing up to this issue we feel impelled to face up to another. In doing this we offer our reasoning based upon our knowledge of God’s word and the nature of God as revealed in that word. Since these things are our own deductions we are not inclined to be either dogmatic or argumentative about them. Those who disagree with us will be loved and respected as highly as those who concur. The question is often asked concerning those who are ignorant of the call. Will any be saved outside the church? That Jesus is the Savior of the body is not questioned but will God save any who have not heard the call or in whose case there are circumstances which make it impossible to comply?

It is frequently affirmed that it is impossible for God to save anyone except on the conditions he has authorized us to announce. We do not think this logically follows. The authority of God is sovereign and supreme. While it is true that “the head of every man is Christ” it is just as certain that “the head of Christ is God” (1 Cor. 11:3). Christ is the head of all things to the church by sufferance of God. “For God has put all things in subjection under his feet” (1 Cor. 15:27). But God is not under Christ and is not bound by his authority, for the same verse says, “But when it says, ‘All things are put in subjection under him,’ it is plain that he is excepted who put all things under him.”

We have no right to bind God by the ordinances he gave to bind us, nor attempt to place under law one who is superior to all law. That God’s grace existed prior to and constitutes a realm larger than the church no thoughtful student will deny. Grace is not a product of the church but the church is a product of grace. That the church occupies a position under the domain of grace and extends only to well defined limits within that domain I freely concede. But that God's grace can never be administered outside those boundaries I am unwilling to admit.

It will be said that if God saves anyone at all outside the church he will be contradicting his own law. Such a statement is the fruit of shallow thinking. It overlooks the fundamental truth that the authority which gives a law is superior to the law which it creates. If this was not true no law after being once issued could ever be altered, amended, repealed or suspended. When one acts above and beyond law he no more contradicts law than one contradicts his obligation by acting above and beyond the call of duty. Moreover, it is a recognized principle that a judge may exercise clemency and extend mercy in the face of positive statutes when one has failed to comply with the same because of circumstances. It is even affirmed that "mercy triumphs over judgment." This is because all law must be relative as relates to humanity and no law, human or divine, can be given which anticipates and prepares for all exigencies.

God has demonstrated in other areas than the spiritual that he makes exceptions in the ordinances he has given. In the natural realm he has ordained a "fixed order" of the sun for light by day and of the moon and stars for light by night. So definite was this ordinance that it was used as a token of his perpetuating power for his chosen people (Jer. 31:35, 36). Yet he had no hesitancy about suspending the arrangement at the behest of Joshua or as a sign to Hezekiah. This was not a contradiction of "the laws of nature" but simply the application of a superior power out of which the ordinances were derived.

We do not argue that God will do thus and so with reference to salvation beyond his revelation to us. We simply say that he can do so without proving untrue to his covenant. It is not his unrevealed action but his right of sovereign power and grace which we defend. This does not authorize those of us who act under the authority of Jesus to offer salvation to any person except upon the basis of his declaration. It will be no comfort to the one who would deliberately reject the teaching of the Son under the mistaken idea that he might still be saved by grace. But there is a grave difference between refusal to act because of rebellion and failure to do so because of lack of knowledge due to uncontrollable circumstances. It is uncharitable to indiscriminately brand as rebels those who are uninformed or helpless.

Perhaps we are mistaken in our conclusion that much of our problem is seated in a false opinion about the church, yet we believe there are serious dangers in exalting it to an equality with the Lord. Such a view not only tends to inflate our ego (since we are the church), and make us supplant God in judgment; it also makes the interest of the church turn inward and becomes self-centered. Eventually the church spends its effort in saving itself to the neglect of the lost world. It tends to rely for strength upon the material rather than the spiritual factors of its existence. It becomes rich in all that money can buy and poor in everything it cannot purchase.

We are the “called out” and he who called us is greater than those who are called. He calls to us but we call upon him. He is lord of all, we are slaves; he is the master, we are the servants. We should cease to hold out the church as a saving institution and regard it as a communion of the saved ones. If it be urged that we are saved because we are in the church, let it not be forgotten that we are in the church because we are saved. We are the church. It is not something separate and distinct from our lives which we join. No man can plant the church; no man can join it. No man has power to save himself nor do all men in the aggregate have power to save themselves.

A proper evaluation of the church in relation to Christ will make it possible for us to exalt Him to His proper status without derogating or deflating the fellowship of the saints. We should be careful that we do not, in our zeal for the church, be guilty of making it a rival in our affection for Him who regards it as His body. “Unto Him be glory in the church, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen!”

Adventures in Religion (9)

Mission Messenger (August 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It is difficult for men to grasp the implications of the fatherhood of God. Even though Jesus came as a visible demonstration of the love of God for humanity we tend always to revert to legalistic ritual as a means of warding off divinely ordained calamity. Sinners as we are, we seek to expiate our transgressions by our own puny sacrifices and to atone for our guilt by our feeble offerings. We never seem to be able to remember that he offered himself once for all and that he made the only atonement in which there is any efficacy. We are living B.C. lives in an A.D. age. And because we are doing so we are never able to free ourselves from a consciousness of guilt. There is remembrance made of our sins every year, and in some cases, every day!

Torn between realization of our own tendency to fall into temptation and the dread of impending doom for having done so, we struggle on enshrouded in remorse for the past and in abject fear of the future. Always under such conditions men seek to alleviate their mental torture by devising and imposing upon themselves new restraints and regulations in the mistaken belief that observance of these makes them better than other men, and that thus they come closer to the divine ideal. The most sacred ordinances become subject to meticulous scrutiny. Mote-seeking becomes the chief vocation of modern Pharisaical partisans.

The whole problem, as Paul so well states it in Galatians 4, is that the fulness of time has come and God wants to treat us as sons but in our spiritual immaturity we continue to demand that we be regarded as slaves. And because the Father has removed us from law and placed us under grace we strive to convert grace into a law. We have a greater feeling of security when we are behind a fence and if God will not provide us with a fence we will construct one of our own. We are careful to make it portable so we can take in more ground or give up some, as the mood strikes us or as we listen to the spellbinding persuasiveness of a modern lawyer or scribe.

Even when man was under a divine law which was “holy, just and good,” he constantly sought to weave more strands into the rope with which he was bound. Never quite sure that he was pleasing God he attempted to ingratiate himself in the divine favor by adding more legalistic details. The Mishnah is full of trivialities which were discussed in all seriousness as if the hope of humanity was dependent upon their proper disposal. The Sabbath was to be a day of rest, free from all servile work. It was agreed that bearing a burden was work, but what constituted a burden? If a burden was something which one lifted or carried on his person, what about a cripple who buckled on a wooden leg, or a man who wore a false tooth? If one could not carry a stone, could he still lift up one large enough to toss at a bird or throw at his cattle?

We have gone one step further. Having been freed from the bondage of law we have converted “the new spiritual principle of life in Christ Jesus” (Rom. 8:2— J. B. Phillips) into a law and then proceeded to do as all legalists inevitably do. We have adopted our interpretations as law and bound them upon others as the divine intent. The most solemn and sacred ordinances, intended to convey a blessing and strengthen our sense of oneness, have become the battlefields of partisan hatred. In their emphasis upon details men have forsaken the very spirit and purpose of the observance and are left holding an empty shell from which life has fled. This is clearly seen in the contentions relative to the Lord's Supper which was given as a visible symbol to the world that we are one body (1 Cor. 10:17).

We believe it is time for a thorough examination of "the pattern concept" which has long been the basis of orthodoxy in "Church of Christ" circles. Why was it that when God gave Moses the pattern for the tabernacle, only one building was constructed around which all of the tribes encamped? Now each tribe takes "the pattern" and builds its own tabernacle and all of the other tribes are excluded from any participation in its sacred service. Yet each tribe proclaims that the tabernacle it has constructed is the one "according to the pattern" and all of the others are a sham and pretence, with only hypocrites and apostates ministering therein. We have built more than two dozen different and diverse "Churches of Christ" which have little to do with each other while each proclaims to a startled world that it alone is "according to the pattern."

It is my intention, God willing, during the next year, to pursue a kindly, but relentless investigation of "the blue print theory" which has been sanctified by sermonizers and used to rend the people of God into warring and feuding construction engineers! Why do brethren contend so vehemently for certain details while at the same time waving others aside as of no consequence? Why do we, of all people, fail to see the difference between preaching and teaching or gospel and doctrine?

Why do we plod along demanding unity upon the basis of doctrinal conformity when we do not agree upon its implications among ourselves? Why do we make the word "gospel" cover every word of the new covenant scriptures and conclude that a man who does not share our explanation of Revelation 20 has not "obeyed the gospel." Why do we brand and stigmatize every opinion with reference to some point in the epistolary writings as "another gospel"? Our lack of real scholarship is astounding in view of the claim that we alone are right in our interpretation of the sacred writings. We can promise you that the months ahead will contain for you some interesting experiences in research. This is to be a real adventure in the realm of the Spirit. But it will provide no pleasure for the partisan and prejudiced!

The Basis of Faith

Mission Messenger (September 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It has long been a subject of contemplation with us that Christianity is not only the kind of religion which an intelligent Creator would bestow upon humanity but the only kind of religion which a merciful God could bestow upon an intelligent creation. In making this statement we are not unaware of the inadequacy of the very terms we use. Neither “Christianity” nor “religion” is capable of defining or describing the revelation of Deity in bodily form, and the first is never used within those scriptures which we regard as holy. Our problem of communication is further hindered due to the warped and distorted usages to which both words are subjected in our modern culture.

All religion grows out of a sense of dependency, which, because of our nature exhibits itself as a need. Without knowledge of God, and left to himself, man seeks to satisfy his need and develops a superstition. Those who believe in God and recognize him as a benevolent creator accept as a corollary to this belief that he will provide a means of gratification on the highest basis. Every other need of man has been supplied in a manner adapted to his state or condition. It would be strange indeed if this universal need were the only one neglected, seeing that it is the very one which establishes the closest relationship between the creator and his intelligent offspring. Those who acknowledge the existence of God must admit the possibility of his revealing himself to mankind; those who know the nature of man must recognize the probability of his doing so.

It would be impossible to conjure up a concept of a powerless God. Even those who have made idols which were impotent had to invest them with imaginary powers in order to conceive of them as gods. It was this prostitution of the faculty of imagination which made such worship superstition. In idolatry, man created a god by natural means and sought to bestow upon him supernatural ability. In this he exhibited his folly since the creator is always superior to the created and no one can bestow a power greater than he possesses. By the same token it is impossible for us to conceive of a loving creator who would deny to his creatures that which they needed most. If God would provide a means of satisfying hunger and could not, he is powerless; if he could do so and would not, he is merciless. In either instance he would not be God. Because of our need and his might we must conclude that he has revealed himself to mankind for our good.

The word religion is from the Latin re, back, and ligo, to bind. It is that which acknowledges man's need for direction and guidance from a higher source than his own reason and experience and binds his mind and heart to follow that source which he recognizes. It is here that the skeptic demonstrates his lack of keenness in discrimination when he brands all religion as superstition. "Superstition" is derived from a combined form meaning "to stand over" and insofar as it recognizes a power superior to man it is religion. But not all religion is superstition. Both sonship and slavery demand subservience to a superior, but the second does so out of unreasoning fear. The same distinction obtains with reference to revealed religion and abject superstition.

Having said this much about religion we turn our attention to "Christianity" which has suffered a great deal from its enemies but much more from its friends. The former have attacked it openly as a foe worthy of their steel; the latter have sought to confine and enslave it as unworthy of being released in its purity. It has been dressed in such varied creedal garbs and exhibited in such diverse philosophical attire, that its true form has long since been forgotten. Those who argue learnedly about it, mistaking the cloak for the person, often know the least about its real nature. It shall be our purpose in this thesis to humbly explore some facets which seem to have been generally forgotten, with the hope that we may stimulate further research in our generation.

Reverting to our introductory sentence we propose to show why the nature of man required just such a revelation as God has vouchsafed to him. Man is a finite creature. He is limited by time and space. He can only be one place at a time. He enters this world at a given time and leaves it at a given time. He comes in with no previous experience and devoid of present knowledge. During his life span he is dependent upon the testimony of others for information as to what transpires where he is not and for what transpired before he was. Mankind has long since recognized the possibility of being deceived and the tendency of some to practice deception. Through bitter and tragic experience the human race has learned that the only thing that can be depended upon is that man cannot.

But all previous experience is necessary for the present good. No man is isolated from his own generation and no generation is unaffected by previous accomplishments and discoveries. The very essence of progress is the employment of the sum total of human knowledge to date as the foundation for new discoveries and greater accomplishments in the present generation. In view of the necessity for testimony and the possibility of deception, humanity from its earliest days, and as a means for its own protection and survival, devised or adopted certain principles related to testimony by which it could be determined to what extent reliance could be placed in the information conveyed. When testimony meets the requirements of these criteria it must be believed by a rational being or he lays the groundwork for rejection of all previous experience and by that act renders himself irrational.

Laws of Evidence

The Creator recognized the need of and subscribed to the criteria adapted to and accepted by man as essential. This is important and we must present documentary proof. In every case involving testimony there must be the thing to be attested and the persons to testify. Since witnesses are human and subject to frailty they may be both careless as to details in observation or forgetful of such details as they observe. To offset either of these tendencies it was early deemed requisite that testimony be established by more than one witness. It is obvious that such a requirement had no particular relation either to the thing attested or the ones who testified. If a thing transpired, ten thousand declaring it had not would not alter the fact. If only one saw a thing transpire he would be as thoroughly convinced as though ten thousand others saw it. The knowledge of the witness does not depend upon corroborative evidence, it is the faith of those to whom the witness testifies that requires it.

God placed his stamp of approval on this law of evidence. "A single witness shall not prevail against a man for any crime or for any wrong in connection with any offence he has committed; only on the evidence of two witnesses, or of three witnesses, shall a charge be sustained" (Deut. 19:15). In John 5:31, Jesus says, "If I bear witness to myself, my testimony is not true." He did not imply that personal testimony is always false, because in John 8:18, he declares, "I am one that bear witness of myself." In both cases the context shows that he referred to the fact that according to the laws of evidence his testimony would not be accepted as true. He proceeded to cite as additional witnesses, John the Baptist (6:33); his mighty works (6:36); the Father (6:37); and the sacred scriptures (6:39).

In addition to the requirement for a plurality of witnesses to establish a fact, every society sought to discourage deception by imposing sanctions and penalties upon those guilty of perjury. Thus we read, “A false witness will not go unpunished, and he who utters lies will not escape” (Prov. 19:5), and again, “A false witness will not go unpunished, and he who utters lies will perish” (Prov. 19:9). In man’s primitive social state God ordained the principle of lex talionis, the law of retaliation, as the most effective deterrent to malicious injury. “The judge shall inquire diligently, and if the witness is a false witness and accused his brother falsely, then you shall do to him as he had meant to do to his brother” (Deut. 19:18, 19).

Because of the awe and reverence with which sacred persons and things were regarded, men soon began to place themselves under oath in reference to these in giving testimony. By this means they called down punishment upon their heads if what they said was false. Although the very nature of God is such that it is impossible for him to lie (Heb. 6:18) he subscribed to the recognized law of evidence in his promise to Abraham. “When God made his promise to Abraham he swore by himself, for there was no one greater by whom he could swear.” That this amounted to Deity accommodating to a recognized human custom is apparent by the language used. “Among men it is customary to swear by something greater than themselves. And if a statement is confirmed by an oath, that is the end of all quibbling. So in this matter, God, wishing to show beyond doubt that his plan was unchangeable, confirmed it with an oath” (Heb. 6:16, 17).

In view of these statements it is evident that any requirement of God, based upon belief of testimony, will conform to the recognized laws of evidence. He has demonstrated that these laws have divine approbation. We are not required of God to believe what is incredible, indeed we could not do so, for the rational mind is incapable of that. The revelation of God in its ultimate is a historical fact and the testimony as to this fact must be subjected to the same measuring reed as the testimony regarding any other historical event. The credibility of the history involved in the Good News concerning Jesus of Nazareth is to be ascertained on exactly the same basis as that of any other history.

It may even be questioned whether there is such a thing as a legitimate distinction between profane and sacred history. If God is the great king of all the earth and rules in the affairs of men there is no such thing as an unrelated fact. There may be, and we accept it as true that there were, men who recorded history under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, and others who wrote from purely human motivation and experience, but all history simply records the footprints of God in human affairs. The historians may be holy or profane but history cannot be so divided. Remember that there is a difference between history and the recording or interpretation of that history.

Nature of Christianity

The Christian religion differs from all other major religious systems of the world in that it is essentially historical. Other religious systems are based upon human philosophy, speculation, or mysticism. Christianity is not a metaphysical synthesis or a complex arrangement of abstract propositions. Its central affirmation is that at a precise time in human history redemption from sin became available to all mankind as the result of a divine breakthrough of the flesh curtain, and that “God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself.” Stated in another way it revolves around the theme that the Logos (Word) which was “with God and was God” actually “became flesh and dwelled among men,” exhibiting those qualities which proved him to be “the Son of God.” “He was declared Son of God by a mighty act in that he rose from the dead” (Romans 1:4). In order to share in the redemption made possible through God’s grace one must believe that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God.

This places Christianity definitely in the realm of history. There was either such a person as Jesus of Nazareth or there was not; he was either what he claimed to be or he was not. No one denies that we have certain historical records establishing the claim that there was such a person. It is admitted that these records are of sufficient antiquity to be admitted as valid testimony, if they are true. The question of credibility, then, involves only two questions, both of them related to the witnesses. If these questions can be answered satisfactorily the competency of the witnesses is established. If this is certified the testimony must be believed, or all historical records of every nature must be rejected. The first question must relate to the scope of knowledge of the witnesses, the second to their character. The first has to do with their accessibility to the facts, the second to their personal honesty and trustworthiness.

The Christian faith is not contingent upon any subsequent deduction from or speculation about the facts, nor is it specifically concerned with the inferences or doctrines growing out of or connected with the facts. These may be interesting fields for investigation upon the part of those who believe but they in no wise affect the historical facts which constitute the foundation of the Christian system. They may be related to the spiritual growth of those in the faith but they are no more the faith than the formula fed to a baby is the seed by which it is begotten. The whole proposition resolves itself into the problems (if there are such) related to the competency of the witnesses. Were these men in a position to know the certainty of the facts to which they testified? Were they the kind of men who would truthfully report what they knew?

It has been said that every supernatural act connected with the career of Jesus has been denied. This is a careless statement. No one at a later date can deny or disprove an alleged fact. To deny that a miracle has been performed one must be present at the time and submit the performance to the proper criteria. If not present he can only challenge the validity of the testimony. But before one challenges the veracity of another, justice demands that he give his reasons for doing so. It is not sufficient reason to say that the testimony runs counter to his preconceived notions and views. On that ground all scientific progress would be ruled out or nullified.

Purpose of Testimony

There are four accounts preserved of the incidents related to the life of Jesus of Nazareth. This amply fulfils the requirement for a plurality of witnesses. It cannot be urged against these that they are inadequate as biographies because they leave too many gaps in the story of his life. These are not biographies at all and were never intended to be. The writers had a definite purpose in mind and were selective of the masses of material at hand in order to accomplish their purpose. One of them who knew Jesus best asserts that there are many things which were not recorded and gives the reason. "There were indeed many other signs that Jesus performed in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book. Those here written have been recorded in order that you may hold the faith that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that through this faith you may possess eternal life by his name." Concerning the wealth of detail available to one who would be a biographer the same writer says, "There is much else that Jesus did. If it were all to be recorded in detail, I suppose the whole world would not hold the books that would be written."

The writers were not journalists attempting to produce works of literary worth. They did not write to gratify curiosity or to gain recognition for themselves. They were not striving to produce a best seller or to make a living by their pens. They simply believed that Jesus was the Messiah and God's Son. They recorded those things which convinced them in the full conviction that when the facts were known all other honest people would also acknowledge the divine Sonship.

They knew what they had seen and heard. One of them says in preparing to close his narrative, "It is this same disciple who attests what has here been written. It is in fact he who wrote it, and we know that his testimony is true." On one occasion when they had been imprisoned over night and were in court next day, they were threatened with legal reprisal if they did not "refrain from all public speaking and teaching in the name of Jesus." Their pointed reply was, "We cannot possibly give up speaking of things we have seen and heard."

Of those who wrote, one was a Greek physician. His account was addressed to a high official in the government as the form of address, "Your Excellency," demonstrates. It is written in the cultivated language of one trained in the "Materia Medica" of his day. This narrative was produced after careful research and detailed investigation. It was prompted by a desire to provide authentic knowledge at a time when many writers were recording their versions as gleaned from original testimony. Regardless of how accurate or inaccurate some of these written accounts may have been, it is important to realize that Jesus of Nazareth had made such an impact on men that, in an age and among people not renowned for literary skills, many were hastening to put into permanent form the material available unto them. It is even more important to know how widespread was the tradition handed over by original eyewitnesses and which could serve as a criterion for judging the written accounts. It is significant that of all the written accounts mentioned, the one preserved for us is the work of one who made a meticulous and detailed study in order to provide authentic knowledge to a government official.

The author to Theophilus. Many writers have undertaken to draw up an account of the events that have happened among us, following the traditions handed down to us by the original eyewitnesses and servants of the Gospel. And so I in my turn, your Excellency, as one who has gone over the whole course of these events in detail, have decided to write a connected narrative for you, so as to give you authentic knowledge about the matters of which you have been informed” (Luke 1:1-4).

The physician was a close friend and traveling companion of Saul of Tarsus, a former rabbinical student of the Hillel School in Jerusalem. The personal encounter of this man with Jesus while enroute to Syria to persecute his followers had turned him into a proclaimer of the Good News. Luke came to Jerusalem with him and when the apostle was arrested and held in custody in Herod’s palace at Caesarea for more than two years, Luke apparently remained in Palestine. This would have provided ample opportunity for interviewing personally those who were intimately connected with the life of Jesus. It is possible that the mother of Jesus was still alive. It is certain that one of his brothers was a resident of Jerusalem. Luke was with Paul when he met this brother. “Next day Paul paid a visit to James; we were with him, and all the elders attended” (Acts 21:18).

The Virgin Birth

If any person would be skeptical about an alleged “virgin birth” and about miracles of healing, it would certainly be a physician. One can but imagine the probing questions which would be put by such a trained mind going “over the whole course of these events in detail.” Insofar as we know, Luke was the first scientist to confront the facts of the Christian faith. Certainly he applied the scientific method. He reviewed the testimony in detail and had in mind the goal of all scientific research, the arrival at “authentic knowledge about the matters.” Is it not striking that he gives a much more detailed account of the circumstances connected with the virgin birth and records more of the miracles of Jesus than any of the other writers?

The connected accounts of the circumstances surrounding the conception and delivery of John and Jesus are straightforward and factual. There is no apparent embellishment of the record. It is just such as would be written by one who interviewed the principals involved. These are carefully identified by name, place of residence, and time of the events. "In the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God to a town in Galilee, with a message for a girl betrothed to a man named Joseph, a descendant of David; the girl's name was Mary." Certainly the first person on earth who would be concerned about the virgin birth would be Mary, and Joseph would share in that concern. In both cases nothing short of divine reassurance would have sufficed, and in both cases such reassurance was given as was satisfactory to the two of them.

The news that she was to have a child would evoke one primary question in the mind of a humble maiden. "How can this be," said Mary, "when I have no husband?" It is remarkable how this question still troubles our contemporary scientists and speculative theologians. Because they are unwilling to face up to the fact, they conclude that Mary must have had a husband and concealed the fact. But the investigator who sought to determine the truth so that he could convey "authentic knowledge" records, "The angel answered, 'The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you; and for that reason the holy child to be born will be called 'Son of God.'"

What motivates learned men in our day to spin theoretical webs of thought to obscure this simple account? Is it that they cannot accept it or that they will not? We have no inclination to make a sweeping indictment or blanket accusation but we suspect that the implication of this event comes with such devastating force against the modern theory of the origin of man, that to protect this theory they must deny the origin of the Son of man. It is significant that in Luke 1:3 Jesus is called “Son of God” and in Luke 3:38, the earthly lineage is traced back to Adam who is also called “son of God.”

If it is true that all things were made by the Logos and that without him was not anything made that was made, it follows that not only was the first man truly a “son of God” but the seed in his body and the ova in the body of his counterpart were the creation of the Logos and “life came from life.” When the Creator deigned in the fulness of time to send the Logos that his creatures “might have life and have it more abundantly” it required no greater miracle to unite the Logos with an ovum from the body of one who was directly descended from the first “son of God” than to give life to that son when he was fashioned from the dust of the ground. If a man in the flesh could be made “son of God” the Son of God could be made a man in the flesh. “And the Logos was made flesh and dwelled among us.” The real challenge was not in the incarnation of Jesus but in the incarnation of Adam, for the last could not have been possible without the first.

Perhaps, in the final analysis, the denial of the incarnation is an attempt to rid oneself of the thought of responsibility to God. The philosophers of our generation have only attempted an evasion and escapism on a grander scale than their less sophisticated contemporaries who have to be content with cruder methods. For if we are all descended from “a son of God” and the “Son of God” descended to show us how sons of God ought to be, his life stands as a constant rebuke to our selfish and sinful existence. His own generation could not understand his thinking and sought to put him out of their world on a cross; our generation cannot stand under his thinking so we seek to cross him out of our world of thought. We have refined our methods of crucifixion.

We are aware of the contention that a belief in the virgin birth is not essential to a recognition of the sacrificial virtues of the cross. It is argued that the death of an innocent man for a great ideal presents to us a sufficient pattern for a god-like life. But this is not enough! An ideal may prevent us from sinning in the future but it cannot purge out our sins of the past. One can never have a pure conscience until it is purified. For this reason it makes a difference who died on the cross. Any theory which begins with the Logos as a man who became God is in direct contravention of the divine purpose which begins with the Logos as God who became man. The emptying of the blood from his body has significance only as the culminating act of an emptying process which began when he was in the form of God and “emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being born in the likeness of men” (Phil. 2:7). That the connection we make is valid is evidenced by the succeeding verse, “And being found in human form he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross.”

Those who deny the virgin birth pose as benefactors of mankind, seeking to release us from the thralldom of ignorance and superstition. Unable to derogate the moral ethics of Jesus they emphasize his humanity. I confess some skepticism as to their purpose for it would appear that all too frequently the opposition to the virgin birth is not so much an attempt to establish his humanity as to get rid of his divinity. My skepticism proceeds from the methods employed. Assuming the impossibility of such a miracle they make all testimony to the contrary conform to the assumption. This is directly opposed to the scientific method and the laws of evidence. It is the very basis of all superstition. The virgin birth either happened or it did not. It is a fact or it is not a fact. Whether we believe it happened must depend upon testimony. We were not present to examine the alleged fact; we are now limited to acceptance or rejection of the testimony. To reject it on the basis of a preconceived notion is purely prejudicial.

The Fidelity of Luke

The basis of inductive philosophy, as distinguished from theory and conjecture, is the axiom set forth in Newton's Principia, "Whatever is collected from this induction, ought to be received, notwithstanding any conjectural hypothesis to the contrary, till such time as it shall be contradicted or limited by further observations." The only recourse for those who deny the testimony is to prove by evidence that those who testify to the facts either had no accessibility to the facts or did not exhibit trustworthiness in recording them.

Certainly the methods and motives of Luke cannot be questioned for these are the very ones employed by all true scientists. There can be no question of his accessibility to source materials for many of the eyewitnesses were still alive when he wrote "of all that Jesus did and taught" (Acts 1:1). With reference to the appearance of Jesus after his resurrection Paul wrote in the spring of 57 A.D., "He appeared to over five hundred of our brothers at once, most of whom are still alive, though some have died." In the summer of the following year Luke was with Paul in Palestine and in position to interview the witnesses before writing to the governor.

The very design of his account argues against it being a forgery. Remember that it was written when its contents could be inspected by many whose names were mentioned in it. An impostor always avoids specificity. He deals in generalities. He carefully guards against giving names or dates. Contrary to such procedure, Luke seems to go to every length to date events, provide the names of government officials, and designate geographical areas. Let us cite only two of the many examples. The first has to do with the birth of Jesus. "In those days a decree was issued by the Emperor Augustus for a general registration throughout the Roman world. This was the first registration of its kind; it took place when Quirinius was governor of Syria" (Luke 2:1, 2). Since all of these things would he recorded in the public annals of Rome and open to inspection it is evident that the writer must have known whereof he spoke.

Even more explicit is the documentation relative to the time when John the Immerser began his proclamation. "In the fifteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius, when Pontius Pilate was governor of Judea, when Herod was prince of Galilee, his brother Philip prince of Ituraea and Trachonitis, and Lysanias prince of Abilene, during the high-priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas, the word of God came to John, son of Zechariah, in the wilderness." Even the distinctions involved in the words translated "emperor, governor, and prince" would be significant to "His Excellency" to whom the record was addressed.

We cannot refrain from mentioning an undesigned statement which seems to us to indicate the fidelity of Luke as a historian. All of us are aware of the professional pride, so often mis-called "ethics," which forbids any reference to another engaged in the same profession in such a manner as to reflect against the profession. As a physician Luke was obligated to investigate circumstances related to alleged miracles of healing. One of these had to do with a woman who was troubled with an aggravated case of hemorrhage. True to his profession, Luke records the incidence of the disease as of twelve years duration.

When journalistic ethics conflict with professional ethics, the truth must be recorded regardless of consequences. One might be astounded at the difference between the report on a case as stated in a professional medical journal and that given to the family of the patient. So Luke the physician, acting as historian, writes of the woman, "She had spent all of her available funds on physicians, none of whom did her any good."

While we are dealing with this case I should like to remark about another fact or two. It is apparent that the unfortunate woman was motivated by a desire to escape publicity due to the nature of her affliction, as well as by superstition with reference to the garment of Jesus. Because God had ordained that the people of Israel were “to make tassels on the corners of their garments . . . and to put upon the tassel of each corner a cord of blue; and it shall be to you a tassel to look upon and remember all the commandments of the Lord” a special significance was attached to the hem of the garment. The unlearned and ignorant came to regard it as sacred or holy, and there is little doubt that the woman thought of it as possessing curative value since it was worn by one regarded as “a healer of diseases.”

The charge frequently made by the critics of Jesus that he invaded the privacy of the woman and exposed her to public gaze for exploitation of personal power is wholly unwarranted. Upon this initial announcement that someone had touched him, all disclaimed it. The apostles quickly pointed out that the crowd was pressing upon him but Jesus insisted that someone had touched him because he felt power had gone forth to heal. “Then the woman, seeing that she was detected, came trembling and fell at his feet. Before all the people she explained why she had touched him and how she had been instantly cured.” At this juncture, Jesus spoke, “My daughter, your faith has cured you. Go in peace.” It is just as necessary to cure minds of superstition as to heal bodies of disease. In this declaration it was simply pointed out that there was nothing about his clothing which had healing power, but it was faith. This public declaration would offset any tendency to ascribe magical powers to externals. There is a difference between a miracle worker and a sorcerer and Jesus wanted that difference understood. Incidentally, the event demonstrates also the difference between casual contact with Jesus and the deliberate touch of faith.

The system called Christianity has as its foundation the fact that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God. Belief of this one fact is all that is necessary in so far as faith is concerned, to secure pardon and enter into fellowship with God and Christ. When one submits to the act of baptism in proof of the validity of that one faith he becomes a partaker of all the privileges of the divine family. “For through faith you are all sons of God in union with Christ Jesus. Baptized into union with him, you have all put on Christ as a garment” (Gal. 3:26, 27).

The Testimony Confirmed

All testimony must be confirmed in order to be received in faith. God made our rational powers and has so constructed us that a thing must be rendered credible to be truly believed. This is the purpose of confirmation. It is to render the testimony credible. When regarded from the standpoint of effect upon our mental faculties confirmation grants unto us the power to believe. It makes belief possible. But the fact is one thing, the testimony to the fact another thing, and the confirmation of it still another thing.

We have a perfect right to enquire of those who question the divinity of Jesus what manner of confirmation it would require to convince them. Let them be very specific at this point. Only two alternatives are open to them. They must either admit that no amount of proof would convince them or that supernatural demonstrations would be required. If they take the first they reveal that they are gross materialists and sensualists, impervious to change and adamant in heart, unaffected by facts. If they admit a willingness to consider facts and the testimony related to such facts, irrespective of previous opinions, it is evident that only supernatural confirmation can establish beyond controversy the divinity of one under consideration.

But what kind of confirmation of the claim of divinity would be best adapted to create faith in the hearts of mankind? This would depend upon the type of men to be affected and the purpose of thus affecting them. There would be a great deal of difference in the presentation of a claim of divinity to the top intellectuals of the world for the purpose of creating a satisfactory human-divine philosophy, and the presentation of such a claim to the universal mass of mankind, steeped in ignorance and immorality, for the purpose of saving them from their sins. The nature of the confirmation would be the same but the demonstration would of necessity be altogether different.

Now it must be remembered that Jesus of Nazareth made no claim of coming to effect a new social order, create a new philosophy, or present a new approach to problems of international relationship. He stated his mission in terse sentences. "The Son of man has come to seek and save that which is lost." "The Son of man came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance." "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." Certainly the confirmation must, like the testimony, be adapted to the state or condition of those to be affected. Testimony which cannot be understood or confirmation which only confuses are both worse than useless.

We unhesitatingly affirm that if all men are expected to believe the confirmation must be such as is related to universal human experience. It cannot be limited to those who reside in a certain area of the earth. Those supernatural works which are done must be in the realm of common human experience. There are many such experiences— suffering, disease, hunger, fear of the elements, and death, to name a few. Not only must supernatural claims be confirmed by supernatural acts, but these must be performed in such a manner as to be obvious and certain.

It is our contention that if an unbiased committee acting in advance had drawn up a list of the confirmatory acts required to establish the claims of Jesus of Nazareth, taking into consideration the persons and purposes related to his claims, their report would have had to include the very type of deeds he performed. Jesus recognized the nature of the evidence required to prove his claims. When John sent to enquire, "Are you the one who is to come, or are we to expect some other?" Jesus made no appeal to his doctrine or ethical teaching. He said to the emissaries, “Go and tell John what you hear and see: the blind recover their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are clean, the deaf hear, the dead are raised to life, the poor are hearing the good news” (Matt. 11:4, 5). That this was valid confirmation is evidenced by the statement of the Jewish Council member, “We know that you are a teacher sent by God; no one could perform these signs of yours unless God were with him” (John 3:2). It is significant that the record says, “Yet among the people many believed in him. ‘When the Messiah comes,’ they said, ‘is it likely that he will perform more signs than this man?’” (John 7:31). That is still a pertinent question!

In view of these things it comes as a little strange that men in our day would seek to discount the miracles on the ground of their nature. Unable to attack his devoted life and pure character they must seek by other means to whittle away at his life in order to reduce him in stature to the purely human level. But there are some things which cannot be ignored. Jesus claimed a preexistence with the Father. He claimed to be the Son of God. He was willing to meet the logical requirement for confirmation of the claims. We have accounts of his miracles as preserved by eyewitnesses and investigators. The witnesses had adequate access to the sources of information. They were honest in their records. We are either forced to believe them or to reject the only basis upon which any historical account becomes credible.

The Universal Message

The core of Christianity is the gospel, the Good News. This is the message of heaven to an alien world. It does not consist of doctrinal discussions or abstract propositions. It is a proclamation of facts related to Jesus of Nazareth and intended to lead men to believe in Him as the Son of God. The gospel is not for the church. It is for the world. It is intended to enroll citizens in the kingdom, not to train those who are citizens. The Good News is an announcement of the fact that Jesus died for our sins, that he was buried, that he rose again on the third day, and that all this is in harmony with and in fulfillment of the scriptures. By this we are saved if we keep in memory these things.

The two memorials connected with the Christian system are directly related to these facts. One is an initiatory rite by which we enter the fellowship created by the gospel. In it we re-enact the facts of the Good News and thus identify ourselves with the Message. By this identification we are enabled to procure for ourselves as individuals that which was made available to the world by his death. We become incorporate with him. Just as the man Christ Jesus brought life to the world through his crucifixion, so we enter into that life by our crucifixion (Romans 6:6). "By baptism we were buried with him, and lay dead, in order that, as Christ was raised from the dead in the splendour of the Father, so also we might set our feet upon the new path of life. For if we have become incorporate with him in a death like his, we shall also be one with him in a resurrection like his."

Jesus had to die only once and we need to be baptized but once. When Jesus was raised he was free from the dominion of death, when we are baptized we become dead to sin. We are no longer slaves of sin. Baptism need never be repeated. There is one baptism as there is just one faith. The one faith is the substance of the gospel message. It is the conviction that God has raised Jesus from the dead and made him both Lord and Christ. This is the thing that the first hearers of the Good News were told to accept as certain (Acts 2:36). It is that faith which is a foundation for reformation of life and baptism (Acts 2:38). It is that faith, the one faith, which is a foundation of our fellowship in Christ Jesus the Lord.

The Good News is universal in extent because it is to meet a universal need. All men are sinners and all stand in need of salvation. Because it is a historical message and consists of testimony to facts, all men may believe it just as all may believe any other historical fact which has been confirmed. The Good News is not the exclusive possession of any sect, party or faction, regardless of how sincere or earnest its adherents may be. Any person on earth who has heard it may, and ought to, share it with every other who will listen to him. "Let him that heareth say, 'Come.'" The power to save lies in the Message and not in the messenger nor in any splinter group or segment to which he belongs. "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel. It is the saving power of God for every one who has faith" (Rom. 1:16).

Because the power to save is inherent in the Good News the effect of the Good News is not vitiated when the facts are announced, regardless of error in doctrine maintained by those who announce it. The power is in the nature of the Message and not in the character of those who proclaim it. Facts are facts regardless of men's attitudes or motivations. The facts have never been announced by a perfect man and never will be. But wheat sown by a blind man will produce a crop if sown in the proper place the same as if it were planted by one whose faculties are unimpaired. The power to produce is in the seed and not in the sower. Whether wheat or Good News is planted "it is God that giveth the increase." "But the others, moved by personal rivalry, present Christ from mixed motives. . . . What does it matter? One way or another, in pretence or in sincerity, Christ is set forth, and for that I rejoice" (Phil. 1:17, 18).

The Universal Response

Just as the Message is universal so the response to it is universal. The spontaneous reaction of the honest heart to credible testimony is belief. If that belief is in a person who has performed some great act of mercy in our behalf and whose life presents the challenge of an ideal, we react to our belief by a reformation of life and seek by some means to demonstrate our faith. Faith ever looks for overt manifestation and must do so if it involves recognition of lordship for obedience is the only proper response to lordship. Jesus said, “Why do you keep calling me ‘Lord, Lord’— and never do what I tell you?” (Luke 6:46). Again, “Not everyone who calls me ‘Lord, Lord’ will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only those who do the will of my heavenly Father” (Matt. 7:21). When the Good News was first proclaimed, the proclamation ended with the words, “Let all Israel then accept as certain that God has made this Jesus, whom you crucified, both Lord and Messiah.” The immediate response of the convicted hearts was, “Friends, what are we to do?”

The response to a divine message should be divinely ordained and God has authorized one act to validate our belief in one great fact and thus to bring us into that state where we share all of the blessings and privileges belonging to heirs of God. That one great fact is that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that one act is immersion in water of the believing penitent. Baptism is not the door to any party, sect, or faction, in our disturbed and distorted Christian realm. Baptism is the response to the Good News and not to a sectarian appeal. “Then he said to them: ‘Go forth to every part of the world, and proclaim the Good News to the whole creation. Those who believe it and receive baptism will find salvation’” (Mark 16:15, 16). No sect or party can appropriate baptism to itself as partisan property to be administered as a sectarian rite without incurring the judgment of God. As there is one faith to be universally proclaimed to the world, so there is but one baptism in response to that faith. He who shares the message can immerse him with whom he shares it. The validity of baptism depends upon faith in the facts by the one immersed and not upon some peculiarity of the immerser.

Since baptism is the divinely ordained response to the Good News, no party, sect, or segment, can invalidate its effect when a believing penitent submits to it. Baptism is not the response to a doctrinal position, to abstract propositions or to a creedal compilation. Regardless of the mistaken views upon such matters, held by either the penitent believer or the administrator, baptism is not invalidated because it is not related to these things. There never was a perfect man immersed since the death of Jesus and there never was a perfect man who did the immersing. Every believing penitent has been ignorant of many things and every baptismal administrator, without exception, has been wrong about many things. When one believes the facts which constitute the Good News and is immersed because he believes them, he receives remission of sins whether he understands that blessing or not. Remission of sins is a judicial act which takes place in heaven. It is a divine act of clemency bestowed upon proper response to the fundamental fact of the Christian system and not upon perfect knowledge of all that is involved in the divine will.

The Good News is not and can never be made a sectarian message because it is the proclamation of God to a sinful world. Men who are sectarian may proclaim it and may even flatter themselves that it is their exclusive possession, but it is no more so than the life-giving air which we breathe is a national possession. Baptism is not and can never be a sectarian possession because it is the divinely ordained universal response of believing penitents to a universal message. Men who are sectarian may administer it and even flatter themselves that because they do so it introduces a proper subject only into their exclusive partisan fellowship, but the over-ruling power of God unites the subject not to the sect to which the administrator belongs, but to the one body composed of all the saved on earth. No man has the power to immerse a man into a sect when that man truly believes that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and is immersed because of that faith. God frustrates the designs of men when they seek to exploit his universal mercy for sectarian purposes and partisan pride.

The Universal Body

Just as there is one faith and one baptism so there is but one body. The one baptism which is the validating act of the one faith introduces one into that one body. “For just as the body is one and has many members, and all the members of the body, though many, are one body, so it is with Christ. For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body” (1 Cor. 12:12, 13). The one body is the universal fellowship of all the sincerely immersed believers in the Lord Jesus. The one body is not a sect or party and no sect or party is the one body. The one body is not a composite of all the sects on earth. Sectarianism is a product of the party spirit. The one body is a product of the Holy Spirit. The one body is not composed of congregations joined together by mutual consent and recognition. It is composed of individuals who are united with Christ. Every person on this earth who is joined to the Son of God is a member of the one body and is in the fellowship with every other person on earth who is in Christ Jesus. “Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it” (1 Cor. 12:27).

The church is a divine creation. There is only one church on earth now, there never was but one, there never can be another. No man can create a church nor can any group of men acting in concert do so. God created only one church and if a man is not in it he is not in a church at all. The church is composed of the called out ones. They are all in it, there is not one of them out of it. Only God can call men out of sin so only God can create a church. Man can no more invent another church than he can invent another Spirit or create another hope. “There is one body and one Spirit even as you are called in one hope of your calling.”

No splinter, segment, fragment or fraction, parading under the title “church” is “the loyal church” or “the faithful church” in our decadent age. So long as schism exists among us we have all fallen short of the divine ideal, and to “miss the mark” is to sin. We will never attain to the ideal of God by blinding ourselves to the reality of our status and demanding that everyone else confess to us. We will never attain to it by advertising our segment or exploiting our party as “the one body” and implying that no one else belongs to Jesus because he does not belong with us. The party spirit is a sin. Factionalism is a work of the flesh. We can sooner become what God wants us to be on our knees than standing over others “cracking the whip.”

We are neither infinite nor infallible. Every exclusivist party on the earth has its written or unwritten creed and it is this creed which makes it sectarian and exclusive. Any party which does not contain within its confines all the saved on earth today is a sect pure and simple. Any group which debars any of God’s children and refuses to regard them as brothers is sectarian. Any group which creates traditional positions, explanations, interpretations and opinions as the basis of its fellowship is a sect regardless of how boastful and arrogant its claims or how loud and clamorous may be its disclaimers.

The Good News is a universal Message. The response to it when proclaimed is a universal response. Those who respond in faith to the accredited testimony of the ambassadors become, by divine act, members of the one body. By coming into him who is the head they constitute the one body over which he is the head. No man can bring them into it, no man can exclude them from it. One man can bring another to Christ Jesus, only God can bring him into the divine relationship. Fellowship is not something extended or withdrawn by men but a divine state into which we are called by God.

Men may conspire to put out of their synagogues those who truly acknowledge Jesus (John 9:22) but no man can amputate a member from the body of Christ. Jesus will come to those who are cast out by men and test them with the one question that really counts. “Jesus heard that they had cast him out, and having found him, he said, ‘Do you believe in the Son of man?”” (John 9:35). If one is right about Jesus he may be wrong about many other things and still be saved; if he is wrong about Jesus he may be right about all else and still be lost. Salvation is not a relation to things but to a person, Jesus Christ, and because it is a relation to this one person there is only one faith. God has made him “our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30).

One may be a member of the one body and something else! He did not enter the “something else” by the one baptism and God did not add him to it. God never adds those who believe in Jesus and are baptized into him to anything except the one body. That is why there is only one! A man may attach himself to “something else” because of mistaken views, false emphasis, or doctrinal bias. It is such crystallized opinions and creedal bases of fellowship which produce all of the sinful divisions in the religious world.

The Good News divides none of God’s children from each other. It is a statement of simple facts about Jesus of Nazareth. It is to be received upon the basis of credible testimony. Because belonging to “something else” divides us into warring segments and pits the members of the family against each other in unholy fratricidal strife, all sectarianism is sin. We can only fulfill the real purpose of God in our generation when we become and remain just Christian— and Christians only! This involves a recognition of all of God’s children as our brothers regardless of the partisan barriers they have erected. To recognize the walls men have created as legitimate is to make ourselves sectarian.

Because God recognizes that there is only one church and cannot be more than one, he never regards anyone as “belonging to another church.” He treats all men as individuals and will judge them as such. In this respect we need to be like the Father. We should acknowledge all truth as held by any man and we should use the truth discovered as a foundation upon which to build additional truth. Using the truth we ourselves have as a foundation we should welcome additional insights regardless of the source of transmission, realizing that in its ultimate all truth comes from God. This will enable us to flow together without anyone having to surrender any truth to which he has ever held himself addicted. If we can disregard all sectarian barriers which men have erected, if we can forget the creedal dams which they have thrown across the stream of thought and regard them all as persons striving to learn more of the divine will, we can rise above our sectarian bias and the Holy Spirit will enable us to overcome the divisions which have plagued us through the centuries.

The Christian system was designed by heaven “as a plan for the fulness of time, to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth” (Eph. 1:10). It was never intended to sever, sunder, or split the believers into warring tribes or rival camps. Our problem has been one of false emphasis. Each party has waved its banner aloft while each has cried “Lo, here!” or “Lo, there!” But the day is past when God’s people should encamp about the tabernacle under tribal symbols of identity. We are the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man. Let us emphasize the Good News “in which you stand, by which you are saved, if you hold it fast— unless you have believed in vain.”

The Ignorance of Wisdom

Mission Messenger (October 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The letter was like many of its kind which flood the mails today. It was an epistle of solicitation sent out by a national organization as part of a fund raising campaign. The letterhead was attractive, the message was appealing. On the left side of the sheet was a long list of endorsers, men prominent in the economic, social and religious realms. It is part of the psychological approach of these times to identify a movement with important persons. The status of a cause is judged by the prestige of those who are willing to be identified as sponsors.

Contrast with this the method employed by God in launching the rule of heaven among men. For many days certain words of Jesus have been churning about in my consciousness. I have been earnestly endeavoring to grasp their significance and thus probe the divine motivation. I am convinced that much of our current thinking is in direct opposition to the design of God. In our anxiety to see the cause succeed it is possible that we are thwarting the will of God. We rely upon skill, cleverness and word jugglery to advance the kingdom of God. We place our dependence in psychological persuasiveness, forgetting that it is one thing to increase “our membership” and a wholly different thing to enlarge the borders of spiritual Zion.

“At that time Jesus spoke these words: I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and understanding and revealed them to babes; yea, Father, for such was thy gracious will” (Matt. 11:25, 26).

Who are the wise and understanding ones? Why did God hide certain things from them? How did he do so? Why were the words spoken “at that time”? These are all relevant questions if we would understand the program of divine revelation. Certainly this passage illuminates the truth that God’s ways are not the ways of men. His method is the exact opposite of that which men employ. It would seem that the purpose of God could best be promoted by the power, position and prestige of those whose wisdom is respected by the world, but His gracious will has decreed otherwise.

Who are the wise? Let it be observed that the term is not here used as the opposite of ignorance. In no case does God speak with approval of wilful ignorance. While it is true that involuntary ignorance is not a sin, voluntary ignorance is always so because sin is “to miss the mark.” Anyone who falls below his potential because of his indifference or unconcern sins to the extent that he does so. Neither are the wise those who merely have an education. To educate is to “lead out” or to “draw forth.” It consists of bringing out the natural abilities and powers which one possesses. Since these are the gift of God it is an offence against him to not use them to the fullest.

The Greek word for wise is sophos. It is used in a commendatory as well as a condemnatory fashion. We are to be “wise as to what is good” (Rom. 16:19); we are to walk “not as unwise men but as wise” (Eph. 5:15); the congregation is to submit problems of disagreement to wise men for arbitration (1 Cor. 6:5). But there is a “wisdom from above” and a wisdom “which cometh not from above” (James 3:15, 17). The latter is variously referred to as “the wisdom of the world” (1 Cor. 1:20); “the wisdom of men” (2:5); and “the wisdom of this age” (2:6).

It is very essential that we know to what the term “world” applies in the expression “wisdom of the world.” If we do not we may fall into the grave error of deprecating the knowledge and skills of those who serve God by serving the needs of humanity. It is true that science, mathematics, linguistics, and social studies are all of the world in a sense, but to conclude from this that one should not major in these fields in college is to have a misconception of God’s word. God created the mind of man and gave him his rational faculties. He has placed no limit upon the scope of man’s intellectual attainment. Deity is not anti-intellectual.

We may best grasp the significance of the word “world” by studying some of its characteristics. The world resents and hates those who testify of the true nature of its works. “It hates me because I testify of it that its works are evil” (John 7:7). It has a distinct animosity toward those who are not of it. “The world has hated them because they are not of the world, even as I am not of the world” (John 17:14). Contact with the world defiles (2 Peter 2:20) and stains (James 1:27) because of the corruption that is in it through passion (2 Peter 1:4). We may define the world as that state which represents the totality of human life, apart from, alienated from, and hostile to God. The wisdom of this world seldom parades under a banner ascribed “Atheism.” It prefers such labels as “secularism” or “humanism.”

In our introductory passage Jesus expresses gratitude that God has revealed to babes what he has hidden from the wise or sophists. Clearly that which is revelation to one group is concealment to the other. We are not to conclude from this that God has deliberately forbidden one group to have access to revealed truth. On the contrary, “God desires all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim. 2:4). There must be something about the nature of the revelation which makes it invisible to those in a certain frame of thought.

Is Revelation Complete?

The apostle points out that there is a spirit of the world which some men receive and this renders them unspiritual. In this state they cannot understand the things which God gives for these are bestowed through the Holy Spirit. “Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is from God, that we might understand the gifts bestowed on us by God” (1 Cor. 2:12). The revelation imparted to the apostles has been imparted unto us in words. The philosophy of the world has a vocabulary and the Holy Spirit has his vocabulary. This does not mean that the Spirit has invented or developed a new language for the world. Instead, he has taken the means of communication adopted by man and used it for conveying a divine message. The vocabulary has been enriched and ennobled by a depth of meaning which transcends the material or natural.

It is the conviction of this writer that while revelation is complete in one sense, it is not in another. The message of God involved in the new creation is complete, the discovery of what is contained in it is not. In view of the fact that revelation is an uncovering, the word of God does not actually become a revelation to us as individuals until we discover the real depth of its meaning. Of course there is no new truth as relates to God’s mind but there are depths of understanding which have not yet been plumbed, and men will continue to bring up gems of truth they have not seen before from the unfathomed caves of God’s grace. The Holy Spirit did not give the word and then retire from the scene. He dwells in the same heart into which the revelation is received and quickens the understanding. It is here that the merely natural (animal) man, motivated by “the spirit of the world” is at such a loss. “And we impart this in words not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit, interpreting spiritual truths to those who possess the Spirit” (1 Cor. 2:13).

The reason why God’s revelation has been hidden from the wise is because it is spiritually discerned. The sun shines as brightly upon a blind man as upon one with full use of sight, but the former does not see it. It is hidden from him because of the lack of the faculty of sight. “In this case the god of this world has blinded the minds of the unbelievers, to keep them from seeing the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the likeness of God” (2 Cor. 4:4). “The unspiritual man does not receive the gifts of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them because they are spiritually discerned” (1 Cor. 2:14). Note the expression “they are folly to him.” This occurs in a context which is dealing with worldly philosophers. To such wise men the real wisdom of the ages is foolishness.

It is a startling thing that while some did not know God because of ignorance, these did not know him because of wisdom. “For since, in the wisdom of God, the world did not know God through wisdom, it pleased God through the folly of what we preach to save those who believe” (1 Cor. 1:21). This is the folly of philosophy! This is the ignorance of wisdom! Please observe carefully how the word “believe” is used in direct contrast to “wisdom.” The wisdom of this age creates its own criteria. These rule out “belief” and make “faith” the resort of the credulous and unlearned. Having decided by “wisdom” that there is no realm of the supernatural everything which purports to be in that category must be explained by naturalistic means or regarded as a myth. Anyone who believes it is just not “wise.”

By ruling out in advance any possibility of the miraculous all proof to the contrary is simply explained away with “plausible words of wisdom.” The manna in the wilderness, for example, was not “bread from heaven” but the exudation of a honey-like sap from trees. The feeding of the multitude by Jesus was accomplished when selfish men were motivated to dig into their packs to share their food with those who had none, moved by the altruistic action of him who blessed a little store and began to share with those nearest him. Thus, what passes for “faith” rests in the wisdom of men and he is considered most faithful who can explain away the most. The power of example is substituted for the example of power. A demonstration of the spirit of sharing takes the place of sharing in a demonstration of the Spirit. In such a time as this the words of the apostle ring out, “And my speech and my message were not in plausible words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and power, that your faith might not rest in the wisdom of men but in the power of God” (1 Cor. 2:4, 5).

The Faith of Babes

This explains why God has revealed to babes what has been hidden from the wise. Unable to devise finespun theories to explain what they do not understand, babes must exhibit trust and confidence in one to whom they commit themselves because of mutual love. A little child is not afraid to walk in the dark if he can hold to the hand of his father. Although in the blackness of night he cannot see the father’s form, he knows he is present by the warm grasp of his hand. Though he cannot see ahead he has firm confidence he will reach his destination because the one who guides him knows the way. This is the wisdom of ignorance as contrasted with the ignorance of wisdom. The wisdom of ignorance leads to faith; the ignorance of wisdom leads to unbelief.

This brings us to the point in our investigation where we can note the setting for the remarks of Jesus. The writer declares, “At that time Jesus spoke these words.” If you will read the preceding paragraph you will note that Jesus was censuring the cities of his personal acquaintance. He compares them with the luxury-loving heathen cities of Tyre and Sidon and the vice-ridden city of Sodom. The basis of his condemnation was that enough miracles had been performed within their walls that would have caused the heathen cities to repent in sackcloth and ashes. But the worldly-wise citizens of Galilee paid no heed. “Then he began to upbraid the cities where most of his mighty works had been done, because they did not repent. . . . At that time Jesus declared, ‘I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and understanding and revealed them unto babes.’”

It seems quite apparent that our faith must rest either in the demonstrations of God or in the explanations of men! But the explanations are of demonstrations. The very fact that men feel called upon to make an explanation is positive admission that something happened and the something that happened was of sufficient importance to require an explanation. Take, for instance, the work of feeding the multitude with a few loaves and fishes. It has been suggested that under the influence of Jesus a little lad was induced to share his meager lunch with those around him. This stimulated others to divide what they had brought with those who had none. When all shared in giving and receiving there was enough for all. Later, as men reflected upon the event, it seemed like a miracle that enough food had been produced to satisfy the need of everyone.

This is an example of the “plausible words of men’s wisdom.” The event is thus reduced to a sort of glorified fish fry with everyone kicking in his share of the edibles. But no one goes to such length to discuss the thousands of “pot luck dinners” which have occurred in past centuries. Moreover, the explanation does not meet the demands of the demonstration. John was present on the occasion and helped to tidy up the place and gather up the scraps. In his straightforward and simple account it seems almost as if he anticipated that “there would be scoffers in the last days.” He records that Jesus and his disciples were sitting down up in the hills on the other side of the Sea of Galilee when they looked up and saw a great crowd of people swarming toward them.

Jesus turned to Philip and said, “How are we to buy bread, so that these people may eat?” John said he did this to test Philip because Jesus knew what he was going to do. What he was going to do was not to discover enough folks with prepared lunch boxes to take care of the multitude. Andrew remarked that there was a lad who had five barley loaves and two fish but he spoke deprecatingly of the fact. “What are they among so many?” John declares that Jesus took the loaves and when he had given thanks he distributed them to those who were seated; so also the fish, as much as they wanted. Then occurs an interesting statement about the meal, “So they gathered them up and filled twelve baskets with fragments from the five barley loaves left by those who had eaten.”

One cannot gauge the power of a miracle by its effect upon those who did not see it, or who live many centuries afterward. The real test is upon those who were present and witnessed the event. The reaction to this feat was amazing. “When the people saw the sign which he had done, they said, This is indeed the prophet who is to come into the world.” This is a significant statement. They referred to the prediction of Moses, “A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you from among the people like unto me!” Their statement the following day indicates that their minds reverted to Moses because “he gave them bread from heaven to eat.” In view of the fact that they had seen another miraculous feeding they immediately concluded that this was the prophet like Moses.

Even more important is the next statement, “Perceiving then that they were about to come and take him by force to make him king, Jesus withdrew again to the hills by himself.” It is evident that if they could make him king they could live off of government handouts the rest of their lives. Human nature has not altered to any great extent down to our day. The very next day the multitude showed up again, after having diligently sought him, but he said, “Truly, truly, I say to you, you seek me not because you saw signs, but because you ate your fill of the loaves.”

We should not leave this without mentioning a subsequent event related to it. The disciples embarked in a boat with little preparation. “Now they had forgotten to bring bread; and they had only one loaf in the boat.” Jesus cautioned them to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod. “And they discussed it with one another, saying ‘We have no bread.’ And being aware of it, Jesus said to them, ‘Why do you discuss the fact that you have no bread? Do you not perceive or understand? Are your hearts hardened? . . . Do you not remember? When I broke the five loaves for the five thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces did you take up?’ They said to him, ‘Twelve.’ ‘And the seven for the four thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces did you take up?’ And they said to him, ‘Seven.’ And he said to them, ‘Do you not yet understand?’” We leave this case with the wise men of this age facing the same questions. “Are your hearts hardened? Do you not yet understand?”

Wisdom vs. Power

Man cannot rid himself of faith. He must place his trust in something. It is noteworthy that Paul does not place the wisdom of God in conflict with the wisdom of men when dealing with this question. Instead he writes, “that your faith might not rest in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God” (1 Cor. 2:5). It is here the battle rages in every generation. The wisdom of this age constantly batters away at God’s demonstration of power. It can appropriate the wisdom and claim it, but it cannot duplicate his power, so must deny it. This is always the basic attack against revelation. Babes feel no need of explaining it so merely accept it. The wisdom of men regards revelation as a challenge because it dare not adopt what it cannot explain in naturalistic terms.

There are two methods of attack. One is to reduce God’s revelation to the purely human realm; the other to exalt the productions of men to an equality with that of God. It matters little, in the final analysis, whether God is reduced to the status of man, or man is elevated to the status of God. The effect is the same if one denies that what Paul wrote was inspired of God, or if he affirms that Milton and Shakespeare were equally inspired with Paul.

The crux of the conflict in our day must always center around the prophecies of those who claimed to reveal in advance the things which would transpire. There are two kinds of power in the universe— intellectual and physical. Those who acknowledge the existence of God must recognize that there are two kinds of intellectual power, natural and supernatural; and two kinds of physical power, human and superhuman. The first of these in each instance belongs to man and grows out of his nature; the second belongs to God and is inherent in his nature. It follows then that there must be two kinds of miracles, or two forms of demonstration of the divine power.

One type of miracle would relate purely to the physical realm and would operate in such a manner as to especially affect those who saw or heard the demonstration. It would be apprehended by sensory perception and thus would encourage immediate belief in the hearts of the observers. Such a miracle could affect future generations only through belief of the testimony of those who saw it. But supernatural demonstrations in the intellectual realm are not limited to the earthly sojourn of him who manifests them. In view of the fact that the nature of man hides from him the future, to predict with utmost accuracy what will transpire a thousand years hence requires the same supernatural power of intellect as to feed a multitude by multiplication of loaves and fishes requires superhuman power over physical elements.

Only those who were present at the time had actual knowledge of the miraculous works of Jesus. Future generations could only have faith in what these observers saw. By the same token, those who heard the prophetic words of Jesus could not have knowledge of their fulfillment as would future generations. Because of the two types of miracles, one to affect directly those who were present, the other to affect directly those who were remote from the scene in time and place, we can summarize by saying that we believe what they saw, and they believed what we see.

Basis of Conflict

There is a constant conspiracy of “the wisdom of this world” to rid the world of a belief in the foreknowledge of God. Science, falsely so-called, is engaged in a relentless struggle to eliminate belief in divine prescience. If it be admitted that “known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world” the fate of the skeptic is sealed. In order to get rid of hell men must first get rid of God, for it has been predicted that he will be revealed from heaven “in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God” (2 Thess. 1:8). To offset the possibility of that revelation from heaven men must deny the probability of any revelation from heaven.

We would expect the brunt of the attack to be made on that portion of sacred scripture which is alleged to be first in order of time. If doubt can be cast upon it a cloud will rest upon subsequent writings claiming the same origin. We are not at all surprised at the brilliant and incisive attack on the writings of Moses. Boiled down and simmered away, however, it all relates to a denial of the possibility of God knowing the future and preparing for it in advance. Since this calculated attempt is a good illustration of the tactics employed by “the wise and understanding” in every avenue of scripture let us briefly analyze some of the methods used.

The unfolding of human history demonstrates how “God takes the wise in their own craftiness.” One generation invests time seeking to discover what is wrong with the Bible, in time another generation reveals what is wrong with their discoveries. For a number of years “the wise” declared that Moses could not have been the author of the Pentateuch because the art of writing had not been invented and the laws enunciated were far in advance of the comparable culture of that day. But in December, 1901, a block of black diorite was found on the acropolis of Susa, by a French expedition under the direction of Director General M. de Morgan. This monument, almost eight feet long and broken in three pieces, proved to be the "Code of Hammurabi," a civil law produced by an early Mesopotamian king who antedated the time of Moses. The critics now took the position that Moses had copied his law from previous documents. A meticulous search was made for a likeness of the ten commandments in the earlier code with a view to casting doubt on the original authorship in the sacred scriptures.

Men who labor on the assumption that there is no such thing as a divine revelation will grasp at straws to sustain their theory and when enough straws are found will imitate the first of "The Three Little Pigs" and build a straw house which is subjected to destruction as other discoveries are made. Strangely enough, one theory is always succeeded by another theory. There is seldom a return to the obvious fact of divine interposition in the affairs of men. It is amazing the extent to which the writings of Moses have been dissected and the grotesque creature which has been created when men try to fit the pieces together according to their own ideas.

Currently, the bulk of so-called scholarship which is branded as relatively conservative, regards the law as being a synthesis of at least four different codes. One of these was the Deuteronomic code, another a blending of two later scribes or schools, one of which used the term Elohim for God, the other the name Jehomih, or Yahweh. A third source was "the holiness code" purportedly written by the prophets of the exile and post-exilic period, and the last was the priestly code of ritualism which allegedly developed during the exile and upon the return to rebuild Jerusalem. Thus, William Barclay in his book "The Making of the Bible" writes, "To put it in very brief form, we might say that the Law, the Pentateuch, equals D+JE+H+P.” One who still believes that God spoke to Moses and that Moses wrote the first five books is looked upon with some degree of pity and compassion as a credulous antiquarian or an immature babe. It is in that company we take our place, admittedly with more faith in God than the wisdom of this age.

Nature of Criticism

The first known attack upon the authorship of Moses was made by Celsus, the first great heathen opponent of Christianity. Until his time, not one question related to this initial revelation was known. The works of Celsus have been lost but they can almost be reconstructed from the complete reply and refutation made by Origen. It is apparent that Celsus, who wrote near the close of the second century (Lardner dates his work as 176), was brilliant, clever and erudite. I have studied the reply of Origen and it is obvious that Celsus made all of the arguments which were revived by the rationists of more recent ages. But so thorough was Origen in his devastating review that he silenced the opposition until many centuries had rolled by.

The Reformation sparked a revival of the opposition to the authorship of much of the sacred writings. As the scriptures were rescued from “dead languages” and translated into the living tongues of the people a great revival of Bible study was instituted. In the exchange of thought rivalry sprang up and out of this came opposition to long cherished positions. Following Celsus the next attack upon the authorship of the Pentateuch was by the fiery Carlstadt in 1520. He labeled it a forgery. Soon Roman Catholic writers took up the cudgel on the basis that to cast a reflection upon the authorship would weaken the Protestant contention for the Bible as “the only rule of faith and practice” and “the sole arbiter and court of appeal” in all questions involving religious or theological disputes.

A foundation for this was laid by Ibn Ezra, the great medieval rabbi, poet and philosopher. Born in Toledo, Spain, in 1092, he became a master of numerous languages while excelling in Hebrew, Arabic and Aramaic. Before his death in Rome in 1167 he had traveled over Europe and Africa for twenty-five years, leaving behind a voluminous mass of written materials among which were lengthy scriptural commentaries. He affirmed his view that the Pentateuch contained evidences of having been copied from earlier accounts and contained some post-Mosaic material. Although he was opposed in this conjecture by the Talmudical scholars, the slender thread he spun was picked up and woven into a strong cord by others.

In 1653 the Catholic theologian Masius (Maes) suggested that the Pentateuch had been re-written by Ezra. Two years later, Peyrerijs, influenced by Ibn Ezra, published his conclusion that the Pentateuch was not the work of Moses but an abridgement from a larger work by Moses. But it remained for another to give the greatest emphasis to this idea. Benedict Spinoza was of Portuguese-Jewish descent. Born in Amsterdam in 1632, he lived but forty-five years, but made a profound impact on the thought of his day and that of succeeding generations. He was given a thorough education in orthodox Judaism but was weaned from it by his research in physical science and through reading after the French philosopher Rene Descartes. Spinoza withdrew from the synagogue and was excommunicated by the rabbis who used political influence to have him banished from the city. Living just outside the city limits he eked out a bare living grinding optical lenses while writing his treatises on philosophy.

In 1670 Spinoza published his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, in which he took some isolated and obscure statements made by Ibn Ezra and welded them into a set of systematic propositions. His conclusion was that not only did Moses not write the Pentateuch, but the whole body of historical writings in the old covenant scriptures constituted a mere winnowing out of materials from a much greater mass and at a later date, and the bulk of the matter has become lost. In 1696 Anton Van Dale took up the theory and contended that the winnowing was done in the age of Ezra and was properly the work of this Jewish scribe following the exile.

A half century later, in 1753, Jean Astruc published what was intended to be a complete reply to Spinoza. Rejecting the post-Mosaic theory he postulated that Moses had relied upon previously written materials. Referring to the divergent titles for God, Elohim and Jehovah, he suggested that there were two accounts of the creation and later events and that Moses had placed them parallel with each other. It was his view that a careless or ignorant copyist had mingled them in consecutive fashion. He went so far as to intimate that there were as many as a dozen original documents and even speculated as to their respective authors.

Until this time the views of the various writers had been offered with no special attempt to label their efforts under a specific category. It remained for John Godfrey Eichorn to coin the term "Higher Criticism." Born in Dorrinzingen, Germany, in 1752, he was appointed professor at Jena when he was twenty years old, and in 1788 was made professor at Gottingen, where he served until his death forty-three years later. He advanced the idea that the original documents of the Pentateuch were all written during the time of Moses, some of them by Moses himself, and these were later compiled by someone during the time of Samuel. Eichorn gave the name "higher criticism" to his effort and it came to be a designation for the efforts of those who seek to prove that the accredited books of the Bible are forgeries in part or in whole.

It is probably too late to protest the assumption of this title by those who seek only to discredit what is generally believed. Criticism has its place in the study of any historical document, divine or human, inspired or uninspired. It is a legitimate pursuit when, as Prof. J. W. McGarvey says, "it is the art of ascertaining the authorship, date, credibility and literary characteristics of written documents." There is a difference between honest attempts at ascertainment and investigation merely to sustain a theory. Under the latter circumstances higher criticism has a lower motive. Why should the word "higher" be applied to discreditation and not to accreditation? Is one inferior simply because he refuses to run off after every speculative idea advanced? The whole truth is that there has never been agreement among "higher critics" and all of them have spent as much time criticizing each other as they have in ostracizing Moses! The most effective means of assuring you will be subject to criticism in the next generation is to adopt the views of the higher critics in this one.

The "document theory" with which we have been dealing was supplanted by the "fragment theory" advanced by Alexander Geddes, a Roman Catholic theologian in Scotland, and by J. S. Vater in Germany. In 1806 De Wette set forth the "supplement theory" which was modified by Ewald in 1837, out of which modification grew the "historical theory." Passing swiftly over these so as not to bore our readers we come to the theory most generally in vogue in our day. It received great impetus from an eminent scholar at Strasburg by the name of Reuss, but it was popularized by one of his students K. H. Graf. The latter insisted that Deuteronomy was prior to the ritual law which is now commonly designated the priest code. He credited Ezekiel with creating the ritual law with additions to it continuing to be made well after the days of Ezra.

Abraham Kuenen, taking his cue from Graf, went a step beyond and theorized that the religion of Israel was merely a natural religion. He taught that it was originally polytheistic like the other religions of the world, but under the guidance of the prophets speaking from a moral standpoint, it developed into a monotheistic religion.

Julius Wellhausen, building upon the foundation of Graf, constructed or fabricated the great speculative system so generally adopted by critics of our modern day. Briefly stated it involves a belief that the Pentateuch should be called “the Hexateuch” for it consists of eight volumes instead of five. This work is a composite one drawn from four specific stages as follows: (1) A Judean prophetic historian who was a Jehovist and who compiled a history of Israel about 800 B.C.; (2) An Ephraimite prophetic historian who was an Elohist and who produced a similar account about 750 B.C., the two accounts being compiled together by a redactor (German term for “editor”) at a later date; (3) A writer of a different character who wrote the main part of what is now designated Deuteronomy, producing his work during the reign of Josiah, or about 621 B.C.; (4) Beginning with Ezekiel the ritual or ceremonial law began to be placed in written form, to be codified by Ezra about 444 B.C.

The first of these is designated J, the second E, the third D, and the fourth P, referring to the priestly code. Distinct from all of these is a special section on the holy life (Leviticus, chapters 17-22), allegedly written by an unknown priest and labeled H. All of this was supposed to have been collated and joined together by a redactor not later than 280 B.C. It is possible that the average reader of a journal such as this one may shrug his shoulders and say, “Who cares?” It must be remembered that it is not such a reader who formulates the religious thought and moulds it in our generation. Those who do are not only constantly exposed to the views we have outlined but also to the subtle pressure to adopt them or be scoffed at by “the intellectuals.” And it is the indifference and unconcern of “the average reader” which makes possible the rapid growth of such theories.

Objections of a Babe

Despite its apparent insignificance this paper is now read by the students in a number of theological schools. Fully cognizant of the results which may accrue we unhesitatingly reject the hypotheses of so-called "higher criticism." To those who brand this as childish ignorance we simply say that we prefer to regard it as "childlike faith." An examination of the premises of higher criticism as related to the Pentateuch will demonstrate that practically all of the objections can be resolved by a firm conviction that God knows the future in advance and unfolding history is part of a design. Once admit the prescience of God and all of the difficulties disappear. Deny this and you have no God!

Why should "higher criticism" be so intent on destroying faith in inspiration? Of course one needs to be hesitant about judging motivations but the more I ponder upon the problem in the light of facts, the more do I wonder if these theories are not the result of an attempt to sustain another theory which leaves God out of creation. So long as there is design in revelation to govern the existence of man, it will be difficult to deny there was design in creation to govern his origin.

I am not alone in this conviction. Dr. B. D. Eerdmans, who succeeded to Kuenen's chair in the University at Leyden, and who also built up a reputation as a rationalistic critic said, "I definitely separate myself from the Graf-Kuenen-Wellhausen school, and I contest the so-called newer documentary hypothesis generally." He further said, "Evidently the argument of the critical analysis is not merely analytical. A good deal of belief in evolution is involved in it." (See "Criticism in Troubled Waters" by Prof. James Orr, D.D., Glasgow, Scotland, in Homiletic Review, Nov. 1909.)

The truth is that there are some great gaps which the critics have not yet bridged and one does not need a lot of scholastic ability to see them. Indeed, some of them are so simple as to appeal only to babes. It is assumed that the ritual or sacrificial law began to be written by the priests of the exile and was codified by the priestly scribe, Ezra, after the return from Babylon. The purpose was to sanctify and reestablish Jerusalem as the center of the worship of Jehovah and to make this city the mecca of the exiles. Then how can we account for the following?

1. The city of Jerusalem is not even mentioned in the entire Pentateuch. It is once referred to as Salem, but then it was the abode of Melchisedec to whom Abraham paid tithes. If Moses wrote the Pentateuch this is understandable, since it was not until the time of David that this city, a garrison of the Jebusites, was captured.

2. How does it happen that the hen was omitted from the list of clean and unclean birds? It is fairly well established that this fowl was introduced from India, probably in the days of Solomon, who was an exporter of exotics. By the time of Jesus the fowl was so common that he compared his concern for Jerusalem to that of “a hen gathering her chicks under her wings.” How did the later priestly writers overlook this domestic fowl from their code?

3. Why is there no reference to the use of music in the liturgical worship if the Pentateuch was compiled long after the days of David? This king ordained the use of orchestra and choirs in the temple worship and their use became a regular part of the sacrificial observance, but there is no reference to such in the Pentateuch at all.

4. In view of the fact that the synagogal system took its spontaneous rise from the needs created by the exile, why is there no intimation of it if “the redactors” who compiled the code lived after that time, even down to 280 B.C.?

Basis of Objection

I do not personally feel that I am acting arbitrarily when I fly in the face of modern “scholarship” and state my honest conviction that Moses wrote the Pentateuch. There are certain recognized criteria for establishment of the authorship of any document. These are accepted by the courts as guidelines when there is a contest over such a matter. In any case involving litigation over authorship the three following rules always apply.

(1) The claim of authorship found within the written document must be granted prior right in any consideration related to such authorship, and has a strong presumption in its favor. Such presumption must be even stronger if the document was one of public notice or accessibility and the claim was not contested at its origin.

(2) The validity of the claim of authorship may be established exclusively upon the basis of such claim as made within the body of a written document and must be granted unless such claim is proven to be false.

(3) In any contest of the validity of such claim of authorship the burden of proof rests upon the contestant and not upon the defender of such claim.

With reference to the first law of evidence there is no question about the affirmation that it is the word of Moses. Repeatedly the phrase, “And the Lord spoke unto Moses” is used. It occurs over and over again. That the writing was a matter of public knowledge is evident from Exodus 25. “And Moses wrote all the words of the Lord” (verse 4). “And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people” (verse 7). “And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words” (verse 8).

The claim to authorship went unchallenged for almost 1700 years and then was challenged by an infidel, Celsus. This challenger was so effectively silenced that not another dared to rise for hundreds of years. The currently accepted theory of the critics is only one of many advanced in recent centuries, all of them contradictory to each other. A theory relative to a proposition is neither self-sustaining nor a proof of the proposition. A theory cannot constitute proof because it first has to be proved, at which point it ceases to be a theory. A theory is not established fact or truth but speculation. The claim of authorship of the Pentateuch cannot be proven to be false by a theory and until proven to be false no one can be called either unscientific or injudicious who accepts it.

Instead of the critics becoming more certain of the validity of their theory as time permits for additional study of its implications they are becoming more cautious in advancing it. Julius Wellhausen produced in his "Die Composition des Hexateuchs" in 1889 what was designated as "the assured results" of higher criticism. It was alleged that he had established his postulation "beyond recall." But William Barclay, in his "The Making of the Bible" published last year says, "It is to be understood that what follows is a reconstruction of events, as we think that they happened, and, although in our narrative we state the events as facts, we are none the less well aware that it is reconstruction and not indubitable history which we are presenting."

It is at this juncture the danger of higher criticism is apparent. We live in a time when intellectualism is worshiped as the beau ideal of human attainment. Men do obeisance before titles and degrees bestowed by other men. They frequently accept what brilliant men write, forgetting that such men are not always sure of what they write. When such men state the events "as facts" lesser minds accept what is stated as factual, not knowing that the critics are merely recounting these things as "we think that they happened." Placed on that basis one may disagree with what is stated without disagreeing with proven fact.

Of course it is not true that one man has as much right to his “think-so” in any given field as another, if the other has invested years of honest study in that field. To declare that he has is to glorify the arrogance of ignorance. For one who is grossly ignorant of nuclear fission to blatantly run counter to the experts in this scientific area is ridiculous. One has a right to speak what he thinks, but that is not a prerogative to speak without thinking. Often the immature and superficial reasoner would be more respected and honored if seen and not heard. We make no charge of dishonesty or insincerity against those with whom we disagree in this article. In their research they have uncovered countless nuggets of great worth. We appreciate their efforts but simply refuse to accept as genuine what we believe to be “fool’s gold” because we have seen no assay which convinces us it is the real thing.

Conclusion

It is our conviction that “the wisdom of this age” has created a false premise and that the research has frequently been done with this premise in mind and has not been objective or final. We think this false premise is the result of a philosophy of naturalism which denies supernaturalism and thus shuts itself off from all that the supernatural can produce. “A man who is unspiritual refuses what belongs to the Spirit of God; it is folly to him; he cannot grasp it, because it needs to be judged in the light of the Spirit” (1 Cor. 2:14).

This passage affirms that there is a domain which “belongs to the Spirit of God.” Those things which lie in that realm are not discoverable by human genius but must be revealed by divine power. The unspiritual man slams the door shut on these things by denying there is such a realm. He brands as sheer foolishness that which is said to be revealed. He can no more grasp these things through a closed mind than one can physically reach through a closed door. Regardless of his mental genius in other fields he staggers in darkness with regard to spiritual matters when he closes the door for he shuts out the only light that can illuminate in this area. "It needs to be judged in the light of the Spirit."

One may be talented in the field of electronics, or skilled in any of the arts and sciences, and still be stumbling in a world of spiritual darkness. We are now prepared to understand the statement of Jesus with which we began this thesis, "I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and understanding and revealed them to babes; yea, Father, for such was thy gracious will." Note the manner in which God was addressed. He was designated as "Father" but also as "Lord of heaven and earth." This is important!

A babe realizes above everything else his dependence upon a family relationship. True wisdom in the spiritual realm begins with the acknowledgment of the fatherhood of God. "Should we not submit even more readily to our spiritual Father, and so attain life?" (Heb. 12:9). In addition to this there must be a recognition of lordship over heaven and earth, that is, the created universe. The same one who is our Father by spiritual generation is the governor of the universe by right of creation. When one acknowledges that his individual wellbeing and that of the whole world is directly related to God's providence, he has fitted himself for a proper appreciation of revelation. It is inconceivable that a father would not wish to communicate with his babe, especially when that babe acknowledges his own helplessness and absolute dependency.

A babe takes upon faith that which he cannot explain. His happiness is not conditioned upon having a rational solution to all of the problems of life but upon a complete and unwavering trust in the author of life. He is not committed to finding a way to explain everything so he need not explain away everything he cannot find by his senses. The Holy Spirit operates in a heart filled with faith, and not necessarily in a mind filled with knowledge. This is not to say the two are incompatible. Far from it. If such were the case not any of the wise men of earth would be called. It is only when the wisdom in the mind excludes the faith in the heart that the Holy Spirit cannot become operable in the person. The point is that there is no room for pride in knowledge or ignorance. Both present great temptations although the latter is the more contemptible as having the least justification.

“And so there is no place for human pride in the presence of God. You are in Christ Jesus by God’s act, for God has made him our wisdom; he is our righteousness; in him we are consecrated and set free” (1 Cor. 1:30).

The Basis of Authority

Mission Messenger (November 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

It was on July 4, 1823, that Alexander Campbell wrote the preface to the first edition of “The Christian Baptist.” In it he said,

It is a rarity seldom to be witnessed, to see a person boldly opposing either the doctrinal errors or the unscriptural measures of a people with whom he has identified himself, and to whom he looks for approbation and support. If such a person appears in any party, he soon falls under the frowns of those who either think themselves wiser than the reprove, or would wish so to appear. Hence it usually happens that such a character must lay his hand upon his mouth, or embrace the privilege of walking out of doors. Although this has usually been the case, we would hope that it would not always continue so to be.

It appears that Campbell’s hope has not yet been realized. The quickest road to unpopularity is the criticism of the religious segment or party with which one is identified. In spite of this reforms have to be wrought by such critics and the purity of the church generally is attributable to their efforts. It is in a spirit of humility I pen this article. I have no wish to be censorious. I do feel it is time that we face up realistically to our true status. At the risk of incurring partisan wrath I propose to examine the claims of “The Church of Christ” at its most vital point.

In every controversy between members of its own factions, or between the members of one such faction and those of another religious group, the first court of appeal is to the proper basis of authority in the Christian religion. It is generally affirmed that the one and only all-sufficient rule of faith and practice is the revelation of God in the sacred scriptures. So classic has this statement become that many members of "The Church of Christ" labor under the impression that they are the only ones who make the claim and that all other religionists have no particular regard for the authority of the scriptures. Strangely enough almost every sect in Protestantism makes the same claim. Let us mention a few of them by way of documentation.

The Methodist Church in its fifth of the "Articles of Religion" says, "The Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation."

The United Brethren in Christ in their "Discipline" state, "We believe that the Holy Bible, Old and New Testaments, is the word of God; that it contains the only true way to salvation; that every true Christian is bound to acknowledge and receive it with the influence of the Spirit of God, as the only rule and guide."

The Presbyterian Church in the United States has in its "Confession of Faith" these words, "Under the name of Holy Scripture, or the word of God written, are now contained all of the books of the Old and New Testament . . . All of which are given by inspiration of God, to be the rule of faith and life."

The "Discipline" of the Friends' Church contains the statement, "It has ever been, and still is, the belief of the Friends' Church that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament were given by inspiration of God; that, therefore, there can be no appeal from them to any other authority whatsoever."

Confronted with such statements many members of "The Church of Christ" laugh in sheer derision. They brand all of the adherents of these other religious parties as insincere and false to their alleged standard. It is commonly believed that only members of "The Church of Christ" are truly honest in stating that they regard the scriptures as "the only rule of faith and practice." All others who say this are either deceived or deceivers. Now we have no desire to become a professional "debunker" nor operate as an "idol-smasher" but we think it is quite apparent that most members of "The Church of Christ" are laboring under a strong delusion when they express the view that they always "speak where the Bible speaks and remain silent where it is silent."

Like so many other cliches this one is more easily quoted than practiced. The truth is that the brethren play down a good many things on which the Bible speaks and are quite adept at reading into its silence what they want it to say. They bind upon men the things which appeal to them or which they have learned by tradition from factional fathers, while other things are glossed over as of no importance. To one who really knows "the inside" of the movement, a plea for unity made to the sectarian world by the average preacher in "The Church of Christ" is somewhat ridiculous. It is astonishing how our brethren can make a glowing appeal "to the sects" to acknowledge the truth and become one in Christ, and then engage in a warm debate with a preacher from another faction bearing the same name on the following day.

"The Church of Christ" represents the most divided religious movement in America in our age. It is split into warring factions over instrumental music, missionary societies, orphan homes, colleges, the pastor system, brotherhood television programs, classes, individual cups, fermented wine, uninspired literature, marriage of divorced persons, and a host of other things. In some southern cities there are as many as fifteen different kinds of “The Church of Christ” and in all there are at least two dozen separate and distinct factions. Each of these regards its adherents as “the loyal brethren” and considers itself as constituting “the faithful church.” We have a right to ask “Which Church of Christ is it that speaks where the Bible speaks and remains silent where it is silent?” Every member knows the correct answer but when you tally them up you will find there are some two dozen “correct answers” and all of them different!

Our brethren are good people. They want to please God and reach heaven. Most of them are neither mean nor malicious but they are victims of their own propaganda. They have told others so often that they have no other creed than the Bible they have come to believe it. They must face up to the fact that although they have no written creed formulated by chosen delegates, they do have as many unwritten creeds as there are parties among them. Whatever a faction makes a “test of fellowship” or demands that one believe to be recognized as “loyal”—that is its creed. We are among the most creed-ridden people in existence today. And if one is to have another creed it would be better to have a written one. The conditions could then be stipulated in writing. As it is, a faction under the spell of a strong leader may change its creed over night and those who were “faithful” yesterday will be disfellowshipped tomorrow. One “stands in jeopardy every hour” under our present factional regime.

I do not think that God’s word is the basis of authority in “The Church of Christ” at all. If it were there would be no schism or factionalism, for this is contrary to the authority of that word which brands it as a work of the flesh. I am going to put my finger on some of the sources of authority in “The Church of Christ” because I feel the time has arrived that someone must be quite frank and open. Mind you, I know the penalty for doing this, but I cannot expect others to do what I am too cowardly to do myself.

I shall be accused of opposing “the Lord’s church” but I have no intention of doing this at all. I do not equate “The Church of Christ” with the church of God in an exclusive sense. I am sure that merely being an adherent of “The Church of Christ” does not guarantee that one is thereby a member of the one body. I suspect there are those in “The Church of Christ” who are not members of the one body at all and there may be members of the one body who have not so much as heard of “The Church of Christ.” The one body is certainly the church of Christ but it is not necessarily “The Church of Christ.”

I apologize for such apparent bluntness of speech. I know how it sounds to the ears of those of us who have always thought of ourselves as “the elect of God.” I could wish that I knew of some gentler manner in which to convey the sad news but I must proceed in my own manner, asking you to forgive any crudity of language. I will be tagged as a “sectarian” for writing this way but I take comfort in the fact that I am less a sectarian now than I have ever been in the past. Certainly I am less a sectarian now than when I thought our faction was “the loyal church” and everyone else was damned and doomed. That spirit of bigotry was the very essence of sectarianism.

It is a common thing for the brethren to tell other religionists that if they were willing to do what the Lord said there would be no division. On this basis it would appear that those who came nearest to doing what the Lord said would be the least divided. Since we currently represent the most divided movement this is quite a reflection against us. Of course none of our divisions were ever created by anyone doing something the Lord had not authorized. When we have a split both sides insist they have done “what the Lord said.” I never knew of a division in “The Church of Christ” in which either side was not “the faithful group.”

Either the word of God is not adequate authority to hold us together or we have unwittingly and inadvertently created other authority which we respect and follow in preference to the word of God. That this last is the case must be admitted, I think, by every truly serious thinker among us. In my discussion of this premise I will not be dogmatic or arbitrary. If you cannot concur in my thinking I shall still love you as a brother. However, I feel we should get these things out in the open and measure up to them. We should not hoodwink or brainwash ourselves into thinking that God will make an exception for us. He will judge us on the same basis as we judge others.

We need to recapture some very vital distinctions. One relates to the difference between revelation, inspiration, and interpretation. These three are not one. All scripture is given by inspiration. It was not all given by revelation. Revelation is from apokalupsis, “to lay bare, uncover, make naked.” Revelation is the method employed by God to uncover for man what he could not discover for himself. Revelation is the transmission of divine thought to the human mind. Interpretation is the application of the human mind to that divine thought in an attempt to grasp its meaning and significance for our life. Revelation from God is infallible but no man’s interpretation is infallible. God’s thought is absolute but our thought about it cannot be.

It is a common statement, “We are not divided over what God said, we are divided over what he did not say.” In a sense this is correct, in another it is not. Most of our little mottoes and slogans are the creation of immature minds. It is easier to oversimplify than to think through complex issues. Quoting little proverbs of our own construction satisfies us even though they may be contradictory. Actually, most of our divisions have occurred over opinions as to what God meant by what He said. Such opinions are accepted as “the will of God” and bound upon others who rebel at being compelled to acknowledge what they cannot personally see in a passage.

Another distinction which needs to be again established is that relating to gospel and doctrine. The gospel is the Good News concerning Jesus. It is to be proclaimed to aliens to enroll them as citizens. It must be believed to come into relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. It is that by which we are saved if we keep it in memory. Upon it there can be no difference. It consists of facts to which credible witnesses give testimony. One either believes their testimony or he does not. But the doctrine is the course of instruction for students in the school of Christ. There will be varied degrees of advancement and proficiency in it as in every curriculum demanding acquisition of knowledge. Much of our present difficulty lies in a confusion of these two terms.

The real authority in many instances is partisan traditionalism. All of us were either born in a factional background or grew up and came into one. So long as there are two dozen parties in "The Church of Christ" no one of these can be the "Lord's church" to the exclusion of those in all others. Each of these factions has its own traditional pattern, each has its "fathers in the faith." The words of these men in debate are quoted as "an end to all controversy." Members of one faction know but vaguely, if at all, about the chief men of another. They are frequently astounded to learn that there are others who claim to be Christians and have heard only remotely of their prominent authorities.

In reality, it is not the revelation of God at all which is the authority, but undue emphasis of some specific phase of it. Thus, those who argue "learnedly" about either side of the issues concerning cups, classes and colleges, may be shamefully ignorant of the scriptures as a whole, and almost wholly devoid of real scholarship. The word of God becomes merely a repository for argumentative material to sustain a narrow and biased viewpoint. It is searched and scrapped to find justification for a position which never once entered the minds of the holy apostles. The actual malady lies much deeper and factionalism is just a symptom of it. The real basis of our trouble is a form of legalism which perverts and subverts the very purpose of the sacred scriptures.

The tendency of legalism and factionalism is toward dishonesty. The faction exerts a tremendous influence over one who is within its clutches. All sorts of pressures are brought to bear in order to keep him from defecting. There is always the threat of excommunication with its subsequent boycott. There is the fear and dread of being branded a heretic or apostate if one no longer subscribes to the party test and regards the church as being greater than the faction. Many men “go along” keeping their inmost thoughts to themselves, not even able to discuss them with wife and children lest they discourage their spiritual growth which is always frail and precarious under a factional regime. It is obvious that the factional pattern, not the word of God, is the basis of authority in the various factions which bear the title, “The Church of Christ.”

“The Church of Christ” suffers from spiritual schizophrenia. It has a dual personality, one side of which it exhibits to the rest of the religious world, the other of which is known only to those inside the circle. A front is put on to project an image to the sectarian world of a great organization of more than two million members in the United States, all of whom bask in the sunlight of perfect harmony, held together by the indissoluble tie of mutual respect for the authority of the new covenant scriptures. Nothing is said about the thousands who have become disillusioned by petty clerical politics but who are afraid to leave for fear that in so doing they will be “deserting the Lord’s church.”

A careful study will show that “The Church of Christ” as it exists in the United States is not at all a united monarchy under the authority of one supreme sovereign. Instead it is a conglomeration of factions, many of which are ruled by “editorcracy.” This word, which I have personally coined to define our state, means government by editors. It will be found by objective survey that most of the factions center around a periodical. The place where it is published virtually constitutes the party headquarters. The editor often exercises a sway over both congregations and individuals which can extend to spiritual life or death in so far as the faction is concerned. His expressed disapproval of any man, his refusal to recognize or publish his reports, may constitute “the kiss of death.” The long arm of journalistic discipline and censure can reach across the continent and override an eldership.

This provides an unhealthy state of affairs which belies the claim of congregational autonomy. Each editor has a clique composed of those in his favor. Others out in the field must walk circumspectly lest they offend this coterie of court favorites and a whispering campaign be started with the words, “You’d better keep an eye on Brother A. He is not as sound as he once was.” When this begins the unfortunate victim must take steps to ingratiate himself with “our main preachers” at once or he will pay the price of rejection. Men who seek to work into partisan graces publish their confessions or acknowledgments in the journal, whereupon the editor affixes his stamp of approval and the penitent can once more secure a lucrative position and avoid starvation for himself and family. The basis of authority for each faction is not the revealed scriptures but the official interpretation sanctioned by the editor. He determines what is to be made a test of fellowship, what is optional, and what is of no consequence. The list differs in each faction, the degree of emphasis determining the category.

Regional supervision is frequently exercised through what is called “the preachers’ luncheon group.” This is a select dining club composed of the preachers in an area who subscribe to a factional viewpoint. Occasionally they allow their wives to attend. At such gatherings local policies and procedures come under review and tentative agreements are reached which are then “sold” to the elders and congregations by various pressure methods. The standard is not the word of God but orthodoxy. If someone in the area dares to think for himself and becomes “a fly in the party ointment” discussions are held as to how to best “handle him.” If the preachers feel they can insulate the congregations against his thinking by subtle warnings and veiled threats it will be decided to “let him die on the vine.”

If the non-conformist is persistent and will not “play dead,” and if there is danger that the boycott will not hold, a motion is made and seconded to invite the offender to appear before the preachers to be questioned. If he consents to this he will find a tape recorder all set up and he will be grilled by a chosen spokesman with previously devised questions. His answers can then be lifted and edited in such a manner as to prove him to be a “heretic.” The best way in which to meet the demand of a “preacher’s luncheon group” for a conference is to insist that an open invitation be given to all of the preachers, elders and members, male and female, in the area. Let all of the brethren attend and participate in the questioning. One who refuses to recognize the jurisdiction over his faith of the self-appointed tribal council and tribunal, and who insists upon the liberty of the entire priesthood of all believers is a real problem. Orthodoxy always thrives on “a closed door policy.”

Individual congregations are “held in line” not by a free approach or appeal to the sacred scriptures as authority but by a false impression which has been created relative to the function of elders. Despite the positive statement that in their oversight they are not to tyrannize over those allotted to their care, they often exercise a dogmatic and arbitrary sway which must be accepted in abject and servile obedience. We have no intention of reflecting against the hundreds of godly and consecrated men who have been invested with the office and certainly no desire to encourage disobedience or revolt against any God-given authority they may possess. But “The System” which operates under the title “The Church of Christ” has perverted the functions of the presbytery and reduced the congregations in some cases to a state of spiritual serfdom. The elders decide upon policy and this must be accepted without recourse or protest. “The voice of the presbytery is the voice of God.”

A little reflection will show that this differs from the papal system only in degree. The elders are not infallible by right of office. Theirs is not at all the task of interpreting the sacred scriptures for any persons other than themselves. In fact there is no “official interpretation” authorized by God and one man’s view or opinion is not necessarily any more authoritative than that of any other man. When one develops strong personal convictions about the meaning of a passage, to encourage him to drop or sublimate his view, and accept that of the elders, right or wrong, may make an obedient hypocrite out of him but it can never make a devoted and free servant of Jesus Christ. It is amazing how often we reproduce on a local scale with minor characters the case of Galileo. If the elders are infallible in interpretation, which ones of them are? That they are not infallible arbiters is proven by the fact that they frequently disagree and often divide the flock over “what the Bible teaches” as it is so quaintly phrased.

Our real hope lies in the fact that so many are being challenged to think for themselves in this generation. Consecrated young men and women, trained to reason, and with a firm regard for the authority of the sacred word, are no longer content to accept orthodoxy as a substitute for that word and its authority. They are questioning the right of tradition, of a clerical caste, or of a closed-door group, to impose arbitrarily upon their thinking processes, when in the final judgment they shall be answerable to none of these, but only to the Lord Jesus Christ. Obviously this will create a ferment and state of temporary unrest. In our humble judgment this may be a good thing. Nothing is more needful than to jolt us out of our crystallized sectarianism and start us once again on the road to healthful spiritual growth.

We have no bitterness toward any of our brethren. All of us have been victims of “The System” which always results when a movement toward restoration ceases to move and bogs down in an entrenched effort to protect its gains. I was reared in one of the factions calling itself “The Church of Christ” and I have neither intention nor desire to leave where I am and go somewhere else. If one is looking for the sectarian spirit he can find enough of it to satisfy him in the attitudes of many of his brethren; if he is opposed to it this provides as good a vantage point as any from which to direct his opposition. There would be no gain accruing from transferring to another faction or in uniting with a sect of another name. My only aim is to be loyal to the Lord Jesus Christ wherever I am.

I give it as my opinion, with which you will probably strongly disagree, that orthodox “Church-of-Christ-ism” has seen its best days. I doubt there will be any very real or significant gains made in the future, for a number of good reasons which I will not now mention. Numerically it may increase in comparison with past figures because of the population explosion and other twentieth century trends. There will always be some attracted by a legalistic dogmatism for many shun the responsibilities which go with freedom. These seek a religion with the details “all spelled out” and are perfectly willing to equate human interpretation with divine revelation. There is a sense of security and comfortable well-being provided by the limited factional atmosphere in which one is convinced that he has “fulfilled the law of God” by observing the rituals prescribed by the local minister. But many of the members are becoming jaded and tired of “taxation without representation.” The world around has caught on that we are as short on performance as we are strong on preaching. Our tragic and trivial divisions effectively demonstrate that the word of God is not our rule of faith and practice.

Our appeal is not to any fragment, splinter, or segment of the disciple brotherhood, but to the fellowship of the concerned ones in all of these. Let us realize that the work of restoration has never been completed. In our trek from Babylon to Jerusalem we have been betrayed into thinking we had arrived when we pitched camp by the roadside. Too long have we like wine undisturbed in the cup “rested on our lees.” It is time to resume the journey. Let us strengthen our hands for the task as we cast off the chains and shackles of the party spirit. Let us march onward in the light of the word of God for that word must be our source of authority, our final court of appeal on earth. Let us rescue it from partisan hands and re-establish it as the real foundation of faith and practice. Then we shall have much to share with all of the eager searchers after truth in our distorted and divided religious world.

Problems in Attitude

Mission Messenger (November 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The course pursued by any religious movement will depend upon the attitudes adopted by those who promote it. These attitudes, in turn, will be formulated and conditioned by traditional patterns and interpretations of scripture. We are all, to some extent, products of environment, training, and mitigating circumstances, to which we have been exposed. Our loyalties are often determined by inheritance and early association. All too often we equate these acquired dispositions with fidelity to God. The most intolerant and bitter sectarian is vocal in protesting that he is a true servant of the Master.

The readers of this little journal are drawn primarily from the ranks of those who are heirs of the restoration movement which was launched early in the nineteenth century by those who had grown tired and weary of the bitter warrings and janglings of the party spirit. It was described by one of its more zealous proponents as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” Its goal was to restore a proper sense of fellowship and communion in which all of God’s children might work in harmony despite their varied opinions and divergent views. For several decades the movement made such tremendous strides that it appeared as if the domain of sectarianism would fall before its appeal. Then it disintegrated and lost much of its power.

Today, the heirs of the restoration ideal constitute the most fragmented and divided religious movement on the contemporary American scene. The public entreaty for unity made by the preachers of the movement falls like a hollow echo on the ears of a jaded populace all too familiar with the bitter attacks and lawsuits in which many of these same preachers have participated. Many have stopped by to listen to debates kindled by partisan animosity and filled with invective, innuendo and crude wit, and they will no longer be influenced by an invitation to unity from those who have proven themselves to be masters of dissension. The empty shell of the restoration movement remains but the spirit which once animated it has fled. Men still parade the mummy openly, but a mummy belongs in a museum.

What deadly philosophy has been adopted which would thus splinter and fragmentize a glorious movement to unite God's people? What metaphysical wolf in disguise has infiltrated the flock, to scatter the sheep and turn them against each other? We could hardly be more divided if Jesus had prayed for disunity and God had commanded it. We have split and shivered ourselves as if by so doing we were blessed of God and fulfilling the divine purpose among men. In some cities the startled inhabitants tune in their radios to hear the various parties sinking verbal tomahawks into each other as if tribal warfare constituted the beau ideal of spiritual attainment in Christ.

In such a complex situation as now confronts us we need to be careful that we are not betrayed into thinking there is a simple solution. The tangled skein will not easily become untied; the matted roots below the surface will not readily yield to pressure upon the plant above. But the difficulties involved should not deter the zealous researchist in an attempt to recapture and restore the spirit of the restoration movement. In no sense of having found the whole answer, we very humbly submit that we believe there are two ideas we should re-examine as we attempt in our generation to thwart "the will to divide."

Both of these have been sanctified by tradition received from our fathers and by their ingrained acceptance are actually hallowed in our thinking as though they originated with God. Let us look at them!

(1) The philosophy that purity of doctrine must be maintained by separation from brethren.

When our fathers were confronted with “innovations” they had to determine what course they would pursue in dealing with these matters. Their decision was to “no longer regard as brethren” those who practiced the things regarded as being unscriptural. Actually, as I shall show in a future issue, this committed the congregations to adoption of orthodoxy as a test of relationship. This has proven to be the rock upon which every vessel of reformation has eventually run aground. Orthodoxy is sired by fear and heresy is its stepchild.

The outworking of this theory can now be clearly seen. It has resulted in another schism every time an honest person could no longer pay lip service to the party norm. The aim of orthodoxy is to preserve truth, i.e., the body of interpretations accepted by the group and regarded by them as constituting truth. It proposes to do this by the deep freeze method, which actually is dogmatism and creedalism. It sets up conformity, instead of community, as the basis of brotherhood, and the one who cannot conform in every particular is placed under ban and eventually driven forth.

I have mentioned that orthodoxy is the offspring of fear and this is true. There is, first of all, the fear that in any encounter of truth with error, the latter must inevitably be the victor. In order to preserve truth, those who have it must retreat and withdraw, and build the necessary walls to protect themselves from further encroachment. Actually no such wall can ever be effective so long as those within continue to think and reason. It is because of this that none of the apostles ever encouraged the members of any congregation which they had planted to leave it and form “a faithful church.” Every congregation they planted was a “faithful one” and if these could go so far astray, a new one planted on the same basis could do the same. The quickest way to fill the earth with “unfaithful churches” is to divide in order to plant “faithful churches.” The “loyal church” fallacy is one of our gravest errors. But I have written so much about this divisive concept in previous issues that I shall not pursue it further just now. I want to come to another facet of our problem which I feel we should explore objectively.

(2) The philosophy that brotherhood is secondary to personal conviction and in any conflict between the two, the latter must always be defended at the expense of the former.

It is astonishing how lightly we regard the sacred relationship of brotherhood in Christ Jesus. We seem ready to dissolve it upon the slightest pretext. We constantly place strains and tensions upon it as though it were the most insignificant of all things within the spiritual framework. Yet there is every indication that God has always regarded brotherhood as of paramount importance. This is shown in his encounter with the first man ever born of woman. When this man showed utter disregard for the relationship, God three times used the expression “your brother” in such a manner as to demonstrate the divine concern for it. The allusion to this by John is very striking. “For this is the message which you have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another, and not be like Cain. . . (1 John 3:11, 12). Jude speaks of those who set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit” (verse 19) and declares, “For they walk in the way of Cain” (verse 11).

Abraham, the father of the faithful, recognized that brotherhood should not be endangered by stress and strife. He seemed to sense that the relationship which was so sacred, could be eroded away by constant friction. Thus he was willing to make personal sacrifices and concessions in order to maintain it intact. Brotherhood meant more to him than those things which would destroy it. He said, "Let there be no strife between me and thee, for we be brethren." It is interesting to note that he recognized the difference between geographical proximity and unity of heart, so he suggested to Lot, "Separate yourself from me." In this instance the true relation could best be maintained by physical separation. Unity today does not mean we are all in the same place at the same time, but that we recognize that we are all in the same person at same time. "He is our peace."

The fraternal relationship in Christ is always under attack. The sharpest darts of Satan are reserved for it. The Arch-foe knows that he is powerless before a united church. Nothing can hinder or impede the progress of God's people when they stand together and present an unbroken front. The only hope of the enemy is to get those who are children of God to turn the sword of the Spirit against each other. If they engage in fratricidal warfare and bathe their weapon in the blood of their brothers, the demons rejoice and hell has a holiday! The weakest spot in our armor is that of personal pride. It is here the conflict between maintenance of personal conviction and brotherhood relationship suffers its severest test.

Fortunately for those of us who respect the authority of the new covenant scriptures, the conflict is resolved by the apostle Paul. In Romans, chapter 14, he deals directly with the problem. A thoroughgoing analysis of this chapter is long overdue.

We must limit our remarks about it in this article to certain generalizations, but these may be used as foundational truths for more extensive study. Even a casual reading of the chapter will show that there is room in Christ for men to differ without destroying the relationship known as brotherhood. Verse 2 proves that those in the Lord need not all believe the same things to remain as brethren. Obviously this has nothing to do with what must be believed to enter the relationship for it is specifically said that life is conditioned upon believing that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God (John 20:30, 31). Should one cease to believe this he would cut himself off from the life of the Spirit and consequently from that fellowship which proceeds from the indwelling Spirit (Phil. 2:1).

In the faith, that is, inside the domain of faith, there will always be those who are weak as well as those who are strong. God's family is composed of babies, children, young men, and adults— all of them brethren. He even has some retarded children, members of the body who are “more frail than others” (1 Cor. 12:22). No two of God's offspring are at exactly the same stage of spiritual and intellectual development at the same time. The Christian way was never intended to make mechanical robots but to develop thinking men and women. This means that doctrinal attainment can never provide a basis of unity. To predicate fellowship upon it is to destroy all hope of oneness. Love, which is the fulness of law, is the only bond which can actually unite God's children. So we read, “To crown all there must be love, to bind all together and complete the whole” (Col. 2:14).

If nothing else had ever been written this would be sufficient, if grasped in its perfection, to prove that our unity as a family is more important than the personal viewpoint or conviction of any member of that family and no one can be a worse traitor to the Father than he who destroys the family relationship by trying to bind upon others such conviction. But more has been written and directly to the point. Repeatedly the term “your brother” occurs in Romans 14 and without exception it is used to show that brotherhood must be maintained at the cost of personal consideration. Brotherhood is the work of God and it must not be destroyed (verse 20). We must “not consider ourselves” (Rom. 15:1) but “each of us must consider his neighbor and think what is for his good” (verse 2), for “Christ did not consider himself” (verse 3).

Jesus did not condition our fellowship with himself upon attainment to the same degree of spiritual knowledge which he possessed. Think of all those whom Jesus has received in spite of ignorance, weakness, human frailty, and error in reasoning. Jesus has never rejected any man on the basis of a wrong opinion honestly held. He does not bind upon us what we are unable as yet to receive. He conditions his acceptance, not upon our knowledge but upon our love for God. "If any one imagines that he knows something, he does not yet know as he ought to know. But if one love God, one is known by him" (1 Cor. 8:2, 3). It is on this basis we must receive one another. "In a word, accept one another as Christ accepted us, to the glory of God" (Rom. 15:7).

All division among brethren is precluded by the law of love. This is the only law actually operable in the family of God today. Division is the fruit of certain prior attitudes. These are generally two in number— the tendency to become censorious and judge another for holding certain convictions, or to hold him in contempt because he holds such convictions. The first is the great temptation to those who cannot conscientiously do what others can; the second is the great temptation to those who can do what others cannot. If either of these attitudes is nurtured and allowed to thrive, bitterness and separation will eventually occur and the work of God will be ruined.

How can this be avoided? The answer is really quite simple. Quit playing God! Our personal convictions and scruples are the result of environment, early training, temperament, inner nature, personality and motivation. Only God is capable of judging why we are like we are. Let us then accept one another in Christ as we are, and provide an environment in which all of us may grow up into him. "Why do you pass judgment on your brother? Or you, why do you despise your brother? For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God" (Rom. 14:10). Our task is to preserve brotherhood and the best way in which to do so is to be careful not to place any obstacles in the way of a brother. One of the greatest stumblingblocks is dogmatism. “Let us therefore cease judging one another, but rather make this simple judgment: that no obstacle or stumblingblock be placed in a brother’s way” (verse 13).

Does this mean that one must relinquish or abandon a personal conviction out of deference to the scruples of another? Certainly not! How can one discard a conviction? If he can do so without compunction, it never was a conviction, but simply a prejudice. There is nothing wrong with having a footstool but one does not need to place it in front of the door so others will stumble over it. That upon which one rests his feet would then become an obstacle for the feet of another. The solution is not to smash the footstool, nor to berate the one who could not see it, but to keep the footstool in its place. When the other sees the comfort it provides he may be constrained to secure one like it. He will obviously be more kindly disposed toward it as he observes it holding you up than he would if you placed it so as to cause his downfall. The record says, “If you have a clear conviction, apply it to yourself in the sight of God” (verse 22). One does not need to start a footstool party simply because he has a footstool. Remember that tolerance is not endorsing things that are wrong but enduring those who think they are right!

Sectarianism

Mission Messenger (November 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

A few days ago I sat in a huge modern library building housing thousands of religious and theological works. I gazed with a feeling akin to awe at the stacks containing these volumes. It was appalling to realize the variety of interpretations, opinions, and explanations, exhibited in them. Errors of great consequence were proposed or perpetuated and defended in many of them. The writers were not unscrupulous. They were not malignant. They were men of erudition and sincerity. From whence came this great mass of controversial material creating confusion and consternation? Surely no glib or simple answer can be given yet I would like to suggest one idea which I think may have some merit.

Men are prone to present their views without first arriving at a proper understanding of the nature of the appointments of God for achievement of the divine purpose as relates to man. Thus much that is spoken or written is artificial and superficial. It may deal at length, and even learnedly, with some aspect of revelation without ever seeing its relationship to the totality of God's universal program for the world. There is always a grave danger that we equate that phase with which we are concerned with the universal program. It is difficult to believe that the Godhood and myriads of holy angels are not interested in our latest views and discoveries to the same extent as ourselves.

Perhaps this has been the foundation of much sectarianism. Certainly it originated, insofar as its honest proponents are concerned, with a serious misconception of the nature of the ekklesia, the church of God. No one who apprehends the import of divine revelation upon this important theme could ever condone or defend sectarianism in any sense. The fanciful theory that those sects which are mislabeled “Christian” are branches of the one body originated with men whose knowledge of the essence of the church was faulty and fallacious. Perhaps they were misled by the figure of the vine and branches in John 15:1-8, but they need not have been. Jesus clearly identifies the branches as men who are his disciples. “If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch. . . . By this my Father is glorified that you bear much fruit, and so prove to be my disciples.”

The body of Christ is not composed of divergent sects. It is not even made up of congregations of believers. It is composed of individuals who constitute the one body because they are united with one head. “Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it” (1 Cor. 12:27). One becomes a member of the one body by being baptized into it. “For just as the body is one and has many members, and all the members of the body, though many, are one body, so it is with Christ. For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body . . .” You do not baptize congregations, you baptize individuals, men and women.

Since the body is not composed of sects, no combination or coalition of sects can ever become the one body. The unity of the body does not consist of the peaceful coexistence of the sects, nor in their fraternization and functioning in one accord as sects. The church is a product of the Holy Spirit, a sect is the fruit of the party spirit (Gal. 5:20). Whether contemplated as branches or as members of the body, it is individuals who are involved. Therefore, all unity of the Spirit in its ultimate must be on an individual basis. It is as individuals we share the common life with the Father and Son through the Spirit and on the same basis share in the common life with all who drink of that Spirit.

All sects are useless to the accomplishment of God's purpose. They are worse than useless because they are inimical to the divine intent even as are all other works of the flesh. Instead of building up the kingdom of God it is distinctly stated that those who manifest the party spirit "shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (Gal. 5:21). It is not the multiplication or amplification of sects, but their abolition, which will best encourage the progress of the Way. Sects are produced by rivalry and are wrong in origin as well as in principle and character. One does not edify or magnify the church of God by building up a sect. The church is composed of a peculiar people but every sect is the result of a peculiarity. There is a grave difference! The peculiar people should flock together; sectarian peculiarities drive the sheep apart. We do not doubt that many of God's children are scattered among the sects. It is this fact which makes sectarianism deplorable. If only the followers of Satan were divided there would be no cause for alarm. It would rather be an occasion for rejoicing, since sectarian division is a sign of weakness and impotence, and a kingdom divided against itself shall not stand. But sectarianism affects the disciples of the Master who ought to be one. It holds apart and aloof from each other those who are commanded to labor in harmony and to follow after peace. It is a sin against the nature of the ekklesia, because it makes those who are called out act like those who have never been called. It is for this reason the apostle writes, "I beg of you to lead a life worthy of the calling to which you have been called . . . eager to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Eph. 4:1-3).

Just as men create sects through ignorance of the nature of the church so others encourage and increase them through ignorance of the nature of sectarianism. It would be impossible to destroy the church of God without first destroying the Holy Spirit. The one body is both created and sustained by the Holy Spirit. By the Spirit we are all baptized into one body, by the same Spirit we are all nurtured in the one body. “And all were made to drink of one Spirit.” By the same token it is impossible to destroy sectarianism unless we first destroy the party spirit. Sectarianism is both created and sustained by the party spirit. Sectarianism is the reflection and fruition of an attitude.

Most of our attacks against sectarianism have been quite empty and vain. They have consisted primarily of lopping off twigs and snipping at branches. They do not get to the real root of the difficulty at all. If we were to debate all of the current sects into oblivion without removing the cause of their existence there would be as many or more new ones for our children to combat in the next generation. The inefficiency of our method and approach is found in the fact that we have not been able to destroy a single sect but have ended up with numerous factions of our own. In the scriptural connotation there is no difference between a faction and a sect.

Our chief fault lies in dealing with those who are enmeshed and entangled in sectarianism as a mass or group. But the heavenly Father does not regard men as Methodists, Mormons or Mennonites. At his judgment seat each will stand and be judged as an individual. The roll call of heaven will not be one of parties. We should treat men as God treats them. It is wrong to charge against any man that which he disavows. It is a false accusation to impute to a man all of the doctrinal errors held by sectarian fathers in a less enlightened age unless he accepts and defends them. We should accept all honest seekers for truth where we find them for there is no place else for us to meet. We should ascertain what truth each holds and use it as a foundation upon which to build for there is no other foundation available in any man.

Sectarianism has made for shallowness of thought. This is a natural and inevitable result of undue stress upon some areas of the spirit to the neglect of others. And sectarianism must always exhibit itself in this manner. This has worked its own rebuke in many places and we have lived to see the day when some men in all of the sects are seriously and soberly re-examining their own platform and history. This is concurrent with a wave of solemn recognition that division is the scandal of modern Christendom and that we must find our way back to a common center or perish. As men leave the shallows and wade deeper and deeper into the stream of God's revelation we should be walking by their side to support and sustain them. We will gain little by pelting them with pebbles and rocks from that portion of the bed of the stream which we have pre-empted, nor will we achieve any enduring good by attempting to saddle upon them the yokes they have outgrown and discarded.

It is ever a source of astonishment to see those who feel themselves to be the chosen of God to the exclusion of all others, searching the scriptures with eagerness and avidity to find some grounds for rejecting and refusing all others who love the Lord. But perhaps we should not be astounded at all for this may be characteristic of this very type of personality. Yet it remains that such a spirit of exclusiveness is the very essence of sectarianism. It created "the circumcision party" in the Jerusalem congregation. It has created most factions since. We cannot overcome sectarianism by adopting the sectarian spirit. If we would be used of God to overthrow sectarianism we must renounce worldly weapons. "For though we live in the world we are not carrying on a worldly war, for the weapons of our warfare are not worldly but have divine power to destroy strongholds."

What is the proper method of overcoming sectarianism? The answer lies in a recognition that the party spirit is identified as a work of the flesh, and is, therefore, engaged in entrenched war with the Holy Spirit. "The desires of the flesh are against the Spirit, and the desires of the Spirit are against the flesh; for these are opposed to each other. . . ." (Gal. 5:17). Our task is to bring each person who is dominated by the party spirit to that place where he can be indwelt of the Holy Spirit, so that living by the Spirit he will be in a position to walk by the Spirit. When every one whose heart is filled with the party spirit becomes filled with the Holy Spirit, sectarianism must “fold its tents like the Arabs and as silently steal away.”

Now men act from motivation and one of the most powerful stimulants to action is example. If we demonstrate the power of the indwelling Spirit in our lives they will be led to imitate in order to secure the same benefits and blessings. We demonstrate the power of the Spirit by bearing the fruits of the Spirit. “The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control.” It is affirmed that against these there is no law. It might as well be said that neither is there any argument or defence. Every antagonistic action produces a reaction equal in force to the action. This simply confirms men in the party spirit.

We shall not be able to overthrow the party spirit by legalism. The fruits of the Spirit are not even in the realm of law — in respect to these there is no law. Those who walk after the Spirit are not under law. It is not by law but by love that God proposes to offset the works of the flesh. We have been laying down the law when we should have been living up to love. Those who are motivated by a desire to win personal victory or gloat over an opponent’s weakness are much more carnal and sectarian than those whom they oppose.

The spirit of exclusiveness and isolationism is simply the sectarian attitude gone to seed. This spirit exhibits itself in enforced censorship, boycott and intolerance. It seeks to tell others what they must read and hear and what they must abstain from reading and hearing. It demands that all others exhibit “honesty” by coming to hear our plea at the same time that it threatens with excommunication those who are fair enough to listen to the plea of others. It judges loyalty by adherence to party programs and promotions. It cheers even when we fail and sneer at others even when they succeed.

Sectarianism cannot be determined from a sign over a building nor by a religious title bandied about on the lips of men. All too often those who profess to be nonsectarian are the most sectarian of all. We cannot fight sectarianism by becoming sectarian any more than we can fight liquor by becoming drunkards. Much of what parades as “faithfulness to God” is merely fidelity to the party line. We pray that all who love God may rise above the sectarian spirit.

The Real Jews

Mission Messenger (December 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The church of God is catholic. It is protestant. It is composed entirely of Jews. It is made up completely of those who are the seed of Abraham. No uncircumcised person has ever been affiliated with it. In spite of the negative attitude so often evident in the writings of those who claim to be “members of the Lord’s church” every one of these affirmations is true. The holy apostles sustain them all in their sacred writings. No one can ever fully understand the true nature of the church of God who does not grasp their significance. It is the wide-spread ignorance of them which makes religious division such a factor in our modern world.

1. Catholic

The word “catholic” means universal. It refers to that which “embraces the whole” as its derivation indicates. The church is a divine creation. It is the body which belongs to our Lord Jesus Christ as the head. Every saved person on this earth is in it. There is not one who is outside of it. Because there is only one head there is only one church. No man can create or establish a church. The church is made up of “the called out” and no man has the power to call another out of sin. He cannot even call himself out. All he can do is to respond to a call.

There is a great difference in saying that the church is catholic and in saying or writing "The Catholic Church." The latter is a distinctive title and its very usage as such implies that there may be another church which is not regarded as "Catholic." If there is, the first cannot be "catholic" either, for it will not comprehend the whole. The very adoption of this title gives the lie to that which it is intended to indicate. It is true there cannot be "two catholic churches" on earth at the same time, but it is equally true that no church can be catholic which recognizes the existence of another which it designates as non-Catholic. Of course there is no such thing as a church which is not catholic, because the body of Christ, which is the church, is all-embracing.

It is at this point that many of those who claim to be non-sectarian reveal their underlying sectarian attitude. Since the church of God is simply the body composed of all those who are joined to the head, and since the members of this body are sealed by the Holy Spirit, no man or group of men can number them today. "The foundation of God standeth firm, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his." No census bureau can enumerate them. In our distorted, disturbed and distressed state, commonly called Christendom, God's sheep have become scattered over the sectarian hills and have become entangled in strange thickets. But they are still his sheep and he loves them. I also love them and want to see them walk in togetherness.

Men who over-simplify the problem seek to rid themselves of its implications by giving a title to that segment of the sheep enfolded in their corral. It is thought that by affixing the label "The Church of Christ" over the gate and by denying that any others are the people of God, this will make them exclusively "the Lord's church." Actually, this may contribute more to confusion than to furtherance of God's purpose. Salvation comes from standing behind the cross and not from being behind the right signboard.

It is a common phenomenon of our day to see someone point to “The Church of Christ” in a list of “churches” published by the census bureau, and compare statistical gains. Occasionally some naive and partisan soul refers to “the Lord’s church” as having some two million adherents in the United States, forgetting that the Lord’s church cannot be numbered by man and anything that can be is probably not the Lord’s church. Those who boast about their standing in a long line of rival denominations should remember that their very boast shows they are listed in the right category. There is no such thing as a Baptist Church, a Methodist Church, or a Presbyterian Church. Neither is there any such thing as The Church of God, The Christian Church or The Church of Christ. All of these are titles created and adopted by men as party labels in an exclusive sense. There is only one church now. There never was but one. There will never be another. One enters it by the new birth and every person on this whole wide earth who has been born again is a part of it, not through his action but by an act of God.

What we call “The Baptist Church” is not a church but a religious party that crystallized about certain principles of orthodoxy spelled out in the Philadelphia Confession of Faith. What we call “The Methodist Church” is not a church but a religious party that has crystallized about certain principles of orthodoxy enunciated by John and Charles Wesley, and finally embodied in the Book of Discipline. What we call “The Presbyterian Church” is not a church but a religious party which crystallized around the principles of orthodoxy set forth by John Calvin and others. There can be no such thing as rival churches. There are rival parties, many of them, and the partisan spirit which created them is always bitter and jealous. But the church is a creation of the Holy Spirit and in it is no work of the flesh.

The church is not composed of congregations joined together in an organization by subscription to certain orthodox views. It is a body, a divine organism, composed of individuals joined to Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit. “Now you are together the body of Christ, and individually you are members of him.” No man can attach another to Christ, no man can detach another from him. We are joined to each other only because we are joined to Christ. Our union is in him and through him. The only way by which I can be separated from another who is in him is by severing myself from him. The very attempt to segregate myself from others in him by giving a special title to those who concur in certain orthodox views is sectarian. The church has no title or special name because it has no rivals. It does not need to be distinguished from anything else for there is nothing else in its category. It is the church of God because it belongs to God. It is not “The Church of God” as opposed to other churches, for there are no other churches. It is the church of Christ because of his lordship over it. It is not “The Church of Christ” as opposed to other “churches.” The struggle to become non-sectarian by adoption of an exclusivist title is a symptom of ingrained sectarianism and demonstrates how subtly Satan works in the hearts of all of us.

The church is catholic because there is only one body, just as there is one God, one Lord and one Spirit. One might as logically talk about creating another God as another church. Jesus is a universal Savior and all who are saved are in his body, whether they be Jews, Greeks, slaves or free men. Every person on this earth in whom the Holy Spirit dwells is a member of one body. All of them are frail, fallible and frustrated in some respects. They cannot save themselves by their own power, individually or in the aggregate. “Christ is the head of his church and the Savior of the body.” That body is not a sect. It is not a party. It is not a combination of sects or a coalition of parties. It is universal and catholic, thanks be to God!

2. Protestant

Perhaps our negative attitude is more clearly revealed in connection with this word than it is with any other. Almost invariably when it is mentioned we think of filing an objection against something. So long have we evaluated loyalty to Jesus on the basis of what a man is against that we lose sight of the real fidelity based on what one is for. Only in a secondary sense does the word “protest” have any such meaning as “to dissent or object.” This is an acquired meaning as a little thought and study will indicate.

The word is a combined form. The prefix “pro” means “to be for.” We use it thus in the familiar phrase, “pro and con.” The root word testis means “witness” and protest means “to be a witness for, or in behalf of.” The primary definition as given in the English dictionary is “to assert; affirm; aver.” To say that the church is protestant is simply to say that it is “a witnessing community.” We grant that this original and divine concept has virtually become lost but we doubt not that it was a part of God’s intent and purpose. It has been tragically obscured by the rise and adoption of a clergy-laity system which has made “witnessing” the special function of a limited and professional group and has thwarted the conversion of the world to Christ. One of the healthiest signs in our day is the renewed emphasis on the responsibility of all the people. This emphasis is now found in every religious party.

The church can never be truly a protestant community until it recaptures in its fullest import the significance of “the priesthood of all believers.” It was re-affirmation of this vital truth which really sparked the reformation called “Protestant” and it was abandonment of it which kept that movement from being truly a reformation and caused it to founder on the reefs and rocks of sectarianism. Almost universal lip-service is paid to the principle at the same time that universal disregard is shown for it in practice.

Because of the enunciation by Jesus of the truth of the universal brotherhood of discipleship free from the entangling and degrading influence of human lordship and mastership, we will never bring mankind into a brotherhood until we abandon that system which keeps them apart. We can never have one world as long as we have more than one Lord or Master. The true ecumenical movement is not one which provides for an association of sectarian groups each of which pays homage to the orthodoxy prescribed by its own exalted clerics, but a brotherhood composed of those who are free men in Christ. "Call no man father . . . call no man lord . . . call no man master . . . you have but one Lord and one Master, and all of you are brethren." There is a grave difference between a brotherhood of men and a coalition of religious parties.

It was Peter who demonstrated conclusively that all of God's priests are laity, and all of God's laity are priests. It is not a mere accident that in connection therewith he also affirmed the divine purpose of this arrangement and demonstrated that the people of God constituted a protestant (witnessing) community. That Peter should be the one to do this through the Spirit is of the greatest significance seeing that men would use him as the basis for creating a false system diametrically opposed to that which he so faithfully portrayed. It is not an exaggeration to say that the full implication of 1 Peter 2:5-10 has never fully burst upon our consciousness since it was written.

The royal priesthood of verse 9 is composed of the people of God in verse 10. The word for "people" is laos. The priests of God are the laity, or, perhaps we should say it in reverse. The expression "people of God" shows relationship; the term "priesthood" shows the function. "An holy priesthood to offer spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ" (verse 5). Our task is not to make a laity out of priests but to make priests out of the laity. It is to bring a sense of vocation to the laity, the people of God. There is no such thing in God's vocabulary as "a layman." The laity embraces all of God's people in whatever capacity they function. All are ministers of God and all who minister do so as people of God.

God has never created “a clergyman” and by the same token has never created “a layman.” Men elevate one of their number as a clergyman and he, in turn, makes laymen out of the rest of them. The clergymen of today are the “fathers, lords and masters” whom the Lord forbade us to create. So long as they continue we cannot reach the state where “all of you are brothers.” God has a clergy but no clergymen; he has a laity but no laymen. It is unfortunate that an archaic rendering of one word in connection with God’s laity has created a misapprehension of the divine program. It is stated in the King James Version that the royal priesthood constitutes a “peculiar people.” The Greek word for peculiar is one which refers to securing a possession, generally by purchase. It relates to that which belongs to one as distinct from that which belongs to society in general, or that which is held in common. This will explain the contextual statement, “Which in times past were not a people, but are now the people of God.” They are his by right of purchase, they are God’s people because they have been bought with a price. They were people before, but not a people in the sense of a distinctive community belonging to a common Master.

That which makes the people of God a protestant community is the divine purpose in constituting them as a distinctive possession. “You are . . . God’s own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (RSV). Vocation has to do with calling. The laity of God constitute and comprise a royal priesthood made up of a purchased people who are a witnessing community. Their very existence is proof of the majesty and greatness of the power of God. They are an ekklesia, a community of the called ones, to witness to his wonderful deeds. The church of Christ is intended to be a protestant community—to witness to the world and not to be witnessed to.

3. Composed of Jews

Every real Jew in this age is a member of the body of Christ and every member of the body of Christ is a real Jew. The term “Jew” originally meant simply “a man of Judah.” It was predicted by Jacob that the staff of tribal identity would not be lost nor a lawgiver be produced from the tribe of Judah until the Peacemaker came, and he would be the rallying point for the people of God (Gen. 49:10). It is significant that Jesus is referred to as “the Lion of the tribe of Judah” (Rev. 5:5). The lion was the symbol of Judah and was on the tribal banner around which the tribe gathered. But it was predicted of the Messiah, “In that day the root of Jesse shall stand as an ensign to the peoples; him shall the nations seek, and his dwelling shall be glorious” (Isaiah 11:10).

As the men of Judah in the flesh once gathered around their ensign with its figure of the lion, so now the Israel of God (Gal. 6:16) gather around the real Lion of Judah. The apostle declares, “For he is not a real Jew who is one outwardly, nor is true circumcision something external and physical. He is a Jew who is one inwardly, and real circumcision is a matter of the heart, spiritual and not literal. His praise is not from men but from God.” The real Jew is distinguished by his condition, circumcision and commendation.

The word “real” does not mean that there were no physical Jews. It is not used for existence as opposed to non-existence. Rather it has to do with conformity to the design and purpose of God. The Jews regarded themselves as “the chosen race.” But the ultimate purpose of God was to base his election not on physical circumstances but upon spiritual. Those who relied upon their fleshly descent from Abraham as grounds of acceptability with the Lion of Judah completely missed the essence of God’s design. John the Baptist sounded the warning to them as he prepared the way, “And do not presume to say to yourselves, ‘We have Abraham as our father.’ ”

The rite of circumcision was first announced to Abraham and it became both a sign and a seal. Those who were fleshly descendants of this man bore the outward mark as a visible token of their covenantal relationship unto God. Anyone who was not circumcised was to be “cut off from among the people.” The fellowship and participation in the observances and ceremonies of the original covenant were conditioned upon submission to circumcision.

But the promise of God to Abraham reached far beyond the limitations of a physical nation which came from his loins. Just as in his immediate domestic relations Abraham sired two sons, one by a mere physical alliance, Ishmael; the other in conformity to promise, Isaac; so in the divine arrangement he was to become the father of a fleshly seed and of a spiritual progeny. The first was created simply to make possible the second. Abraham was called of God originally that the call of God might be universal through his spiritual seed. In view of this it is the spiritual ones, not the fleshly, who constitute the real people of God—the true Jews.

No circumstance of physical birth, no mark in the physical body, no earthly family relationship, constitutes the claim of acceptability with God. Every child of God is the seed of Abraham and is, therefore, circumcised, but the circumcision is of the heart. It is “not literal but spiritual.” The apostle puts it this way, “In him also you were circumcised, not in a physical sense, but by being divested of the lower nature; this is Christ’s way of circumcision. For in baptism you were buried with him, in baptism also you were raised with him through your faith in the active power of God who raised him from the dead” (Col. 2:11, 12). Only those who divested themselves of the lower nature are truly partakers of the higher nature. This divesting is “Christ’s way of circumcision.”

Abraham is the father of all who walk by faith and who repose confidence in faith rather than in their deeds as a means of justification. In commenting upon the fact that Abraham's faith was counted for righteousness before he was circumcised, the apostle declares, "He was not yet circumcised, but uncircumcised . . . Consequently, he is the father of all who have faith when uncircumcised, so that righteousness is 'counted' to them; and at the same time he is the father of such of the circumcised as do not rely upon their circumcision alone, but also walk in the footprints of the faith which our father Abraham had while he was yet uncircumcised."

In the same context Paul reasons, "The promise was made on the ground of faith, in order that it might be a matter of sheer grace, and that it might be valid for all Abraham's posterity, not only for those who hold by the law, but for those who have the faith of Abraham. For he is the father of us all, as Scripture says, 'I have appointed you to be father of many nations.'" The expressions "all Abraham's posterity," and "the father of us all," indicate that all who are in Jesus are Abraham's seed. This is actually affirmed in Galatians 4:29, "If you are in Christ, then are you Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Or, as the apostle states it in Galatians 4:7, "You may take it, then, that it is the men of faith who are Abraham's sons."

The first occurrence of the word "believe" in any of its forms in the holy scripture, is in Genesis 15:6, in connection with God's revelation to Abraham, "And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness." From Hebrews 11 we learn that there were those who existed before Abraham who acted by faith, but the account in Genesis does not use the word "believe" in describing their action. We hold that this fact is another undesigned proof of the divine authorship of the sacred scriptures. If it had been alleged that either Abel or Noah had been justified by faith, the critics would have ridiculed the contention of Paul that Abraham was the father of the faithful. As it is, nothing is more clearly taught than the fact that all who are in Christ Jesus are children of Abraham, and all who sustain the covenant relationship are circumcised with that circumcision made without hands. “We are the circumcised, we whose worship is spiritual, whose pride is in Christ Jesus, and who put no confidence in anything external” (Phil. 3:3).

It becomes necessary for us to define the quality of the faith which justified Abraham, for it is not just those who have faith or believe in something who will be justified. The record specifically states that the promise is valid “for those who have the faith of Abraham.” It is especially required that we be precise and definitive because we live in a generation which is developing a cult of belief. The last decade has seen a rash of books and articles affirming that power, pelf and personality are instantaneously available to one who pushes the button marked “faith.” These books become best sellers only because of their appeal to a society which is empty and aimless. They do not point out the real solution but their popularity points up a real problem.

This is an age of ready-mixed cake flour, instant coffee, and pre-cooked meals. It is also the era of the pat solution and the ready answer. In such a time men allow themselves to be exploited by “get rich quick” schemes which do not always operate merely in the realm of finance or economics. When such schemes are given the benediction of a scriptural quotation wrested from its proper setting their appeal is made greater because of the natural desire to have the sanction of heaven. But the justifying force is not faith as such for under such circumstances men preach faith as a law—the law of success. It is not faith in belief nor belief in faith that saves. In the final analysis a faith in personal belief is faith in oneself and the end is always disillusionment. This is the hope that disappoints. Such faith pampers the ego and appeals to pride but it does not lead to that full and unrestricted surrender which alone guarantees salvation from self as well as Satan. The world is full of men who proclaim justification by faith and whose attitudes demonstrate it is faith in their own mental capabilities and interpretations about which they speak.

Fortunately, in the same chapter (Romans 4) in which the apostle makes his brilliant and incisive argument related to the faith of Abraham, he defines the nature and content of that faith. An analysis of this passage may be one of the most important areas of scriptural research open unto us this day. It embraces but five verses (18-22) with the last one a statement of conclusions, "And that is why Abraham's faith was counted to him for righteousness." The foundation of this faith was the revelation of God. God made a statement of truth to Abraham, "Thus shall your posterity be." It was not a mere intellectual assent to this statement as a truth, nor recognition of it as a divine utterance which constituted faith, for the faith which is counted for righteousness is eminently more than this.

The faith of Abraham was actually transcendent over certain finite rational processes. This does not mean that faith is irrational as skeptics would urge in attempting to prove that it is the resort of the credulous and superstitious. Indeed it is only rational beings who can manifest faith. We tend to define "rational" in such a manner as to limit and circumscribe it by the reach of human knowledge. This is like confining perception by the horizon. Faith operates in that realm beyond the assurance produced by observation or experience. Its strength lies not in what we know but in him whom we know. Faith is a leap into darkness but not into uninhabited darkness. The dark valley of the shadow has its Shepherd.

To thus believe is not to act irrationally because rationality is not simply reasoning or understanding, but the power to reason, and it is the exercise of this power which produces faith. No man can prove that faith in God is irrational or contrary to reason until the consummation of all things. If it then is demonstrated that there is no God and the promises in which we trusted were but vain delusions conjured up in our own minds, it will be apparent that what we now call faith was fallacious and irrational. But if there is no God all life and mentality will have become extinct and there will be no rational beings to judge our irrational assumptions. On the other hand, if there is a God and his promises are fulfilled those who have not exercised faith in him will be proven to have been irrational during their whole lifetime on earth. I deplore that type of misplaced arrogance which spells rationalist with a capital “R” and equates it with skepticism as if those who believe are not rational.

Paul writes, “When hope seemed hopeless, his faith was such that he became ‘father of many nations,’ in agreement with the words which had been spoken to him, ‘Thus shall your posterity be.’” Almost every word in this brief sentence is filled with meaning for men of faith. Hope is a combination of desire and expectation in equal proportions. Although the desire of Abraham was great he had no reasonable grounds for expectation. Sarah’s womb was dead and his own body was as good as dead. In spite of this “his faith was such” that his response was equal to God’s revelation. This indicates that one who hears the word of God may have faith but not the faith that is such to make the response required. When God extended the life line, Abraham was willing to take hold of it though it meant laying his life on the line.

Abraham was aware of the obstacles to such faith but he wholly discounted and disregarded them as if they were nonexistent. To him the promises of God were greater than the premises of men. “Without any weakening of faith he contemplated his own body, as good as dead (for he was about a hundred years old), and the deadness of Sarah’s womb, and never doubted God’s promise, but, strong in faith, gave honor to God, in the firm conviction of his power to do what he promised.” This is the faith which justifies. This is what we must have if we “walk in the footprints of the faith which our father Abraham had.” This faith is not conditioned upon a trust in our own power or ability. It is a “firm conviction of his power” which enables us wholly and unreservedly to commit ourselves to him and be utterly oblivious of the consequences. In such faith our own achievements do not count. They are not even a part of the consideration.

Every person who is in Christ is a son of Abraham by faith, and therefore, a son of God. He is in covenant relationship with God. As many as have been spiritually circumcised are in the family, not by the blood of Abraham, but by the blood of Christ. In order to enter this relationship, belief of one supreme fact and obedience of one simple act expressive of it are all that is required. Every person who believes in Jesus as the Christ and God's Son, and who is immersed because of that faith, enters the covenant relationship. He may be ignorant of what is entailed in his new-found relationship, knowing little of his responsibilities or the blessings that will accrue, but when he manifests "the firm conviction in God's power to do what he promised," which prompts him to die to his past evil nature and give himself in glad abandon unto God, he has all of the faith that is essential to be reckoned for righteousness or justification. He has the faith of our father Abraham.

Such a man may grow very rapidly in grace or knowledge, or he may become dwarfed and stunted. He may have that keenness of perception which will early allow him to distinguish between good and evil, or he may be dilatory in exercising his senses and find maturity long deferred, but in spite of frailties, failures or shortcomings in judgment, he is still God's child. He is in the church of God. He is in the fellowship of all who are in the one body. He is a part of the one, holy, apostolic and catholic church of God. "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

Adventures in Religion (10)

Mission Messenger (December 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

The greatest thrills of human existence are not those which appeal to the flesh but those which are experienced in the spirit. The body is the tent, or temporary structure, in which one dwells and it is not so much what happens to the house as to him who lives in it that really counts. And there is nothing else which can provide the same sense of destiny, the satisfaction for deep soul-hunger, the incentive for complete surrender to service, as a consciousness that one has eternal life. It is unfortunate indeed that some regard this as being merely prolonged existence and look forward to it as they do life insurance which one must die to collect. Of course life insurance is not assurance of life at all and neither is the common concept of eternal life.

Eternal life is defined as knowledge of the Father and the Son. "This is eternal life: to know thee who alone art truly God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent" (John 17:3). The word "know" has a much greater significance in the scriptures than we generally assign to it. It means infinitely more than mere intellectual awareness. It is used to designate that intimate relationship of a man and his wife which causes them to merge into one flesh and become the creative agents of a new life. "And Adam knew Eve, his wife, and she conceived and bore a son." To know God and Christ in the sense of having eternal life is more than knowing about them. One might rehearse fluently every detail of the life of Christ and never share in the Christ life. To know Christ is to be joined unto him in such a transcendent relationship that one's own personality is surrendered and the two become one. "He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit."

It is at this juncture that legalism reveals its futility and emptiness. It is the stone given to him who asks for bread, the serpent passed to him who asks for a fish. Not only can it not satisfy hunger but it leaves one weak and faint from disappointment. It is disillusioning and disheartening. One who seeks to be justified by it can never know that he is saved. He proposes to tell others the way of salvation while living in constant doubt of his own state. It is my conviction that legalism stems from a misunderstanding of the relationship sustained by the written word to the Living Word.

I believe that the sacred scriptures contain a revelation of God to mankind, and that they are composed of the words of the Spirit. "We speak of these gifts of God in words found for us not by our human wisdom but by the Spirit" (1 Cor. 2:13). Such words are "words you may trust, words that merit full acceptance" (1 Timothy 1:15). But the new covenant is not written with ink. It is written with the Spirit of the living God. It is not inscribed upon stone tablets nor upon parchment but on the pages of the human heart. The new covenant scriptures are not a law for justification for "it is evident that no one is justified before God in terms of law" (Gal. 3:11). We are "not under law but under grace." To take the word of grace and convert it into a law to bind upon men as a written code of acceptance with God is to doom them to certain death.

Law cannot produce life. "If a law had been given which had power to bestow life, then indeed righteousness would have come from keeping the law" (Gal. 3:21). The bestowal of life is outside the province of law. For that reason the new covenant is "a covenant expressed not in a written document, but in a spiritual bond; for the written law condemns to death, but the Spirit gives life" (2 Cor. 3:6). The new covenant system is not one which presents Jesus as pointing to a book as our source of hope, but one which presents a book pointing to Jesus as our hope. A failure to understand this has produced a generation which can quote the book but still does not know Jesus. It is possible to have a head full of scriptures and a heart empty of the Savior.

One can possess a good knowledge of the scriptures and not have eternal life but he cannot possess the Living Word and not have that life. “God has given us eternal life, and this life is found in his Son. He who possesses the Son has life indeed; he who does not possess the Son of God has not that life” (1 John 5:11, 12). Men had the new covenant written in their hearts and possessed eternal life years before the apostles wrote the first word of the new covenant scriptures. And when they did write it was not to convey eternal life, but to confirm the fact that those in Christ Jesus already had it. “This letter is to assure you that you have eternal life” (1 John 5:13). It is interesting to note that John says about his letter, “It is addressed to those who give their allegiance to the Son of God.” This is the thing that really counts for one who does this will view the scriptures in the proper perspective.

Our problem today is identical with that of the Jewish legalists during the earthly sojourn of Jesus. When Jesus performed an act of mercy on the Sabbath it was more than they could stand. “It was works of this kind done upon the Sabbath that stirred the Jews to persecute Jesus” (John 5:16). One of the most poignant statements ever made occurred in connection with this circumstance. “You search the scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life, and they testify of me. But you will not come to me that you might have life” (John 5:39, 40). Notice that the Jews supposed that by possessing the scriptures they possessed eternal life. They diligently studied and meticulously investigated every word and phrase of the written word. They debated meanings and discussed implications. They scrutinized, examined and deliberated upon every interpretation. But they missed the whole point.

Any person, human or divine, is greater than the things spoken or written about him. No description of God can be equal with God. Just as the mind is greater than any thought it conceives or reveals, so the mind of God is greater than any revelation he has vouchsafed. The difference between the written word and the Living Word is that the latter was not only with God but he was God. He was not a revelation from God but a revelation of God. "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself" (2 Cor. 5:19). The message of reconciliation, the announcement of the fact, was entrusted to men, but there is a difference between a message and a person.

The grave danger is that men will make the mistake of thinking that in possessing the scripture they have eternal life and they will exalt the scriptures to the place of the Son. One cannot enthrone anything as absolute Lord of life without dethroning Jesus from that position. The purpose of the written word is not to give life but to testify of Jesus. One may be mistaken about many things in the written word as all of us are and still his eternal life will not be affected for the simple reason that life is not invested in the scriptures. Certainly they are essential to growth and development of maturity and one will be stunted to the extent he does not grasp them and revise and amend his life according to them, but life is in the Son. If one is right about Jesus he may be wrong about many things and still be saved; if he is wrong about Jesus he may be right about everything else and still be lost.

Jesus said to those who studied the scriptures diligently and scrupulously, "Their testimony points to me but you refuse to come to me for that life." God did not "throw the Book at us" but He gave his Son for us. The purpose of the book is to point us to the person. The Jews had the law of God but they rejected the Son of God. That law was "holy, just and good" (Rom. 7:12) and so was the Son. But they said, "We have a law and by that law he ought to die.” The law to which they referred was the law of God and they used it to kill the Son of God. That is what happens when men mistake the purpose of the scriptures and exalt a written code to the place of a Savior.

The fact that men could plead fidelity to the law of God as their reason for rejecting the Son of God should give us cause for concern when we see men today using what they refer to as “the law of God” to reject and exclude the “sons of God.” My soul is “bound up in the bundle of life” with all who have vowed allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ. The family relationship is one of grace and not of law. For me to use the words of God to drive out those who are in the Living Word of God is unthinkable. “This is his command: to give our allegiance to his Son Jesus Christ and love one another as he commanded. When we keep his commands we dwell in him and he dwells in us. And this is how we can make sure that he dwells within us: we know it from the Spirit he has given us” (1 John 3:23, 24).

Eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ his Son. It cannot be purchased, bought or earned. It is that joyous state of union with the source of salvation which takes away all fear, even that of death. It is not so much extension of time as exhilaration of soul. It is more a communion than a continuation, a devotion than a duration. It is not merely an escape from hell nor an entrance into heaven. Jesus did not come so much to take us to heaven as to bring heaven to us. He did not come simply to keep us out of hell but to keep hell out of us. We need not be concerned that we are surrounded by sin so long as we are surrounded by him. “We know that no child of God is a sinner; it is the Son of God who keeps him safe, and the evil one cannot touch him.”

God did not give us his written word as a charm or amulet. It is not just by quoting a scriptural passage that we are able to resist the wiles of Satan. Indeed, some of the best informed are some of the weakest spiritually. In the final analysis it is possible that a vaunted knowledge of the scriptures may not be so much a declaration of faith in the word as pride in our own memory or achievement. Many a man basks in the adulation of those who rehearse how well he can quote the Bible while his heart is filled with wicked and vicious thoughts. One does not need to converse at length with such a person to realize that with him religion is a question of what one knows rather than who one knows. Facing death the apostle could say, “That is the reason for my present plight; but I am not ashamed of it, because I know who it is in whom I have trusted” (2 Tim. 1:12).

The lack of assurance which characterizes the victim of a legalistic system for attempted justification is always apparent and tragic. Such a person may be high in the ranks of religious leaders while inwardly beset by doubts as to his own spiritual standing. A few months ago I asked the president of a Christian college if he was saved. All he could say under questioning was, “I hope I am.” He declared that he could not know for sure until he died. He was a man who had made a reputation for opening up areas to the preaching of the gospel and collected thousands of dollars to help save the lost and yet did not know whether he was saved himself.

This is typical of all those who regard the new covenant as a law book and condition their hope upon a knowledge of scripture rather than upon a personal relationship with the Savior. If I know that I am one flesh with my wife why should I not know that I am one spirit with my Lord? No law can give life and no legalistic concept can ever bring real assurance. One does not know where he stands with God under such a program. How does he know if he has learned every verse he is capable of memorizing? How does he know that he has done everything up to the present minute that he could have done? All he can do is to hope that he will be conscious in the last few minutes before death so he can “comply with the law of pardon.” The apostles stood in jeopardy every hour from forces without; these stand in jeopardy every hour from fears within. They have to live to settle the question of sin because they do not believe that He settled it by His death.

It is such a cold, calculating system offered to a distraught and disturbed world which makes the "Christian" more frustrated and frightened than those around him. The wings of faith have been clipped and the soaring pinions shorn of power. No longer do "we mount up like eagles." We fill our days like domestic fowls pecking in the mud of our own fenced in enclosures, fleeing in fright at every fleeting shadow flitting across our pathway. The spirit of adventure which comes from encounter with Christ has disappeared. The party hero is one who can get half as many people back in a building on Sunday night as were present Sunday morning. This is our test of greatness! This is our criterion of nobility!

We must resort to gimmicks and gewgaws to hold the members "in line." Sunday school pins become our decorations for service above and beyond the call of duty. We must award prizes to get the children of God to read the Bible. Rivalry between classes must be used to stimulate the study of the sacred scriptures. We are now forced to apply "the hard sell." The gospel must be dressed up in the trappings of the hucksters and adorned with the livery of pressure groups. All of this is but the rattling of dry bones from which the spirit has departed. It is the rustling of the tattered remnant of a window shade in a house from which the living tenants have removed. "You study the scriptures diligently, supposing that in having them you have eternal life, yet, although their testimony points to me, you refuse to come to me for that life." This stern indictment of the Pharisees of yesteryear comes with equal force to the Pharisees of our own day. Pharisees come and go but Pharisaism goes on. We are victims of that misconception which causes us to mistake the means for the end, to worship the testament instead of the testator, to substitute menial service for the sacrifice of love. We build our hope on knowledge when it is love that builds; we seek to be acknowledged because of what we know when it is love that brings divine recognition. “Of course we all have knowledge, as you say. This knowledge breeds conceit; it is love that builds. If anyone fancies that he knows, he knows nothing yet, in the true sense of knowing. But if a man loves, he is acknowledged by God” (1 Cor. 8:2, 3).

We will not need to bribe men to study the words of the Spirit when they are conscious that “God’s love has flooded our inmost heart through the Holy Spirit he has given us” (Romans 5:5). But the attempt to secure spirituality by filling an empty heart with random scriptural quotations, rattling around amidst the impulses to do evil, is foredoomed to failure. Let men come to know Jesus in a rich and full experience of his blessed Person in their lives and no amount of money on earth could tempt them not to learn of his will. We need to bring Christ to men and men to Christ.

The great adventure is not the mastery of a chapter in the Bible but the beginning of a new chapter in the history of your existence by a mastery of self through allowing Jesus to enter the wide open portals of your very being. He did not come to bring a new religion to the world, he came that we might have life and that we might have it more abundantly. He was not another religious leader, he is the Way, the Truth, the Life. He does not point us to a systematic theology as the ground of our hope. He is our Theology. Our “Theos-Logos” is a person. “And the Logos was made flesh and dwelt among us, and we have seen his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.”

“We know that the Son of God has come and given us understanding to know him who is real; indeed we are in him who is real, since we are in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, this is eternal life” (1 John 5:20). The “understanding to know him”— this is what we so sadly need in these days. What power would be unleashed in our lives, what vitality would be brought to bear upon a decadent world, what showers of blessing would fall upon the parched desert of human strivings. Do you have what it takes to rise above the narrow bigotry of partisan religious politics, to renounce the misplaced loyalty to unwritten creeds, and come “to know him who is real”? What an experience awaits you when you leave the treadmill of triviality and enter the realm of reality!

War in Heaven

Mission Messenger (December 1962)

Volume 24

[Abstract]

There are two kinds of angels— the holy angels (Matt. 25:31), and the angels of the devil (Matt. 25:41). It was for these last that eternal fire was prepared. Angels are created beings. They came into existence by the power of God (Col. 1:16). He did not make some of them good and others wicked. He made them all good and some of them sinned (2 Peter 2:4). Their sin consisted in a revolt against God's authority. They were not willing to stay where he placed them so he willed a place where they have to stay. "Some of them were not content to keep the dominion given to them but abandoned their proper home; and God has reserved them for judgment on the great Day, bound beneath the darkness in everlasting chains" (Jude 6).

The writer of Revelation (12:7-9) describes an unearthly conflict which took place in heaven. I shall not speculate as to when this occurred nor gratify your curiosity about my exposition by spinning an opinion as to the degree of literality involved. I have no inclination to engage in a theoretical wrangle about things of which I prefer to confess that I know all too little. Instead I shall merely quote what the recorder writes. "Then war broke out in heaven. Michael and his angels waged war upon the dragon. The dragon and his angels fought, but they had not the strength to win, and no foothold was left for them in heaven. So the great dragon was thrown down, that serpent of old that led the world astray, whose name is Satan, or the Devil — thrown down to the earth and his angels with him.”

I am sure the holy angels were associated with the Prince of peace and must have been pacifists. They were not conscientious objectors or non-combatants. War is an evil, whether it occurs in heaven or on earth. It is not necessarily a sin, but it is the result of sin. What evil is not? War is one of the resultant consequences accruing from a refusal to bring all other wills into subjection to the divine will. All battles first exist as a clash of wills and terminate in a clash of arms, if surrender is not made first. Hell is the final abode of the untamed will. That is one thing which makes it hell.

I doubt that it was ever the intention of heaven to crush the human will. When man loses his power to will he can no longer exercise the right of choice. He becomes a mere automaton or a robot directed wholly by external force. Instead of depriving man of this principle of creativity, God seeks only to direct it. This necessitates the presentation of motives sufficiently strong to engage his undistracted attention and to induce him to act voluntarily and deliberately. The new covenant revelation is adapted to the fulfillment of God’s purpose in this respect. It is designated to free man from the slavery of sin, to relieve his conscience of a sense of guilt, and to offer him a field of service commensurate with his relationship to the Creator.

It is unfortunate that there are always those who will exploit their fellows in order to gratify pride and gain prestige. We should not be surprised at this. It is exactly what took place in heaven when the angels were led to follow one who had the ambition to replace God as ruler of the universe. We are not informed as to the political promises made to these celestial beings but they were appealing enough to cause them to engage in insurrection. The battle culminated as it always must. The revolutionaries were flung over the battlements because “there was no foothold left for them in heaven.”

Every appeal to sectarian pride and arrogance in an attempt to get man to be “religious” originates with Satan and is designed to defeat the purpose of God. The Arch-foe has invaded the sacred precincts and infiltrated the camp of the saints. He is directing his assault from inside the breastworks. The lure of social recognition, the temptation to be regarded as belonging to the “right set,” the tug of vanity and pretentiousness— all of these are subtle weapons to destroy the real self-crucifixion and lowliness which are a part of true sainthood.

What are the appeals of “our church”? Are we proud to exhibit a beautiful structure designed by an architect of fame? Do we talk about “our location” on the right side of the tracks, in an area of such economic status that it will be free from an invasion of Negroes and lower income groups? Do we mention casually that all of the elders are presidents or vice-presidents of large corporations? Do we engage in “name-dropping” by referring to politicians, ballplayers, movie actors, and others in the public eye, who are affiliated with us? Do we regard with condescension and disdain those other congregations where brethren meet in less pretentious surroundings and tell of “how much more we have to offer” the person who really wants to be somebody?

All of these things speak of the unconquered will. They betoken our intention of trying to storm the portals of heaven by our own worth. It is unthinkable that we will not make it in the next world because we have certainly made it in this world. We do not know exactly what heaven will be like but it will not be much if we are not there to help manage it and show the other folks around and point out glories they would probably miss—not having been accustomed to such things. Undoubtedly the place will be immense because it will contain a lot of the people whom we encouraged by sending them a fruit basket every Christmas. It will be nice to meet them so they will have an opportunity to thank us personally for the generosity, seeing that both cars were in use at the time of the distribution of the commodities, so we had to send them by the “church janitor.”

In the last great Day a lot of pretty important folks are going to accuse God of being unfair. They will be past the place where they are afraid to blaspheme and it will not make any difference anyhow. But the idea of allowing a group of dirty, half-starved, ignorant people, to swarm in through the gates of pearl, while they are turned away after all they have done for God— it just simply cannot be. “Here, you can’t do this to me! Who do these angels think they are? Stand aside, please, and let me up to the front. There’s been a mistake here somewhere. I’ve got my credentials with me. Here they are. I’ve kept a complete list of the wonderful works done in His name. There wasn’t anyone in our church who kicked in more on charity drives. I’ve got my receipts to prove it. What do you mean, these don’t count?”

The religion of our Lord is not one of a crushed will but it is one of a broken heart. It is the religion of “the cross purpose” in life which keeps us from being at cross purposes with God and with each other. It is not just the religion of Calvary’s cross but the religion of the daily cross. It is a religion of free men who are slaves— men who are at liberty to serve. “Now if your experience of Christ’s encouragement and love means anything to you, if you have known something of the fellowship of his Spirit, and all that it means in kindness and sympathy, do make my best hopes for you come true! Live together in harmony, live together in love, as though you had only one mind and spirit between you. Never act from motives of rivalry or personal vanity, but in humility think more of each other than you do of yourselves. None of you should think only of his own affairs, but should learn to see things from other people’s point of view.”

The very next verse asserts, “Let Christ Jesus be your example of what your attitude should be. For he, who had always been God by nature, did not cling to his prerogatives as God’s equal, but stripped himself of all privilege by consenting to be a slave by nature and being born as mortal man.” Motivated by a love that was universal Jesus divested himself of all his prerogatives and stripped himself of all privilege. Hell will be full of people who insist on getting their rights, and what a hell it will be with everyone engaging in such insistence. The interesting thing is they will all have received their rights— that is why hell was created.

The degree of submission shown in the contrast between the two expressions, “God by nature” and “slave by nature,” sets for us an ideal, always unattainable in this fleshly existence, but always worth the striving. Christ can only be an example of what our attitude should be. Only one who was God by nature can truly become a slave by nature, for only God can appreciate in its fullest what constitutes the nature of a slave.

Jesus said, “I do not live to please myself but to do the will of the Father who sent me.” One of our greatest temptations in this day is to believe that we do the will of God when we live to please self. We have figured out how it is possible to do both so that we are no longer faced with a choice or an alternative. We have merged our own pleasure and God’s will until we can no longer distinguish one from the other. Black fades into white and white into black and our lives become a gray expanse. By such a merger we have become relieved of the need of submerging ourselves in the divine will. God’s will becomes our will because we project our will as His will. Thus Satan has held out to us the age-old lure that we can become as gods through knowledge! But in the final day there will be but two classes of people— those who have said to God “Thy will be done,” and those to whom God says, “Thy will be done.” Heaven will be full of the first and hell will be full of the second.

MISSION MESSENGER ESSAYS (1963)

Volume 25

The Unity of the Spirit

Index to Volumes

- The Times of the Stork
- War Bulletins
- Ernest Beam and Unity
- On Being Naive
- Fear and Suspicion
- What Is Heresy? (1963)
- My Defense
- Wishful Thinking
- Reply to brother Thomas
- Confusion of Tongues
- The Making of History
- The Scattered Flock
- Walking Together
- The Concerned Ones
- Receive Him Not Into Your House
- Doctrine and Doctrines
- The Unequal Yoke (1963)
- Repairing Lines
- The Spirit and Unity
- The Church Speaks of Discovering and Unleashing Hidden Powers
- Terms of Communion
- A Realistic Attitude

- Facing a Dilemma
- Reply to Brother Lemmons
- Reviving Hope
- Saying Nice Things
- Reply to brother Lemmons
- Reply to the Foregoing
- The Optimistic View
- The Manifested Life
- Answer to objections (No. 1)
- Reply to the Foregoing
- Answer to objections (No. 2)
- Reply to the Foregoing
- Answer to objections (No. 3)
- Reply to the Foregoing
- Reply to brother Lemmons
- Reply to the Foregoing

The Times of the Stork

Mission Messenger (January 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

The mild afternoon sunshine of early autumn warmed the red tiles of the housetop. This was the time of day he especially liked. Standing in perfect balance on one leg, he could see canals intersecting the town in every direction. Below him in the open square was the Kaas Market, now almost deserted after the early morning flurry when the round cheeses were sold. This was home. He and his mate had been coming for several years to occupy the nest on the false chimney erected for the sole purpose of attracting them. Each spring there was a celebration in the house below when they arrived. It was good fortune to have a family of storks on the roof.

If he had been able to read history he would have thrilled at the noble way in which his ancestors were regarded. He would have learned that the Hebrews called him khasidah, the pious bird, from a root in their language which meant “to desire or love strongly.” And he would have chuckled to himself at the mistake of Aristotle and Pliny, both of whom wrote that the young storks repay the care of their parents by supporting them when they grow old. He would have mused that the Greek and Roman philosophers had not met any of his hungry broods, but then he was not dependent upon their charity. He could still spear frogs with the best of them when they congregated at the mud flats or waded in the reeds. He would have rejoiced that the Latins, like the Hebrews, called him “the pious bird,” avis pia, and that his ancestors in Thessaly were so famed for their skill in destroying serpents, it was made a capital crime to kill a stork. The penalty was the same as for killing a man.

But he knew nothing of history and as he stood with his beak resting upon the feathers of his breast, he was forced to live only in the present, despite his philosophic mien. Yet it was not altogether in the present, because, for several days he had felt the mysterious Call. He could not describe it nor even explain it. There was a subtle urge within, an indefinable tug at his whole being. It had been this way every autumn and it was always irresistible. It was not that he wanted to depart. He loved this pleasant spot and its comforts. He sensed the hardships and the dangers that lay ahead. He realized the need for wariness to escape the African fowlers. He knew from experience that every fiber of his great body would be exhausted by the long journey through the heavens.

But there was the Call. It was like a great power outside and beyond him drawing him onward. At the same time it was like a deep inner compulsion driving him forward. Was it from without or within? Perhaps it was both. He did not know its origin or source; he only knew that he must respond. He was helpless to resist. The Call was greater than himself although it appeared to be simply a part of him from the time he was a fledgling. He rippled and flexed his strong wing muscles. He preened and oiled his feathers. Tomorrow morning he would not return to this friendly roof. On strong wings he would lift himself toward the clouds. Riding on a thermal current he would rise upward until he was a speck in the heavens, his beak pointing toward the Dark Continent. He had received the Call. He must answer it. The mystic mandate of migration came from a higher authority than himself!

* * * *

“Even the stork in the heavens knows her times; and the turtledove, swallow, and crane keep the time of their coming; but my people know not the ordinance of the Lord” (Jeremiah 8:7).

Are you a dichotomist or a trichotomist with reference to the nature of man? Perhaps you do not know. Let me explain. A dichotomist is one who believes that man is a twofold being; a trichotomist believes he is a threefold being. I am a trichotomist, not alone because it is my conviction that this is what the Bible teaches, but because it explains so many things which otherwise would remain mysteries. One of those things is the difference between man and the lower animals. The use of the word “lower” indicates that man is an animal, but a distinctive animal in that he is on a higher plane. This I believe. I will refer to it later in my article.

“May God himself, the God of peace, make you holy in every part, and keep you sound in spirit, soul, and body, without fault when the Lord Jesus Christ comes” (1 Thess. 5:23). Spirit, soul, and body— what is the difference in these and how are they related to each other? That there is a distinction between soul and spirit is evident from Hebrews 4:12, “For the word of God is living and powerful, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow.” Although the two can be separated, the distinction is so keen as to require the revelation of God to make it. It is not our wish or intention to become unduly technical but if the poet is correct in stating that “the proper study of mankind is man,” we can invest a little time very profitably in this investigation.

To grasp the meaning of such expressions as “soul” and “spirit” we must learn what sense the original terms conveyed when used by the Holy Spirit. This is the equivalent of saying that we must ascertain the meaning attached to those originals in the common speech of the people to whom they were first spoken through the instrumentality of the Spirit. Unfortunately, we live in a day of shallow thinking. The masses of men are both intellectually lazy and indifferent. It is our constant hope, however, to be able to arouse and stimulate a deeper concern and we believe this can best be done through the leavening influence of the consecrated readers of this journal. It is not for our own selfish interest that we pursue this line of investigation but in sharing with you we will enable you to share with others.

Our task is heightened in our age because of its complexities. In a primitive state of society the wants of a people are few and a very limited vocabulary will suffice for communication. The situation is greatly altered when men, through research and discovery, unveil those things which were previously mysteries and outside their realm of knowledge. Language grows in proportion to the genius of a people. In an attempt to simplify for the masses of the uninitiated, familiar terms must be given varied applications and come to be used interchangeably. While this may tend to clarify for an existing generation it may confuse a succeeding one when these amendments are embalmed in written documents. The problem is even more acute when one deals with intangibles.

Man, as we commonly state it, is both material and immaterial. Since we are physical beings that which is physical makes its greatest impact upon our thought. We speak of man as having a spirit. God is a Spirit, so the divine mind regards man as having a body. So the apostle writes, "I know a man in Christ who fourteen years ago was caught up to the third heaven—whether in the body or out of the body I do not know, God knows" (2 Cor. 12:2). He regards the body as an earthly tent in which the tenant may be at home or from which he may be absent (2 Cor. 5:1-9). Death is therefore regarded as a journey in which a man departs from the flesh to go elsewhere and be with those who are remote (Phil. 1:23, 24).

The Greek word for body is soma, that for flesh is sarx. Although these are sometimes used interchangeably in that liberty of language which is permissible, the first refers to the organization or structure, the second to the material which composes it. Physically, man is a composite of sixteen elements—solids, liquids, and gases— and these are insensitive. Matter has no consciousness. The same elements found in the human frame are found in a grain of wheat and in virtually the same proportion. In his elemental material constituency man does not differ from the lower animals.

The Greek word for soul is psyche and the corresponding Hebrew term is nephesh. Perhaps the best definition of the Hebrew word is that given by Prof. Girdlestone in his Synonyms of the Old Testament. He says that nephesh “has various shades of rendering and meaning, which must be gathered as far as possible under one or two heads. The soul is, properly speaking, the animating principle of the body, and is the common property of man and beast.” It is correct to say that the beasts have souls. It is not correct to say that a beast has a spirit. In this regard man differs from the rest of the animal kingdom.

It is obvious that there are certain characteristics beyond the merely material which men and animals hold in common. These must be properties of the soul and not of the spirit. Among them we mention sensation, emotion, desire, appetite, passion and instinct. These may be regulated in the human by his rational powers but they exist separate and apart from such powers. So Girdlestone further says of the soul, “It is something more than the bare animating principle of the body; at least, if it is regarded in this light, a large view must be taken of that mysterious organization which we call the body, and it must include the bodily appetites and desires. Thus the soul, according to the old Testament, is the personal center of desire, inclination, and appetite, and its normal condition is to be operating in or through means of a physical organization, whether human or otherwise.”

The Greek psyche had two connotations. The first was related to the breath which made life possible for the animate creation. In this sense it is defined by the lexicographers as “the vital force which animates the body and shows itself in breathing.” That animals and men have this in common will be seen by a comparison of Acts 20:10 and Revelation 8:9 where the word is found and translated “life” in both instances. From this the word acquired an extended meaning and came to refer to the soul, which is defined as “the seat of the feelings, desires, affections and aversions.”

That which exalts man above all of the rest of creation is the spirit. The Hebrew term for this is ruach. Its Greek equivalent is pneuma. It is the spirit, not the soul, which makes it possible for man to attune his heart unto God and to commune with him. Accordingly, the Holy Spirit of God acts upon and in conjunction with the spirit of man. “The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God” (Rom. 8:16). God is never referred to as a soul but it is distinctly said that he is a Spirit (John 4:24). The soul is directly related to the physical being; the spirit may exist outside of such a body.

It is regrettable that a great deal of error arises because men are not acquainted with the laws of language. Words are like persons in that they possess both “body” and “soul.” The body of language consists of those symbols, either written or spoken, by which communication between rational beings is made possible. The soul of language consists of the ideas and concepts formed within the intellect. Words have personality and versatility and can project themselves as beings do. It is no accident that Jesus was called “the Word of God.” It would be a grave mistake to regard him solely as “the carpenter of Nazareth.”

There are those who make such a mistake with the word “spirit.” Because it originally signified “wind” they assume that it must always be so limited and confined. They ignore the fact that among ancient peoples the wind itself became a symbol and any term used for it must be extensive and applicable to those qualities which are symbolized. That this is true with reference to ruach is evidenced by Dr. Girdlestone:

The word Ruach, like its Greek equivalents, pneuma and anemos, the Latin spiritus, the English ghost, and similar words in other languages, originally signifies wind or breath. . . . It is clear that the wind is regarded in Scripture as a fitting emblem of the mighty penetrating power of the Invisible God; and that the breath is supposed to symbolize, not only the deep feelings which are generated within man, such as sorrow and anger, but also kindred feelings in the Divine nature.

God is not set forth in Scripture as a soul— i.e., the center of physical appetite and the animating principle of a body, but as a spirit, i.e., an unseen living being, capable of deep emotions. It is revealed that God, and He alone, has the faculty of communicating His spirit or life to His creatures, who are thus enabled to feel, think, speak, and act in accordance with the Divine will.

A consideration of these pertinent facts would enable those who are mistakenly called “soul-sleepers” to avoid the erroneous idea that the word “spirit” always connotes only breath or wind, and thus offset their secondary conclusion that there is no consciousness after death. That there is no feeling or memory upon the part of the body (soma) in the grave is easily admissible, but there is more to man than the material. What has here been said of the Hebrew ruach is also applicable to the Greek pneuma. In view of this, the lexicographers point out that pneuma in 1 Thessalonians 5:23 refers to “the rational part of man, the power of perceiving and grasping divine and eternal things and upon which the Spirit of God exerts its influence.”

We concur with the expression of Martin Luther that the spirit is “the highest and noblest part of man, which qualifies him to lay hold of incomprehensible, invisible, eternal things, in short, it is the house where God’s word and faith are at home.”

Our thesis in this article is that man who denies God is actually worse off than the lower animals. Because he possesses a rational faculty he can ascend higher; because he is capable of doing this he can fall farther. We use even this expression accommodatively, for animals cannot be said to fall at all seeing that they possess no moral or ethical consciousness. But man is responsible because he is rational; he is accountable because he can associate truths and their consequences. Yet the lower animals, guided by instinct, respond to all of the guidance of the creator who made them, while man resists and refuses the tug of God on his heart. He employs the very mind which makes him a little lower than God to revolt against God, even though in so doing he admits the need of a God by making one of himself. These observations will prepare our minds for a summarization of truths.

1. In view of the fact that the soul (psyche) is the animating principle of the bodily organism which manifests itself in the expansion and contraction of the lungs and the resultant functions of the other organs, animals possess a soul in common with man. It follows, then, that all of those faculties and characteristics which belong to man as a purely animate being are related to the soul, while those faculties and characteristics which are peculiarly his as a human animal are related to the spirit, and these cannot be possessed by irrational animals.

2. Instinct is a possession common to both man and beast and is, therefore, related to the soul and not to the spirit. Instinct produces a certain knowledge designed for preservation of the species. In man it can be regulated by reason but because this is superior to instinct it may distort and subliminate it and actually employ such excess as to be destructive. "These fellows, however, are ready to mock at anything that is beyond their immediate knowledge, while in the things that they know by instinct like unreasoning beasts they have become utterly depraved" (Jude 10).

3. Instinct, unattended by rational faculties, is for the preservation of the physical existence only. Accordingly, when the soul becomes extinct at death and the tissue disintegrates there is no promise of revival or resurrection. Brute beasts are “born in the course of nature to be caught and killed” (2 Pet. 2:12). Rational beings, possessed of a spirit, are not so constructed. It is true that because man is an animal in relation to the natural realm, his body disintegrates and the soul is extinct at death, but spirit is indestructible. For this reason there will be a resurrection of all men, the just and the unjust. The term “resurrection” always applies to the body, never to the spirit.

4. In view of the fact that the body we now have is adapted to life in the natural realm and not to life in a spiritual realm, the resurrected body will not be like the present body. “Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God” (1 Cor. 15:50). “So it is with the resurrection of the dead. What is sown in the earth as a perishable thing is raised imperishable . . . sown as an animal body, it is raised as a spiritual body.” Strictly speaking we will not possess a soul, as distinct from the spirit, in the resurrected state.

5. The attributes of the soul will not be preserved in the resurrection body. Since it will be both imperishable and immortal the instinct of self-preservation could not exist seeing that its very presence implies the possibility of dissolution or destruction. In the resurrection state, desire, appetite and passion will no longer obtain. As an example, the sex instinct, common to man and beast and directly related to the preservation of the species, will be no part of the resurrected state. This may serve to explain the words of Jesus to the Sadducees, “In the resurrection there is no such thing as marrying or being given in marriage— men live like the angels in heaven” (Matt. 22:20). The sex instinct belongs only to the animal creation; marriage is the divinely ordained state in which rational animals are authorized to indulge it.

6. By the same token, those characteristics and attributes which belong to the spirit will not be abrogated in the immortal body. Will, reason and affection belong to us not because we are related to the animal creation but because we are related to the creator. Certainly they will be perfected in a manner in which they can never be while we are in the flesh. In this life we are a composite of flesh, soul, and spirit, and we are constantly affected by them all. Reason can never be wholly free from emotion, nor affection devoid of all prejudice. Ours is ever a life of struggle against the enemy of ourselves and we are destined to be free only when we have met and wrestled with the keeper of the last disputed barricade.

We recognize that the casual reader will jump to the conclusion that our explanation herein given contradicts the implication of the passage from the King James Version which we cited to prove that man is a trichotomy. This version reads, "I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." This might seem to indicate that the psyche (soul) would be preserved in the resurrection when our Lord comes. We do not think this is the case and some of the later versions appear to clarify it. "May God himself, the God of peace, make you holy in every part, and keep you sound in spirit, soul, and body, without fault when our Lord Jesus Christ comes." This rendering shows that we shall be accountable when our Lord comes for the entire personality. We are obligated to be "holy in every part" and this means cultivation of soundness in body, soul, and spirit. This holiness and soundness proceeds from God. He not only specifies our goals but provides the power to attain unto them.

The soul is the responsive mechanism by which migratory birds answer the call of instinct, which is actually the call of the creator through nature. Without benefit of reason they have no power to refuse the call. For this cause it is often said that they are driven by blind impulse. Perhaps the word "blind" is misleading and the word "irresistible" would be a better term.

Only those who possess reason can become unreasonable. It is also true that only rational beings can feel a sense of remorse for failure to respond. One gap between the lower animals and man which cannot be bridged is that of conscience. Evolution has no way to account for its inception or development. Perhaps George Washington was right when he wrote in his childhood copybook that it was “a little spark of celestial fire.”

The spirit is the responsive mechanism by which intelligent creatures answer the call of God and his demands upon their lives. For this reason the appeal of God to mankind is a rational and not an emotional one. “Come now, let us reason together,” is the summons of Deity to mankind. This does not mean that there is not an emotional element involved. So long as man is in the flesh he is a total entity, threefold in nature. That which affects him in one area affects him to an extent in all. But the Spirit of God issues his appeal to the spirit of man, and when the latter becomes impervious to the call because of hardness of heart, God says, “My Spirit shall not always strive with man.”

An appeal which reaches the emotions through the rational faculties is right and proper because it is worthy of the dignity of man. Such an overture enters the being through the gate of intellect and commands the entire being from the throne room of the mind. The reverse is not true for the attempt to reach the intellect purely through the emotions is to “climb up some other way.” It serves only to cloud the reason and warp its function. Such an appeal must always be superficial and will eventuate in disillusionment. Because of this, feelings and sensations are not proper criteria of our standing with God. They belong to the animal rather than to the spiritual level of our existence. We would not want to be without them, for we would be cold indeed, yet we must control them and not allow them to control us. A fire in the house is one thing; a house in the fire is a wholly different thing.

Much of what parades under the banner of “Christianity” in these days is an overt appeal to emotionalism. Men tend to confuse the arousing of “animal spirits” with the work of the Holy Spirit. Paroxysms of grief and sobbing accompanied by hysterical screaming and shouting are regarded as evidence that the power of God is at work. Generally such demonstrations are in inverse proportion to the ratio of intellectual attainment. The fact that such manifestations appeal primarily to the unlearned, ignorant, or emotionally disturbed, is excused on the basis that “not many wise men after the flesh are called.” Such an interpretation of this passage confirms the ignorance of the meaning of this scripture by those who offer it.

We live in an age of intellectual growth and there is a danger that those who have developed their mental capacities in other fields will confuse the religion of Jesus Christ with the unwholesome and unscrupulous abuses of it in the emotional realm, and will turn away from it in disgust. They may regard it as a resort for the credulous and a form of escapism for the psychologically unstable. Actually, such a reaction on their part is unscientific and indicative of a careless attitude. It is much like the decision of a man never to accept another five dollar bill because he was once handed a counterfeit. The religion revealed in the new covenant scriptures should challenge the highest and noblest attributes of mankind. No personality which rejects it can be complete and whole.

God created light and then created the eye to respond to it. These are complementary to each other and for that reason one is useless without the other. It is only as the eye responds to the light that it fulfills its divinely ordained function. What light is to the physical realm the truth of the Spirit is to the spiritual domain. The primary purpose of the human spirit is to respond to the light of truth through the eye of the intellect. To do this brings the spirit of man and the Holy Spirit into conjunction with each other and restores the harmonious relationship which should exist between an intelligent creator and his intelligent creation. Failure to respond leaves the inner man in darkness and makes impossible the perfection of the personality. One who never heeds the call of the Spirit is like one who remains blind from birth.

Man, because of his nature, acts as a result of stimulation or motivation. The Holy Spirit presents those motivations which are calculated to cause the human spirit to react in such fashion as to prepare for achievement of individual destiny. The human spirit can be happy only when deep yearnings are satisfied and the Christian revelation is perfectly adapted for the attainment of such happiness or satisfaction. We think that most psychologists will agree that, regardless of how many other things are essential, there are three basic needs of the personality. These are: (1) A sense of real forgiveness in which the remorse for the past is overcome and no guilt consciousness lingers; (2) A true ideal to challenge one to rise above self in the present and to lose that self in a cause which transcends the individual; (3) A hope for the future which provides a proper incentive in the belief of the perpetuity of the personality beyond the limitations of time and space, that is, a conviction that the grave is not final.

The human being, possessed of rational powers, is able to live in three dimensions of time— past, present and future. Memory, determination, perception and imagination permit projection into the age to come as well as that which is past. Happiness demands a proper adjustment as to all of these, and the three cardinal attributes of the Way— faith, hope and love— make such adjustment attainable. Faith has to do with the past and the belief of testimony concerning historical fact; hope reaches into the future which need have no horizon except God; love is the means by which one identifies himself with the needs of others and thus by identification, may live on a universal rather than a merely personal plane.

The infinite mind has provided assurance that our sins have been blotted out or erased by the cleansing power of the blood of Jesus Christ and they will be remembered against us no more. The sinless example of his life, even when tempted in all points as we are, gives us an ideal toward which we may constantly aspire, knowing that it is not in the arriving but in the striving that the blessing is conferred. The promise of a life beyond narrow confines and limitations, not only of the grave but of the temporal existence itself, offers such an incentive as to stagger our very imaginations. Just as the Holy Spirit is free so the human spirit tugs and struggles for liberty. But freedom from remorse for the past and fear of retribution in the future can only be won by recapturing the present in the fullest sense. This necessitates a heart filled with the love that casts out fear. Such love is a fruit of the Spirit. It is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which is given unto us.

The secret of response to the call of God is opening the door to the heart so the Holy Spirit may enter. Regardless of what else one may have, if he does not possess the indwelling Spirit he is away from God. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." The door is faith, not faith in a system or an organization, but faith in a person as expressed in one proposition— that he is the Son of God. If faith is the door, baptism is the knob by which that door is opened. There is ever the danger that men may confuse the door and the knob and consider the latter as the means of access rather than the act by which that means is made effectual. It is through faith we "enter the sphere of God's grace" and through faith the Holy Spirit enters the heart, but that door is opened by an act in which we demonstrate a complete and unconditional surrender, so total in its nature it can only be compared with death by crucifixion.

Once we realize that the Holy Spirit is shut out of our lives until we open the door, and once we realize that we open the door when we are baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus, we will cease to rebel against a truth so obvious. It is still true that, "Through faith you are all sons of God in union with Christ Jesus. Baptized into union with him, you have all put on Christ as a garment” (Gal. 3:26, 27). If we may be allowed to change the metaphor to conform to this statement we must conclude that there is a difference between having a garment available, and the act of putting it on. The whole nature of man, guided both by instinct and reason, cries out for union with God. What a terrible tragedy that he who is the apex of God’s creation is less responsive to the Call than the lower animals over whom he exercises lordship by divine fiat.

War Bulletins

Mission Messenger (January 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

“Local autonomy” is a term heard frequently among the heirs of the restoration movement. It simply means that the government of the saints is congregational in nature. Each congregation is a separate entity. It is not subject to any human authority outside of itself! No board, synod or district presbytery can pass laws or resolutions which are binding on its membership. Its members are not subject to discipline administered by those outside of its own ranks. The congregation selects men from its members to serve as bishops and through these men conducts its own affairs, answerable to each other and to God.

In theory, this looks excellent. The average preacher in “The Church of Christ” can present a strong case for it to those in other bodies who have a different system. That is why so many of these are enticed into taking their stand with us, only to suffer grievous disillusionment at our actual practice. Of course there are a great many areas in which there are wide divergencies between our doctrine and actual performance. Most of the brethren would not make very high marks in a class on consistency. However, in no other area is there such flagrant disregard for what we affirm as there is in the doctrine of “local autonomy.” Many who acclaim it from the platform on Sunday spend the other six days of the week in utter disdain of what they boldly announced to be the scriptural procedure. It is chiefly an “export doctrine” rather than one for home consumption.

One need only read the “local church bulletins” to verify what I say. These are much more vocal than local. Frequently the editor, generally “the local minister,” seeks to discipline and direct the affairs of other congregations in the same locality, or even in sections remote from where he labors. Other congregations are designated, castigated and chastised. They are criticized because of their selection of men to conduct their various meetings. They are attacked with partisan zeal and labeled with such epithets as “heretics” and “apostates.” It is obvious in many instances that there are those who comb their exchange bulletins to find something to enlarge upon as a basis for carrying on a constant running skirmish with other brethren of a different school of thought.

Few of the bulletins actually wage peace among brethren. Many seem dedicated to the unenviable task of creating greater animosity, arousing rancor and perpetuating unholy feuds among the saints. Satan has infiltrated our ranks and used the mimeograph machine to make a mockery of our vaunted cry of local autonomy. Preachers seem to feel that they prove their fidelity to God by dissemination of propaganda calculated to destroy the harmony of congregations whose members will not “parrot the party line.” Nothing so incenses the average defender of orthodoxy as an eldership which serves notice that they will run their own affairs and answer to God for their conduct, rather than to a bureaucracy of “loyal preachers” in the city. Of all “sins” this is the gravest because if persisted in it will destroy the right to meddle in, muddle up, and trample down those who are not under the jurisdiction of the meddler.

Russia has its Iron Curtain. China has its Bamboo Curtain. “The Church of Christ” has its Paper Curtains. The last, like the first two, has as its purpose the isolation of those behind it. It has been erected not to secure freedom but to deny it. No thought from the other side must penetrate. No light must filter through which will reveal the darkened areas of tradition which now constitutes the unwritten creed of the party. It is a serious question whether many “church bulletins” serve any good purpose on earth by the attitude they reflect. They create strife, augment division and perpetuate ill-feeling. These things have no place in the lives of those who profess to be the saints of the Most High.

Certainly the medium of printing has a justifiable use. But when it is abused and misused, and is devoted to dogmatic, authoritarian attempts to impose upon other congregations a partisan program, its use should be given a careful scrutiny. By what power does an editor of a bulletin presume to tell those in another congregation what they must do or not do, to be regarded as “loyal”? On what ground does one proceed who proposes to tell the eldership and congregation in another place to whom they may listen, or not listen?

Actually, we are victims today of a clerical authority which differs only in degree with that of Rome. When something does not please the pope he issues a bull; when something does not please our brethren, they issue a bulletin! Some congregations, like the pope, suffer from a mistaken idea of infallibility. They always speak ex cathedra and must be the authorized interpreters for the whole world of mankind. Once they have decreed a dogma, “if any man come and bring not this doctrine, do not allow him in your house and neither give him any greeting, for he who greets him becomes a participant in his evil doings.” This doctrine is the party ruling on individual cups, Bible classes, colleges, television sets, nationwide television programs, orphan homes, fermented wine, charitable institutions— or instrumental music! Evil doings consist of taking the other side on these issues.

I wonder what would happen if every congregation of saints started to practice local autonomy and just minded their own business? What would be the result if, on a given Lord’s

Day, every eldership in the United States, announced that from now on they would read the Bible for themselves, without benefit of clergy, and be answerable only to God and to the congregation which chose them, for their conduct? Is “local autonomy” to be recognized only when brethren see everything as we do, and to be wilfully ignored when they cannot conscientiously do so? Will we continue to feel there is an “open season” for judging motives, intentions, and service to God, for all who do not conform in every respect to our own congregational activities?

We believe that sincere and consecrated bishops should start at once to govern their own congregations, and instruct the preaching brethren whom they support, that the congregation will henceforth confine its regulations to its own affairs! Nothing could encourage and foster the spread of fraternal feeling more quickly than this.

Ernest Beam and Unity

Mission Messenger (February 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

It is a common practice of many to relate any attempt at reformation with others which have preceded it. The motivation in doing so differs with the individuals who engage in it. In the case of our own plea for greater unity among the heirs of the restoration movement, the one name from the past most frequently heard is that of Ernest Beam. This brother began a paper called The Christian Forum in 1950, through which he publicized an appeal for the children of God to treat each other like brethren. Unfortunately, at the time I was still enslaved by the yoke of factionalism and could not even consider what he wrote objectively. In those days, any extension of charity toward those who differed with “the loyal church” of which I was a member, was assailed as a compromise.

Since that time, and with a greater degree of spiritual maturity, I can better evaluate the contributions made by this brother who is now deceased. I think we both held the same ideal and struggled toward the same goal. The differences, which are several in number, lie chiefly in the methods to be employed in helping our brethren throw off the shackles of the party spirit. Some of these differences seem to me to be quite basic to the eventual realization of our vision of a closer walk with each other under the rule of the Messiah.

It is probable that many of our readers have never seen an outline of Bro. Beam's objectives. In a recent speech at Hartford, Illinois, Grayson Ensign repeated his "Seventeen Propositions to Promote Unity," as they appeared on page 14 of Christian Standard, October 8, 1949. We reproduce them here so that all of us can again evaluate them in the light of God's revelation and the divine purpose in our lives for this generation.

1. All sincerely immersed into Christ, with manifest purpose to be governed of Him, are one body in Jesus Christ, though some are now also in denominational churches and others also in church of Christ sects.

2. All of those in next above are commanded of God to receive one another as Christ also received us to the glory of God.

3. The receiving of brethren in Christ is never an endorsement of weakness, immaturity, and error even as Christ's reception of us is not His endorsement of our weakness, immaturity and error.

4. Those who will not receive the brethren but do disfellowship them, or some of them, are, on that account, to be marked, avoided, and rejected, even as the man under the old law who did kill was himself to be put to death.

5. The Scriptures forbid any sincere brother to violate his own conscience in religious acts and devotions whether that conscience is properly taught or not; and the Scriptures forbid the rest of us to ignore that conscience. Nor is our own liberty to be judged of another's conscience.

6. It is not necessary for the brethren to be of the same mind upon meats, days, circumcision, the law, colleges, missionary organization, orphan homes, instrument, "pastor system," cups, war, premillennial views, tobacco, classes, uninspired literature, names, or other such, as conditions of salvation and of receiving one another. Those of Proposition 1 are one body notwithstanding these and like differences.

7. Division in the body of Christ is always made by the brother who will not fellowship his brother. (This does not mean there are not times that a brother must disown a brother; there are. But the brother who disfellowships always and everywhere makes the division— those that should never be, as well as those that must be).

8. The brother, though right about every item in Proposition 6 above, is not permitted to bind that right, as a condition of receiving, against his brother who does not yet perceive the right.

9. The receiving of all those sincerely in Christ, by Paul, did not stop him from successful labor to overcome the wrongs of those received, but did enhance the working of it. The receiving by all of us, of each of the rest of us, in Proposition 1 above, by the wonderful grace of our God, can and should work the same way.

10. No more grace is required in my heart to receive my brother, as set out above, than is required in Christ to receive me now and hereafter. (Yea, the comparison is an unworthy one, but is used to turn the mind toward working of grace from us as it has come to us).

11. The Lord Jesus, the Holy Spirit, and the apostles were not compromisers and betrayers of the gospel in receiving brethren with error of whom we read in the New Testament: we are the compromisers and betrayers of their gospel when we do not so receive one another.

12. The Holy Spirit as certainly commands not to own all those who come among us not of genuine faith in the whole mystery of Christ revealed in Scripture (2 John 7-11; 1 John 4:3, 3) or who are not of mind to consent to “wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine which is according to godliness” (1 Timothy 6:3), as he does command us to receive the brethren of genuine faith.

13. It is hurtfully erroneous to try to make God speak in the field of necessary judgment— the circumstantial of the gospel left to the judgment of the brethren and the expediency of which changes through the centuries with changing means and agencies of society— as it is not to hear God in the great realm of faith where He does speak.

14. In all matters of faith a thing must be lawful before it can ever be expedient; in all matters of necessary judgment a thing is not to be judged of right or wrong but whether it is a good and useful means to attain the given end.

15. The use of any and all humanly accepted means and methods must ever be kept within the realm of enabling what God has commanded and never used upon a par with, as an addition to, as a part of, or exalted above the thing commanded or those appointed by God. (The use of uninspired literature to enable the teaching of God’s Word is one thing. But to make use of it as upon par with, added to, a part of, or exalted above God’s Word, is a grievous error not to be tolerated. The same is true of all things whatsoever that have been left to the judgment and wisdom of men.)

16. To charge a brother with an addition to the Word who uses uninspired literature to enable the teaching of the inspired word; or to “the cup” who but uses individual cups to enable the communion of “the cup;” or to sing who but uses the instrument to enable singing, decency, and order; or to the one organization of the New Testament who but uses colleges, missionary organizations, orphan homes, old folks’ homes, organized classes, and journalistic organizations to enable orderly obedience to the commands of God— this is false accusation against brethren and divides those who are of the same faith.

17. The adoption of any test of fellowship not clearly demanded in Scripture is to adopt a condition of salvation— a new and added commandment— unto the perversion of the gospel.

On Being Naive

Mission Messenger (February 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

The opposition to our plea for recognition and implementation of the fellowship in which all the saints of God are involved, is gathering momentum. We are being assailed in papers of national circulation and attacked in local church bulletins. The pulpits in certain areas ring with warnings against the “sin” of treating the rest of the children of the Father as our brothers. None of this moves us. We anticipated and girded our hearts and minds in full expectation that the forces of orthodoxy would react as they always do. So long as we equate the faction with which we are allied as the “one holy, apostolic and catholic church of God” we will resist any attack upon our party as an attack upon the church of God.

I can sympathize with all of the brethren who are vociferous in their pronouncements. They are no more factional in their attitudes now than I was a few years ago. They employ the same tactics now that I employed then. They misapply the same scriptural quotations in the same traditional fashion. Somehow I feel that a lot of these brethren would like to breathe the same air of freedom I now enjoy. Since I realize that fellowship is not endorsement and I do not have to agree with a person to love him, I am free to love all of the brethren, even those who find it difficult to love each other. I can go speak, upon invitation, to any group of interested listeners in the whole realm of Christendom without clearing it in advance with any preacher or group. I no longer belong to any splinter, segment, fragment or fraction, but simply to my Lord Jesus Christ.

My appeal to the brethren all over the world is very simple. There is nothing complex about it. It is merely a plea that we recognize all of our brothers as brethren and treat them that way. Surely if a man is a son of my Father he has a right to talk to and call upon my Father. If he has a right to call upon God I have a right to call upon him to exercise what is his right. The thought that I should not call upon one of God's children to pray in a meeting which I am conducting is ridiculous and absurd. Just because a person disagrees with me about cups, classes, colleges, uninspired literature, the millennium, instrumental music, or orphan homes, gives me no right to abrogate his rights as a child of God.

I must be quite honest and frank with you. I do not recognize "The Church of Christ" as being the church of God in its fulness. God has children outside of the restoration movement. I have brethren who are not in either "The Church of Christ" or "The Christian Church." I will give them brotherly recognition also. I am joined in spirit with every other person on this earth who is joined to my Lord by the one Spirit. I simply disregard the walls which men have erected and see my brothers on both sides of these flimsy and artificial obstructions. It is not necessary that they be on my side; it is enough that they are in Christ Jesus.

Actually, all I am advocating is the application of the "golden rule" to brotherhood. I do not like for my brethren to cut me off or treat me with contempt so I shall not cut them off or treat them with contempt. I do not like for them to demand of me that to which I cannot subscribe in good conscience, so I shall recognize their own right of conscience. I do not like to go among them and be treated with coldness and disdain, so I shall treat all of them with warmth and courtesy. I do not have any half-brothers or step-brothers in the Lord. I will try to be fair, honorable and upright in my treatment of all the brethren— not merely those who agree with me or belong to the same factional background as myself.

I suspect that this appeal is so homespun and natural that a great many will overlook the potential for real good invested in it. We are so conditioned to big programs, big promotions, and big projects, all drummed up by big preachers, that we tend to disregard anything which comes in a plain wrapper. When I was in California I learned through “the grape-vine” that the administrators of a certain college regarded our plea as naive, to use their own language. Recently the president of the same school took space in the journal of largest circulation within the ranks of the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood to warn against naive approaches to Christian unity, now being circulated.

Because we believe that it is imperative that we agree with all of our brothers when possible, we want to plead guilty to this charge. A great many folks, not knowing what the word means, may conclude that there is something frightful about “a naive approach.” This is all the more likely when the accusation is leveled by a college president. It sounds to some ears as if it might be sinister, baleful or malign. On the contrary, the word “naive” comes to us through the French, from the Latin nativus, innate, native. It simply means, “Having unaffected simplicity, artless, unsophisticated.”

One definition of “artless,” and the one most appropriate in this case is, “Free from guile or craft; simple and sincere; ingenuous.” The word “unsophisticated” means, “simple, ingenuous, innocent, genuine.” I would not know how to present a sophisticated approach if I wanted to. Such an approach requires a certain kind of ecclesiastical jargon which makes it unintelligible to the average person like myself. I rather suspect that many of our problems are created by worldly-wise debate which makes brotherhood seem like a highly complicated affair that only preachers can understand. It is a pretty difficult thing to make it appear that you “love the brotherhood” at the same time you are defending the kind of partisan prejudice which will destroy it.

To be “naive” is to have a sort of “down-home” directness about things. I do not at all resent the fact that some of the more sophisticated brethren regard me as a “country cousin” and treat my plea for unity as they would an appeal for financial help from their poor relation. I’m just artless enough to confess our own errors as well as those of other folks, and this just isn’t done in polite circles, you know. If you reveal what is wrong with our “brothers in error” who use instrumental music you are being loyal to the Book; if you tell on those who do not use it you are ridiculing the Lord’s church. It is all right to be a spiritual Peeping Tom so long as you do not look in at our own windows!

I suspect that naïvete is sort of a synonym for “horse sense” and now that horses have been replaced by automobiles that kind of sense is about obsolete. I’m just naive enough to think we could still use of little of it. I know that in the old days when a man got drunk they could load him in his buggy and his horse took him home. You deposit one like that in an automobile and it will take him everywhere but home. He will tear up more landscape in three minutes than a repair crew can restore in three days.

It just seems like old-fashioned commonsense to recognize my brethren as brothers. We are all in the same family. All of us have the same Father. “Jerusalem which is from above is the mother of us all.” Some of my brothers believe Jesus is coming before the thousand years, some believe he is coming afterwards, and it will take others a thousand years to make up their minds what to believe. But they are all my brothers even if some of them seem to me to be a little warped in their thinking, even as I seem to them to be slightly off in some of my views. One thing they will not do to me and that is to enlist me in any of their parties, programs or performances where I'll have to hate the rest of them. I'm through with the factional spirit either inside the "Church of Christ" or out of it. If some of my brothers seem a little difficult to love sometimes, I'll treat them as one of my aunts down home did one of her difficult neighbors. "I'll love 'em to death, if it kills me!"

If the brethren who think we are naive will suggest a better approach by which I can love and cherish all of God's children and go among them for their good and mine, I will gladly adopt it and labor with them. Unity in Jesus is more important than my approach.

Fear and Suspicion

Mission Messenger (February 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

One of the more apparent fruits of the party spirit is the suspicion with which we regard our brethren in other factions and often within the one with which we are allied. We are quick to impugn motives and impute evil designs. We always imagine the worst and surmise the sinister. It is difficult to see anything creditable or meritorious in those who are not in our segment of the disciple brotherhood. There is something about partisanship which breeds doubt and begets detraction. Most of us are victims of that type of false pride which covers with a mantle of charity the delinquency of those within our group while we vigorously oppose the derelictions of those who are not.

A short time ago I received a letter from a brother who is beloved in the Lord, although he grew up in a different faction of the disciple brotherhood than that in which I was nourished. He expressed regret that he could not attend a series of forums I was conducting not too far removed from where he preaches. He would have come if other arrangements had not rendered it impossible. He wrote, "I take it, since I received my invitation from a Christian Church that you will be speaking at a Christian Church. I think the Christian Churches throughout the country are trying to use your influence among churches of Christ to woo the churches of Christ into the Christian Church fold. I would not be completely honest with you were I not to tell you that I am sorry to see you permit yourself and your influence to be so used.”

Because this frank expression may be quite typical of the reaction of many of my brethren in the several factions among us it affords an opportunity to make a declaration of my own views about the matter. I do this very humbly and with no intention of binding those views upon any other person on earth. The attitude expressed by my brother is not limited to those affiliated with the non-instrument subdivision of the brotherhood. Those “Christian Churches” which invite me to speak on fellowship and unity are also besieged by warnings of dire consequences which will result. By many of their adherents I am regarded as the advance guard of a fifth-column movement intended to infiltrate and capture them “lock, stock and barrel” and deliver them bound to the Jerusalem of the “Antis.” No one of our parties has an exclusive claim upon rank suspicion.

If the “Christian Churches” are plotting to use my influence in their wooing program they will suffer grave disappointment. In the first place, my influence is quite negligible and it is unlikely that I will make any great impact upon any specific group among us. I can make no justifiable claim to the kind of scholarship or ability requisite to those who would aspire to such leadership. I am not a Pied Piper and my brethren are not rats. There are so many different “Churches of Christ” that if someone set out to woo them it would be like a young man courting a different girl each night of the month. Each in turn would jilt him as it learned of his other amours.

Moreover, it is very basic to the approach I am making that each one remain where he is and share his newly-discovered truth with those whom he knows best and who do not have that truth as yet. I am not troubled by the “loyal church fallacy” which has plagued us with division in the past. In order to avoid creation of a new party among heirs of the restoration movement, let us face up realistically to the fact that this movement has been fractured and fragmented, and no splinter is the whole log. In the final analysis, all fellowship must be upon an individual basis and it will not be produced by someone like myself acting from without on the various factions but by the Holy Spirit acting from within the hearts of all the concerned ones in every faction.

I have no desire or intention to try and unite “The Christian Church” and “The Church of Christ.” I doubt that it could be done and I am not sure it would avail anything if it could. If it were accomplished it would probably create another narrowly exclusive sect in Christendom and we have a fair share of those already. I am somewhat dubious of anything which men can create or coalesce in the spiritual realm. I would not even attend a meeting in a central location called by a group of “top men” for the purpose of devising ways and means of uniting two parties. I just have no confidence in such devices for they are always divisive. The unity of the Spirit does not work in any such fashion.

I do not intend to be wooed into the “Christian Church fold” and by the same token, I do not intend to woo anyone into the “Church of Christ fold.” I would not know which “Christian Church fold” to enter if I succumbed to the solicitation, nor would I know which “Church of Christ fold” to woo them into. We have about two dozen of the latter scattered around the country, each of which is “the loyal church” as you can readily determine by questioning their respective adherents. I do not believe there is any such thing as either “The Christian Church” or “The Church of Christ.” There are religious parties designated by these titles, but there is only one church. There never was but one. There will never be another. “The Christian Church” does not have all of the Christians in it, and “The Church of Christ” is not the church of Christ. Both of these are parties which have been allowed to grow out of an American restoration movement launched by some Presbyterian ministers in the early part of the nineteenth century.

The church is the body of Christ. It is a divine organism. Man can no more make another church than he can create another God. The church of God is simply the people of God. It is composed of the family of God. The family of God is made up of those who have been born again of water and the Spirit. The church for which Jesus died embraces many more than those involved in any human party or movement. Wherever God has a child I have a brother, and wherever I have a brother I will go and share with him what I have for his welfare. I will not woo my brother into anything else than the one body to which God adds him nor will I allow him to woo me into anything which men can create or devise.

I am frequently asked if I do not consider those in the “Christian Church fold” as “brethren in error”? Certainly I so consider them for I do not place them one whit above my brethren in the non-instrument segment. The only brethren I have on this earth are “brethren in error.” They are not all in the same error. Some are in one error, some in another, but all are in some error. For years I looked for a faction composed of those who were not in error. That was before I realized that our existing factions are proof that all of us are in error. I now realize that if I found a brother who was free of all error he would be very uncomfortable around me. We’d probably get in an argument about what constitutes error.

Now that I no longer equate fellowship with endorsement and recognize that one does not have to conform to my views on everything to be in Christ, I am free to love all of the brethren. It is amazing how the scales fall from your eyes the very moment you realize that while all of God’s children are in the church of Christ for which he died, they are not necessarily all in “The Church of Christ” in which you have always lived. At first this freedom is a little frightening as freedom always is to one who is exposed to it for the first time. One still retains his partisan suspicion and is inclined to shy away from actual contact with those of other factional backgrounds. As he gradually comes to minge with them he learns that every party has the same problems of frustration, worldliness and sin with which to contend. He learns that there is a fellowship of the concerned ones in every faction and he actually has much more in common with these than with the cult of the indifferent within his own party.

The real sense of freedom comes when one realizes that he can go anywhere that he is invited and speak to any group on earth without being afraid of what will happen to him when he gets back. He is free to communicate with any sincere seekers after truth simply because they are seeking truth. What is more important, perhaps, he can acknowledge his debt for truths discovered by those in another party than the one with which he is identified. It is characteristic of the party spirit that it does not admit the achievements or accomplishments of those in another party. If grudgingly forced to do so there must always be the assignment of an ulterior motive. This makes for a false sense of values and renders all who engage in it immature and childish. “No man is an island” as John Donne so aptly phrased it.

It is very important that all of my brethren realize that I do not castigate those who do not see our current situation as I do. I no longer represent any faction or fragment among us and I am accountable to God and concerned with all of my brethren. This last is important, for so long as one feels a special tie to those in a certain faction he can “wash his hands” of responsibility for all others. The brotherhood of which I am now a part is not circumscribed by a specific view as to the millennium, cups, classes, colleges, orphan homes, instrumental music, etc. It is as wide as God’s love for His children and embraces every member of his family.

I do not agree in toto with any of the brethren so I am free to love all of them and to exhibit that love in deed and in truth as well as in word and in speech. When I speak “at a Christian Church” I am among brethren. They must receive me as I do them— in spite of our differences. This is the way God has received us all. But if brethren in our various groups feel that they cannot even associate with each other or discuss their problems as members of the same family, I do not intend to lash out at them. These are decisions which they must make and for which they must be answerable to the Father of us all. I am driven by an inner compulsion to try and alleviate the division which is the scandal of the movement with which we are affiliated. I do not say that everyone must visualize this as I do or pursue the course which I have chosen after days of prayerful entreaty.

If I may charitably voice an opinion about my brother who wrote (and scores of others who share his views) I would suggest that he is the victim of a century of isolationism. It was a hundred years ago that the restoration movement began to disintegrate under the impact of innovations. The initial cleavage was attended by fiery debate, locked buildings, fist fights and lawsuits. The rancor and choler were so intense that earthly families were rent into warring clans and brethren would not speak to each other on the street.

Now, more than ten decades have passed into history. A new generation has arisen to take the place of those on all sides who feuded until death. There is a tugging of the Spirit of God in the hearts of gentle men and women in all of our factions, leading us not to our undoing, but to the undoing of tragic errors which have resulted in divisions multiplied. Satan will seek to keep us apart. It is his purpose to widen chasms and strengthen walls. The Spirit is interested in building bridges and removing walls. The greatest bridge of all was our Lord who spanned the awesome gap between divinity and humanity. "For he is our peace, who has made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility."

We have been conditioned by years of factional teaching and training. We have been shown how to hate instead of being taught how to love. It will be difficult for us to reverse our attitude. We do not want to compromise conviction nor undermine the structure of faith. But someone must dare to do something or the mistakes of the past will be permanently embalmed. It is obvious that we will make additional blunders and be guilty of many more mistakes. This means that we must be ever ready to acknowledge error as we become aware of it. We must cease to equate error with evil for it is not necessarily evil unless deliberate and voluntary.

Let us not minimize our problems for they are great. They are wrapped up in our whole emotional makeup. Their magnitude is not lessened by years of traditional indoctrination. It is extremely difficult for most brethren to see how “fellowship” which was dissolved over introduction of instrumental music can ever be restored so long as the musical instrument remains. As you know, I am personally opposed to the use of instrumental music in corporate worship. I do not even sing with it when it is so employed. This is a matter of personal conviction, if I know my heart, and is not sheer stubbornness. But I have come to see that “the fellowship” into which we are called of God is not conditioned upon an attitude toward instrumental music, either pro or con. If it were, of course there could be no fellowship until the instrument was removed.

Fellowship is brotherhood and brotherhood is established by mutual parenthood. One is not my brother because he uses an instrument or because he opposes its use. If one who used an instrument ceased to do so it would not make him my brother; if one who opposed the instrument began to use it he would not cease to be my brother. I think that we must solve our problems inside of a recognized framework of brotherhood. This requires the exercise of a considerable degree of tolerance, which is not the endorsing of things that are wrong but the enduring of those who think they are right.

I think it is time that the concerned ones in every community begin to face up to our problems in realistic fashion. Others are not divided from us; we are separated from each other. Why can we not meet together to pray about our state of disunity and to talk with each other about our hopes for peace? “Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God.” Let us remove the partisan fear of proselyting so that it is not a question of wooing others to “our fold.” Let us all, upon our knees, pledge to God and each other that we shall constitute but one fold under one Shepherd. It may amaze us what areas of reconciliation will be opened to those whose gushing tears and contrite hearts show that their faces are turned toward Zion.

We have come a long way from the original goal and spirit of the restoration movement. When the editor of the Baptist Register charged that the Reformers were schismatics, Alexander Campbell replied to him in the May, 1837, issue of Millennial Harbinger, page 199, as follows:

That we are not on this topic, on which so much has been spoken, schismatical, is proved from the fact, that we never did refuse communion with any good man, nor with any church among the Baptists, because of their theories or preachings on this subject; nor do we now. Let the Baptists, if they doubt our sincerity on this subject, rescind their “Decrees and Orders in Council,” and invite us into their pulpits and congregations, and thus test who is schismatical, and see whether we will not reciprocate the same Christian civilities throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. And whether they call me weak or strong in the faith, I care not: one thing I know— it will be as great a stretch for my individual charity or forbearance (if anyone prefer either of the misapplications of the sacred terms) as it possibly can be to any orderly and Christian man in all their ranks. Yet such is my love of union and cooperation amongst all creditable professors of Christ’s gospel, that rather than make a party or a new sect (I speak for myself, but I doubt not that all my intelligent brethren would go as far as I)— I would gladly bear with many infirmities and errors in opinion rather than hazard the evils that must grow out of the rivalries, and jealousies, and bickerings of a party and schismatical spirit.

No longer is our central problem one of association with those whom Campbell referred to as “our Baptist brethren” but it is now a question of association with the heirs of the Reformers. Perhaps his charge leveled against the evangelical sects of his day now applies to us. “Their error is, that they prefer the minor causes of division to the major causes of union, and give to their circumstantial or expediencies the weight, and reason, and authority due only to their own essentials. They would rather be sects because of the accidentals, than united in one great communion because of the essentials.”

What Is Heresy?

Mission Messenger (March 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

The word “heresy” deserves special study by members of “The Church of Christ” because it has taken on a traditional meaning among its adherents which is at variance with the word of God. Our brethren have borrowed a leaf from the book of Rome and are following Thomas Aquinas rather than the apostles of Jesus Christ. In effect we have gone the hierarchy one better for with many of our brethren the mere expression of a different view than the party line is branded as “heresy.” Thomas Aquinas was a little more charitable than the average preacher among us for as Addis and Arnold point out in their Catholic Dictionary:

St. Thomas adds that this rejection of Catholic dogma must be deliberate and pertinacious, so that his teaching, which is that of all theologians, may be summed up in the following definition. A heretic is one who, having been baptized, and still professing himself a Christian, pertinaciously denies or doubts any of the truths that must be held by divine and Catholic faith.

The whole idea that heresy is something taught or preached and that it consists of an opinion at variance with the dogmatic norm is a witches’ brew from the smoking Romish cauldron. It resulted from the establishment of orthodoxy and creedalism, and was concocted to justify the gibbet, rack, stake and cross, as a means of discouraging dissenters and enforcing conformity. It has remained for "The Church of Christ" to add the crowning touch of infamy by rejecting as heretics men who hold a divergent view about such innocuous matters as cups, classes, colleges, the millennium, and a host of other things. Self-appointed judges, revelling in their feeble usurpation of power, have pronounced the sentence of heresy and quoted, "An heretic after the first and second admonition reject." In every instance it is such a judge who is the real heretic, but in our mixed up mess, and messed up mix, we have lived to see the day when every member of "The Church of Christ" is regarded as a heretic by those in another faction wearing that name.

Frederic W. Farrar was a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; Archdeacon and Canon of Westminster; and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen of England. In his renowned work entitled "The Early Days of Christianity," he says:

The word "heresy" though it is used in the Authorized Version to translate the hairesis of the New Testament, has not the same meaning . . . In the New Testament it comes to mean "a faction," and the sin condemned by the word is not the adoption of erroneous opinions, but the factiousness of the party spirit.

Then this scholarly gentleman adds something which should make all of us think soberly and seriously.

The word "heretic" has indeed been shamefully abused. It has again and again been applied in a thoroughly heretical, and worse than heretical manner, to the insight and inspiration of the few who have discovered aspects of truth hitherto unnoticed, or restored old truths by the overthrow of dominant perversions. A church can only prove its possession of life by healthy development. Morbid uniformity, enforced by the tyranny of a dominant sect, is the most certain indication of dissolution and decay. Since Christianity is many sided the worst form of heresy is the mechanical suppression of diversion from popular shibboleths. Every great reformer in turn, every discoverer of new forms or expressions of religious truth, every slayer of old and monstrous errors, has been called a heretic. When a new truth could not be refuted it was easy for the members of a dominant party to gratify their impotent hatred by burning him who had uttered it . . . But the real heretics were, in most cases, the supporters of ecclesiastical tyranny and stereotyped ignorance by whom these martyrs were tortured and slain.

No less illustrious was a contemporary of Farrar, also a Fellow in Trinity College— Dr. J. B. Lightfoot. He had the added assistance of two very personal friends, B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort, who were engaged in a joint recension of the Greek Testament during his career. The latter, together with W. A. Wright, Librarian of Trinity College, actually gave suggestions and made corrections before Lightfoot committed his works to print. It is especially noteworthy, therefore, that Lightfoot defines hairesis as parties or sects, as for example, in Galatians 5:20, where he says of the word, “A more aggravated form of dichostasiai, when the divisions have developed into distinct and organized parties.”

In An American Commentary on the New Testament, edited by Alvah Hovey, the occurrence of hairesis in 1 Corinthians 11:19, gives occasion for the following observation:

Heresies” is a transliteration, but not a translation of the Greek word, which has come over into English with a different meaning from its ordinary Greek, or New Testament meaning. It means, originally, a taking: then, introducing the idea of selection, the taking of what one desires and leaving the rest, election, choice; then, a chosen way of living or thinking; then a body of men choosing the same way of thinking or living; and finally, dissensions between different bodies of this kind. Its use in the N. T. is divided between the last two meanings, sects and their dissensions . . . In Titus 3:10, the word translated “heretic” means in the same way, “one who causes division, a sectarian . . .

James Hastings, writes in his Dictionary of the Bible in the following words:

The word “heresy” is never used in the N. T. in the technical sense in which we find it by the first quarter of the second century, as a doctrinal departure from the true faith of the church, implying a separation from its communion. The usual N. T. meaning of hairesis is simply a party, school, or sect; and sect is the word by which it is most frequently rendered.

In A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, Ernest DeWitt Burton, Professor of N. T. Interpretation in the University of Chicago, has this to say of hairesis:

In the N. T. it is always associated with the middle of the verb, and usually signifies a body of people holding a chosen set of opinions . . . The meaning “heresy,” a doctrine at variance with that of the general body is not found in the New Testament.

A heresy is a sect. A sect is a party formed for the purpose of separating some of God’s children from the rest. Sects are formed by factionalists, those under the insidious influence of the party spirit. No one who is honestly mistaken about some matters of scriptural interpretation is a heretic. To be a heretic one must make a test of fellowship out of his opinion or interpretation and attempt to establish a party to promote or protect that view. No one is a heretic merely because he endorses or opposes classes, colleges, or individual cups. But if he draws a line of fellowship and refers to “cups churches,” “Sunday school churches,” or “college churches,” as if those who hold such views are not members of the one body, he is heretical or sectarian in his attitude. The same can be said for the species of bigotry which leads men to brand as “Antis” those who are not members of their exclusive cliques and factions, and to disregard them as brethren.

The current view of “heresy” held by a majority of those in the modern “Church of Christ” is not only without scriptural warrant or authority, but is inimical to the peace and harmony of the body of Christ, for many reasons, of which the following are but a few.

1. It brands and stigmatizes humble seekers after truth whose character is above reproach and whose only crime is that they cannot concur in every view or opinion held by those who have assumed the role of infallible interpreters of the sacred scriptures.

2. It assumes that each faction or party has an infallible interpretation of the word of God at the same time that it denies the possibility of an infallible interpreter. For example, no one has the right to enthrone as dogma any view of the millennium, and demand that all kow-tow to it in order to be recognized as loyal to Jesus Christ, in whose coming all believe. As an individual, one may retain any view of this matter which commends itself to his intellect and conscience, without sinning against God, but if he gives his allegiance to a party created to propagate that view in divisive fashion, he is heretical, not because of his view but because of his attitude and action.

3. It makes real communication and interchange of ideas with other sincere students of the Word in the Christian realm virtually impossible. So long as we regard all others as heretics we cannot meet with them for significant re-study of our areas of difference, but we must confront them only to admonish them before rejecting them. This renders impossible any genuine spiritual encounter for common good. Such an approach precludes sharing in research with other humble souls and makes us the proud and self-righteous dispensers of orthodoxy. Others must sit and listen but dare not rise and speak.

4. It breeds inconsistency of the worst kind. We are betrayed into rejecting those who have not attained unto a certain intellectual status at the same time that we receive those whose moral and ethical behavior is inferior. The result is that the criterion becomes one of concept rather than of conduct, in direct opposition to God's method of judging. Every faction tolerates and uses those who are far from exemplary in conduct at the same time that godly men are rejected simply because they cannot subscribe to partisan interpretations. It rejects those whom God receives and receives those whom God rejects.

5. It denies the validity of the only law bound upon those in Christ Jesus—the law of love. It limits and restricts the real applicability of this law to those who conform to the party norm, and thus reduces it to a factional dispensation. If you doubt this, all you need to do is to read the various journals to learn that each has its own circumscribed “brotherhood” and each of these brotherhoods is composed of those who conform to the party test. All “brotherhoods” in “The Church of Christ” test one's worthiness by what he is against rather than by what he is for. Depending upon the party, one is “loyal” if opposed to orphan homes, Herald of Truth, classes, colleges, cups, fermented wine, women teachers, etc. In the aggregate the only thing upon which “The Church of Christ” in all of its parties and segments is agreed is its opposition to instrumental music in corporate worship. While each party within the alignment brands as “heretics” those who belong to the other factions, all of the factions join in denouncing as “heretics” those brethren in the Lord who use instrumental music! This is the only basis of unity upon which all of the factions can now stand. It is apparent that every member of “The Church of Christ” is a “heretic” in the eyes of some other members of “The Church of Christ”!

SUGGESTIONS FOR THOUGHT

Because of the intolerable condition into which our thinking has brought us I want to suggest ten points of reason essential to thinking ourselves out of our current status. These are not offered in dogmatic fashion, nor are they intended to constitute a panacea for all of our ills. I offer them simply and humbly as “blazes” along the trail, which we may follow as we seek to free ourselves from the wilderness which has ensnared us.

1. Virtually every truth now accepted was once branded as “heresy.” We are willing to give our lives now in defense of those things for which our fathers were once willing to take the lives of those who held them.

2. Heresy is not the illegitimate child of truth but the unwanted offspring of orthodoxy. Truth never did produce “heresy” and orthodoxy never produced anything else.

3. The charge of “heresy” never measures the mind of the one charged by the mind of Christ, but by the mind of the one who makes the charge. Thus we have a fallible and erring judge demanding infallible and inerrant thought of others.

4. So long as philosophy and science reward men for thinking and religion, operating under the guise of Christianity, penalizes them for doing so, the first two will inevitably become the refuge of the brilliant while the latter becomes the resort of the mediocre.

5. Until we can conceive of the body of Christ as being of sufficient magnitude to encompass, absorb and assimilate, every member in Christ on earth, we have not yet outgrown first century prejudices. We are merely substituting our twentieth century class distinctions of “Liberal and Conservative,” “Pro and Anti,” for the earlier “Jew and Greek” and “bond and free.” In Christ Jesus none of these avail anything. It is the new creation that counts and that is all that counts.

6. It is not essential that those of us who are in Christ Jesus resolve all of our differences; it is only necessary that we resolve all of our differences in Christ. Those who were in Christ were as much Jews or Gentiles, as much bond and free, as before, but none of these things availed in Christ. He is greater than any of our distinctions and differences. There was room in Christ for James, an orthodox Jew and a pillar of the church of the Messiah in Jerusalem, to teach Jewish converts to circumcise their children and keep the law, while Paul was teaching his Gentile converts among the churches of Christ to ignore both. The latter wrote that the three Jerusalem leaders in the synagogue of the Messianists “accepted Barnabas and myself as partners, and shook hands upon it, agreeing that we should go to the Gentiles while they went to the Jews.” No problem that has ever plagued the heirs of the restoration movement can compare in explosive potential with that of circumcision.

The fact that there did not come into existence “a circumcision church” and an “anti-circumcision church” ought to shame us to tears with our glib patter and partisan jargon about “Sunday school churches” and “anti-Sunday School churches;” or “instrumental churches” and “non-instrumental churches;” or “white churches” and “colored churches.” God have mercy upon our tragic trifling with divine love and grace. We need to quit shaking fists at each other and shake hands as we go to our respective spheres of labor. It is far better to be known as brethren of the open hand, than to be regarded as brethren of the clenched fist!

7. Once the true nature of divine revelation in love is fully grasped, there can never be another “heresy trial” among the saints of God. Such trials are “witch hunts” and are never prosecuted by seekers after truth. They are the instruments of self-appointed defenders of orthodoxy. No child of God should ever be made to suffer indignity or reprisal for any opinion honestly held, regardless of how wrong it may ultimately prove to be. Such a person must be tolerated and not persecuted.

This does not mean there will not be heretics, for there will be, and these must always be rejected. But a heretic is a factional man and must never be thrust out for an opinion honestly held, but for factionalism. Such a man will not need to be tried for he is self-condemned. This is an essential feature of heresy as God regards it.

8. Congregations are made up of individuals and will reflect the divergent views and interpretations of those who compose them. These, in turn, have formulated their views as a result of instruction given by fallible men, as well as from their own limited and fallible personal investigation of the revelation of God. When, therefore, in conformity with honest personal and corporate conscience, based upon convictions arrived at through teaching and study, they adopt those means which they deem best fitted to enable them to implement the commands of God, we should not brand such congregations as “dens of digression” or “hotbeds of heresy” for they are not such at all. Our own intemperate language may be a worse offense against God and provide a greater stumblingblock than what the others are doing.

If we believe the means adopted are inimical to the revealed purpose of God, we have several areas of responsibility. First, we must personally resist the adoption of that which our own conscience condemns. Second, we will establish dialogue with brethren who employ such means, but do so on a fraternal basis within an atmosphere of brotherly love to avoid enmity and strife. Third, we will never allow such discussions, regardless of how prolonged, to dissolve brotherly regard and relationship. Fourth, we will not permit our disagreement about such means to negate our labors together in other areas where there is agreement. We are united with anyone up to the point of disagreement and we should make our unity as vital and vocal as our disunity. This is essential if we are to employ the full force of Christian witness in our impact upon the neo-pagan world which surrounds us all, regardless of our position on cups, classes, colleges, orphan homes, or the millennium. We need to know who our real enemies are!

9. If we are to enact the role of peacemakers and thus be called the children of God, we must approach every case of division in the Christian realm with the attitude that we will not widen the gap if we cannot narrow the chasm. This means that if we discuss points at issue day and night for a week and reach an apparent stalemate, we must leave with at least as much respect for each other as we had at the outset. We must not only give men time, but allow the Holy Spirit an opportunity to penetrate and break up the fallow ground of our hearts with the plowshare of destiny. In many cases, this strategy of peace will necessitate postponement of initial discussion of controverted points until a more propitious occasion. In no case can the strategy work if we approach the conference with a view that the other brethren are heretics, for we are pre-conditioned by the scriptures to a rejection of heretics, and no ground of acceptance of one another can be found.

10. Partisan debates, such as are generally held, will not solve brotherhood problems. They are conducted in an atmosphere of tension more conducive to enlargement of differences than to lessening them. They seldom result in unification of brethren although frequently they encourage division through rivalry. If a man is a heretic nothing will be gained by publicly debating him; if he is not, everything may be gained by not doing so. However, since I intend to discuss this feature more at length in a subsequent issue, I will presently defer further expression relative to the subject.

We are guilty of loose and intemperate speech when we indiscriminately brand other saints of God as heretics, apostates and false teachers. This is not consistent with the admonition to “speak not evil one of another, brethren.” Let us employ the “cloak of love” to cover the imperfections of those who can do no better than they know to do.

To all who have been so patient and kind as to read thus far we express our gratitude and thanksgiving. “Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is wellpleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.”

My Defense

Mission Messenger (March 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

“This is my defense to those who would examine me” (1 Cor. 9:3).

Of all the contemporary leaders in the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood, no other enjoys a higher degree of respect than Dr. J. D. Thomas, professor of Bible at Abilene Christian College. Brilliant and erudite, this good brother has earned an excellent standing in the scholastic world. For this reason I personally feel that anything he writes deserves more than passing consideration, even when it is directed against my position. In this connection I mention the article by my esteemed brother which appeared in Gospel Advocate, January 31, 1963, under the title of “Brother Ketcherside’s New Fallacy.” In view of the fact that Brother Thomas labored under so many mistaken impressions of my views, I immediately addressed a letter to our brother in the Lord, B. C. Goodpasture, editor of Gospel Advocate, as follows:

My gracious brother: In your issue of Gospel Advocate, dated January 31, 1963, our brother in the Lord, J. D. Thomas, presents an article under the title, “Brother Ketcherside’s New Fallacy.” Since this presentation does not correctly portray in all or the particulars covered, my plea for unity among the dissident forces or the restoration movement, I humbly request the privilege of submitting for publication an expression of my views. If this is granted through your Christian generosity I promise that I will write objectively and not objectionably, in love and not in rancor.

I am fully aware that you cannot grant every request for space but inasmuch as my name appears at least eleven times on less than two pages of your journal I am sure your sense of fairness will encourage the conclusion that I deserve a hearing. If my petition is granted, will you please indicate the length of manuscript permissible? With prayers and best wishes for you and yours, I am as always, Yours and HIS, Carl.

On the same day, February 3, 1963, I also sent a letter to Brother Thomas, which I share with you herewith.

My dear brother in HIM: Grace, mercy and peace be unto you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

I have read with interest your article in the current issue of Gospel Advocate, entitled "Brother Ketcherside's New Fallacy." The fact that you do not concur with my views related to the fellowship of the saints in no sense lessens my reverence and respect for you as my brother in Him who died for the misdeeds of both of us. But your intellectual and spiritual stature, coupled with the irenic spirit manifested in your article, emboldens me to make a proposal, which I trust you will accord prayerful consideration.

Since I am sure that you believe in the right of sincere brethren who present their appeal in love, to be heard, can it be arranged that I come to Abilene for three sessions of two hours each, for public examination of my thesis? If so, I suggest that in the first two sessions I present objectively my position as to unity of the believers for one hour, and then submit to an hour of public questioning by a panel composed of three brethren, yourself being one and the other two being men of your selection. I further suggest that in the third session, after presentation of my views, I submit to questions (either oral or written) from the entire audience, with yourself acting as chairman of the meeting.

It would be understood that neither yourself nor Abilene Christian College concurred in or endorsed my views, but simply that as free men we met in interest of truth. I pledge upon my honor, that I will conduct myself with gentlemanly courtesy to all of the brethren and if I cannot lessen areas of conflict I will not widen chasms that exist. I will come at my own expense with the only requirement that we give sufficient notice of the meeting through brotherhood papers that all segments of the restoration movement will learn of the meeting and feel welcome. In the interest of fairness and justice, coupled with charity toward all, I am, Your brother in the One Faith, Carl.

At the present time, February 13, I have not as yet received a reply from Brother Goodpasture, but Brother Thomas has kindly furnished us, under the date of February 9, the following:

Dear Brother Ketcherside: In reply to your recent letter inquiring about a public discussion of your present views, I wish to state that, for good and sufficient reasons, I would not be interested in trying to have such a discussion. Sincerely yours, J. D. Thomas.

It may be that I acted presumptuously in suggesting a series of studies in Abilene. If so, I humbly apologize to Brother Thomas and others of our brethren there who would be affected. I hold that only truth can gain when humble brethren meet in a spirit of mutual regard for each other and the authority of the blessed Lord Jesus. It is a firm conviction that we must cease to erect walls and begin to construct bridges across the expanses which separate the various parties. So long as we maintain an exclusivist attitude, isolated and insulated from the thought of other brethren, we will perpetuate partisan indifference. In order to try to overcome this in my own life, I hold myself ready to go when possible to meet with my brothers in the Lord anywhere, or to converse with any other seekers after truth, be they Protestant, Catholic or Jewish.

In our next issue we will print the article from the pen of Brother Thomas as it appeared in Gospel Advocate and I will reply to it in order. Our hope will be that we shall reduce party tension, lessen areas of difference, and find as much common ground as possible upon which we may stand together. Our readers will appreciate the scholarly tone of our brother's article, and while I will not be able to reciprocate on that level I can at least write in that attitude of reverence and respect for our brother which I sincerely feel. It is indeed a pleasure to me to know that we be brethren! And I am sure you'll profit from reading the April issue.

Wishful Thinking

Mission Messenger (March 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

A good brother who is associated with one of the segments in the instrumental wing of the disciple brotherhood writes as follows:

I still say all this “plea” for “unity” is wishful thinking. As such (outwardly) there will be none before Christ returns. However, there is nothing to keep local congregations from conforming to divine patterns in the New Testament for the church, and for saints, if willing to get that way at all costs in accordance with 2 Corinthians 6:11-18.

I do not share this brother’s pessimistic outlook. A plea for unity of believers is no more wishful thinking than a prayer for unity of the believers by our Lord. We need to match His prayer with our plea, and we need to have confidence in both. Unity must be regarded from two aspects— the actual and the practical. The first is a gift of God and bestowed by the Spirit. It is real in spite of the fact that our attitudes keep it from appearing realistic. We are not told to achieve it or attain it but to maintain it. You cannot maintain what you do not have, nor continue always to have what you refuse to maintain.

Practically, we have not made the unity conferred by God a true working relationship. We are told by the apostle that we must “Exert an effort to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.” We cannot create unity but we can make peace. “Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God.” We have majored in making pieces of the body instead of making peace within it. We have called people out of the church instead of out of the world. Thus we have created organizations to the detriment of the divine organism.

If peacemakers are to be blessed it is evident their efforts will not be futile. If we took the stones which we hurl at each other and used them to build bridges toward each other we would see a great transformation in our lives. Of course, bridges must be built from both sides of the river! But the purpose of God must be fulfilled and if the “restoration movement” fails, He is still able to raise up from these stones, a people who will do His will.

One thing I do know. If we evaluate thinking about unity as wistful we still do very little constructive thinking. If we have thought ourselves into division why can we not think ourselves out? I refuse to regard division as the normal state of the body of Christ any more than I regard sickness as the normal state of my own body. A sick movement, like a sick person, needs doctoring. I have resolved to labor in answering the prayer of my Savior. I refuse to be discouraged. He who works for peace among the saints and unity among the believers has God on his side and as surely as heaven never lost a battle, this one will not be lost. The church has not reached its peak to start into a decline. It is just throwing off its swaddling-clothes. It has never yet attained to its full potential. The greatest era of all lies before us. Tomorrow will be better than today!

Reply to brother Thomas

Mission Messenger (April 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

We ask the kind indulgence of all our readers in view of the nature of this issue of our little journal. We especially crave the forbearance of those who are not allied with any segment of “the restoration movement” but who regularly read what we write. In the past we have sought to avoid as much as possible direct mention of those who differ with us, under the impression that greater objectivity was possible where no personalities were directly involved. The nature of the foregoing article hardly lends itself to review under such procedure and we reluctantly deviate from our regular course.

It is apparent that the editor of Gospel Advocate, our respected brother in Christ, B. C. Goodpasture, concurs with the author of the article that something must be done about my “enthusiasm for brotherhood unity” and my “disparagement of differences among us.” We appreciate the intention to examine what we advocate and the spirit in which it is done. It augurs well for the future when brethren can maintain an irenic attitude while discussing their differences.

Anything which is considered revolutionary should be subjected to close scrutiny and intensive investigation. I am honored that Gospel Advocate has been chosen as the medium for such an evaluation of my thinking. It is, perhaps, the journal of greatest circulation among members of the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood.

It is a pleasure to introduce to our readers one whom I have not met personally, but a brother in the Lord for whom I entertain tremendous respect. J. D. Thomas has for fourteen years been a professor of Bible at Abilene Christian College. He obtained his B.A. from the college where he now teaches, his M.A. from Southern Methodist, and his Ph.D. from the University of Chicago. Possessed of a brilliant and incisive mind, and wielding a facile pen, he is thoroughly capable of discovering any fallacy in reasoning, and of revealing it to others in unmistakable terms. Since I have no desire except to be right in the sight of God I count it a privilege to have this erudite brother review some of the things I have written.

It is my intention, if it does not prove unduly boresome to you, to share with you at some length, my impressions of the article by Brother Thomas. In doing so I can correct some of his mistaken impressions about my views and promote a better understanding. I must begin by pleading guilty to having been “the champion of a very legalistic attitude.” I grew up in a different faction of the disciple brotherhood than the one with which Brother Thomas was affiliated and there was a time when, if he had been gracious enough to attend one of my meetings, I would have been so ungracious as not to accord him the courtesy of even asking him to lead in prayer. I am ashamed of that attitude and I sincerely apologize to all of the brethren in the various parties for the way I acted due to my ignorance and spiritual immaturity.

As I look back on that era of my life, it appears to me that my “legalism” consisted not so much in believing that certain things were right or wrong, but in trusting in these, rather than in the merit of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the basis of my hope. I have carefully catechised my own heart and I find that I have not changed my ideas on any of these things. Perhaps my traditional upbringing, environment, and early association enter into this. But in those days I was one of those “who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and despised others” (Luke 18:9). I judged the worthiness of men, not by their relationship to our blessed Lord, but by their position on cups, classes, colleges, the millennium, or instrumental music. While I have not altered my views about these things, I no longer trust in myself that I am righteous and I no longer despise others. It has meant much to me to know that “He is the source of your life in Christ Jesus, whom God made our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30).

I would be more perturbed about going “to the opposite extreme” if I did not know, from experience, that in our parlance every person is an extremist who does not conform in every particular to the party with which we chance to be affiliated. I get letters lamenting that once I was unduly exclusive and now I am unduly inclusive. The fact is that each party wants you to include all whom they do not exclude, and exclude all whom they do not include. Each group wants you to include only those up to themselves and exclude all above and beyond them. To avoid going to an extreme I have resolved to include no one as a brother whom God does not include as a son. I shall allow brotherhood to be determined by fatherhood. It will be affectional and not factional.

I am pleased that Brother Thomas has defined “liberal” as applied to men like myself, as not related to modernism. The term “liberal” is flung about so loosely by adherents of our various factions that every one of us is “a liberal” to some of the brethren. I try to avoid the labels we banter about so glibly because it seems to me that these are symptoms of our partisan attitude. Few of us realize that our tagging of our brethren in such a partisan spirit, automatically places us in a party also. But our brother is in error, when he says I am “unduly liberal in the sense of sanctioning denominational doctrines and practices.” I am opposed to all such. To “sanction” is to endorse. I have consistently refused to endorse in any fashion that which I believe to be contrary to the words of the Holy Spirit. The thing I sanction and recognize is brotherhood, the relationship of all of God's children, in spite of the fact that some of them (perhaps all of them) still engage in some "denominational doctrines and practices."

Our brother uses the expression "full fellowship" at least six times. This common idiom in "Church of Christ speech" is not a part of the vocabulary of the Spirit. Its employment denotes, I think, a misconception of the term "fellowship" and so long as that mistaken idea exists we will maintain our divisions of the past and continue to create new factions in the future. Fellowship is brotherhood. The suffixes "ship" and "hood" indicate a state, condition, or relationship, in which we share or participate. Fellowship is that state or relationship with God and Christ into which we are called by the gospel, and in which all of us share as brothers. Fellowship in Christ is based on sonship, brotherhood on a common Fatherhood.

"God is faithful by whom you were called into the fellowship of his Son, Jesus Christ our Lord" (1 Cor. 1:9). Fellowship is entered in response to the call of God. All who make the proper response are in the fellowship. The context shows that those in the fellowship are saints (1:2); brethren (1:10); babes in Christ (3:1); God's field (3:9); God's building (3:9); and God's temple (3:16). God's Spirit dwelled in them (3:16) and they were Christ's (3:23). I hardly think any one would conclude that Paul endorsed their "denominational practices" but they were in the fellowship. Any person who is in Christ Jesus is in the fellowship. He is not half in it but all in it. The fellowship is the creation of the Holy Spirit. It is called "the fellowship of the Spirit" (2 Cor. 13:14; Phil. 2:1). Any person on this earth in whom the Spirit abides is in the fellowship. I do not consider that the Spirit is half in and half out of some of God's children. "One who does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him" (Rom. 8:9). Conversely, I conclude that every one who does have the Spirit does belong to him. This is the real criterion.

I have no half brothers or stepbrothers in the Lord. Every person in the world who has properly responded to the divine call is “a blood brother of the Lamb.” “For thou wast slain and by thy blood didst ransom men for God from every tribe and tongue and people and nation” (Rev. 5:9). There is no partial state of being in the Lord so there is no partial state of fellowship. The fellowship is full and complete since it is in Him who is “the fulness of God.” Indeed I am in the fellowship with many of the saints despite doctrinal differences unless the doctrines are of such a nature as to separate the one who holds them from God. Any doctrine which severs one from “life in the Son,” that is, eternal life, severs that person from me if I remain in the Son. There are many differences that are occasions for discussion among brethren which are not grounds for division from brethren. Brother Thomas holds many doctrinal views which I cannot espouse but these are questions in the fellowship and not questions of fellowship.

Our good brother gives an example of what he thinks I advocate. “In other words, we should fellowship the instrumental music brethren and associate with them openly and freely, and if we try to teach them it should be in a way that would not interfere with full fellowship.” Our brother clearly misunderstands all I have written about fellowship. We do not “fellowship brethren” any more than I “companionship my wife” or “partnership my business associates.” Matthias was chosen to “the apostleship” (Acts 1:25), but he did not “apostleship the eleven.” I am glad that our brother refers to “the instrumental music brethren.” If they are brethren they are in the fellowship and there is nothing we can do about it. God has added them to the family and I must accept them. I do not need to accept all they do any more than I accept all Brother Thomas does, but they are in the fellowship. Any teaching I do should be in such a manner as not to interfere with the fellowship, for it is divinely created. I am earnestly praying as I write these words that nothing I say in this article will be disruptive of the fellowship with those whom I love in the Lord Jesus Christ.

I think I should make it clear that I do not say others should “associate with the instrumental brethren openly and freely.” I simply say that I must do so. When I was factional some good brethren persuaded me that I should not associate openly and freely with men like Brother Thomas; now I do not intend for Brother Thomas to persuade me not to associate with other good brethren. To do that would be to return to the factional spirit and thus grieve the Holy Spirit. Any person who is a child of my Father is my brother and it is unthinkable to me that I should refuse to associate with other members of the family of God. I do not agree with any of them fully so I am free to love all of them fully.

It is not a choice between “the instrument party” in error, and “the non-instrument party” with no error. The fact that there are two dozen factions in the non-instrument segment proves that we are not free from error. It is a question as to which brothers in error I will associate with openly and freely. I do not endorse any of their errors, nor do I expect them to endorse any of mine. Therefore, it is really a choice of brethren, and not of errors. But I have no choice of brothers. I can no more choose my spiritual brothers than I could my fleshly brothers. Brotherhood is established by fatherhood; fraternity is the result of paternity. I shall love all of my brothers and move among them as they will allow, sharing in what they can convey, sharing with them what little I have learned. I shall receive them as God received me, not because of perfection, but in spite of imperfection.

Our brother is mistaken when he writes that I think “that all of us ought to ignore all doctrinal differences.” That is the exact opposite of what I think. We could not ignore doctrinal differences if we tried to do it, and the harder we tried the less possibility there would be of doing it. What I think is that conformity in opinions and interpretations is not essential to the fellowship but fellowship is essential to arriving at harmony. Not one admonition to “live in harmony with one another” (e.g., Rom. 15:5) was ever written by an apostle to bring people into the fellowship. All such exhortations were addressed to those in fellowship and because they were in it. So long as we try to restore “fellowship” by arguing our differences we will only create more division. We need to restore a proper sense of fellowship first and discuss our differences within this frame of reference. Then fellowship will not be disrupted every time we differ. Our present course is suicidal!

Again our brother is mistaken about why I am “vocal about this problem” of instrumental music. It is not because it “divides the greater majority of immersed believers” for I am not sure this is the case. It does divide the greatest majority of such believers who are heirs of the restoration movement. I do not think of all the immersed believers as within these ranks. But the reason we cannot evade this problem is simply because it was in dealing with it that our fathers first adopted the philosophy of “maintaining doctrinal purity by separation from brethren.” The truth is, as any student of our history can verify, that the restoration movement did not divide when instrumental music was introduced, nor for a long time afterward. It was not made a test of fellowship by those who opposed it until agitation climaxed years later in the reading of an “Address and Declaration” (1889) which specifically declared that those who practiced certain innovations would no longer “be regarded as brethren.”

It was this document which equated brotherhood with conformity that sowed the seed for all of the tragic divisions which followed. It is this philosophy of dissension and schism which plagues us to this day. My brethren in the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood would welcome anything I might do to heal the breaches which have occurred since the initial disruption, but this would gain nothing of permanent value, for so long as we maintain the creedal inconsistency we will fracture and fragment ourselves every time a brother learns a truth which appears to be new. At present we have but one ultimate solution for differences— division; and but one ultimate approach to division when it occurs— partisan debate. The reason I am “vocal about this problem” is because I realize that until we go back to the place where we adopted and first implemented this harmful philosophy, we will simply be nibbling around the edges of our difficulty and division. We must restore “brotherhood” to its proper status— all brotherhood— or we will eventually end up with no brotherhood at all. If we continue to ignore this truth we will imperil our whole future.

It is my personal opinion that the new covenant scriptures are not clear-cut in the matter of instrumental music and most other things which we make “tests of fellowship.” We have been debating some of these things for almost a century. Both sides of the controversy have examined every angle as scrupulously and meticulously as the ancient Pharisees did their law. Surely, if the scriptures are so positive and plain someone would have come up with the specific scripture which would have settled the issue permanently for all honest men. We need to face up realistically to the fact that we have postulated a basis of interpretation in the light of which we regard the scriptures and that which does not conform to this basis is regarded by us as a sin. Other men, who are as humble and honest as ourselves, do not always see these things in the same light for they view them from a divergent angle or perspective.

It is certainly not my intention to “reduce all faith to being simply opinion.” What I have suggested is that when sincere brethren disagree as to which of these categories a thing belongs in, they should recognize that it is a matter of opinion, or judgment, as to whether it is a matter of faith or opinion, and should not divide over that opinion or matter of judgment. I cannot force others to categorize all things as I do. I must learn to tolerate those who do not. A man who loves God must reach personal conclusions as to what is faith and what is opinion, in some cases, and for such conclusions he must be answerable to God and not to me. "To his own Master he standeth or falleth!" Many of our problems of division will be settled when we cease to play at being God.

Our learned brother is not the first to feel that he has a point in prophesying where he thinks my "basic argument really leads." He reminds us that "denominational people consider baptism by immersion to be only a matter of opinion." What is baptism by immersion? I have labored under the impression that the word "baptism" was a transliteration of the Greek word for "dip or immerse." Does any one consider that "immersion by immersion" is a matter of opinion? Or "baptism by baptism"?

Baptism is directly related to the new birth. By it we enter into Christ and thus into the fellowship. There is no room for difference about Christ Jesus or in the implementation of that faith which brings us into the family relationship. But in Christ Jesus there is room for differences. We are in different states of spiritual growth and development. Under the rule of our King we can receive no one whom he has not received, but we must receive all whom he has received. I do not have to "leave the unimmersed out of the unity program" for I do not decide the terms of admission. I simply accept those whom Christ accepts, and upon the same terms that he accepts me. "Welcome one another, therefore, as Christ has welcomed you, for the glory of God" (Romans 15:7).

I do not think the Father writes the name of a newly-born spiritual son in the Lamb's book of life only to scratch it out immediately if he opposes cups or classes; or endorses orphan homes, the pre-millennial viewpoint, or instrumental music. That name is not recorded on the basis of an attitude toward any of these things and God will need to be very patient, longsuffering and merciful unto all of us, if our names are found in that book when opened in its finality. I may be mistaken, of course, but since I have ceased to be “the champion of a very legalistic attitude” I find myself trusting more and more upon faith in Jesus and God’s grace, and less and less upon my intellectual attainment and spiritual perfection. I will do everything I can as nearly as I understand the will of the Master but I am resigned to being an unprofitable servant when I have done all.

It is probably fortunate that I am referred to J. W. McGarvey for the principle that can get me “back on the right track.” It could be enlightening for us to see how he personally applied that principle as relates to instrumental music. He was the first man in the restoration movement to write an article affirming that the use of instrumental music in the corporate worship is not legitimate. The initial article appeared in the Millennial Harbinger of November, 1864. His thinking was challenged by A. S. Hayden and for several years the discussion of “the organ question” was in the forefront of brotherhood journalism. So intense did the involvement become that the editor of Millennial Harbinger, W. K. Pendleton (twice Alexander Campbell’s son-in-law) wrote, “We note a growing heat under the discussion of this subject, but let us keep cool.”

I have carefully read every word that J. W. McGarvey wrote. His was a masterful presentation. I have never seen a single new argument against instrumental music since his day. The arguments for its justification have altered considerably in the interim. Brother McGarvey was a member of the Broadway Church, Lexington, Kentucky, when the elders decided on November 2, 1902, to submit the question of the organ to a vote of the congregation. On the same day McGarvey wrote a letter withdrawing his membership from the congregation. But W. C. Morro, in his biography entitled “Brother McGarvey” asserts, “This much is a certainty: McGarvey never allowed his position on the organ to become a source of division in the church. His soul recoiled from such a step.” Again he writes, “McGarvey never made silence of the organ a condition of his participating in any service. . . . McGarvey would speak or worship in any church or assembly where a musical instrument was used, but if conditions made it possible, he preferred the singing be without the instrument.”

Brother Thomas did not cite McGarvey as an authority in religious matters, nor do I. Our authority is the same as that which Brother McGarvey always recognized and defended, the inspired scriptures. Still it is interesting to note the manner in which this earlier brother sought to cope with the same problem which confronts us in our attempt to maintain intact the fabric of fellowship in the face of crisis. It seems to demonstrate that each succeeding generation must confront the same problems and all of us must do our best, with fallible judgment, to please God and love each other. I suspect that my personal view of the fellowship of persons as related to things is much like that of J. W. McGarvey.

Our good brother mentions Romans 14:23. Does this mean that he places instrumental music in the category of things dealt with in that verse and the context? If not, I do not know why he introduces it. If so, is he willing to say, with regard to instrumental music, “I know and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean in itself; but it is unclean for any one who thinks it is unclean” (verse 14)? The “faith” mentioned in verse 23 is one’s personal conviction of what is right and wrong, that is, what he thinks. It is the opposite of “doubt” and one who has no doubt is acting in faith, according to this verse. J. B. Phillips is close to the correct interpretation when he puts it: “Your personal convictions are a matter of faith between yourself and God, and you are happy if you have no qualms about what you allow yourself to eat. Yet if a man eats meat with an uneasy conscience about it, you may be sure he is wrong to do so. For his action does not spring from his faith, and when we eat apart from our faith, we sin.”

On the basis of this verse, our good brother writes, “If I believe instrumental music in worship to be a sin, I cannot practice it, neither can I honor any one else that does it.” But the whole tenor of this chapter to which the verse cited is the conclusion, is that one dare not bind his personal faith on brethren who do not share his scruples or opinions. “Let every one be fully convinced in his own mind” (verse 5); “The faith that you have, keep between yourself and God” (verse 22); “Who are you to pass judgment on the servant of another?” (verse 4); “Then let us no more pass judgment on one another” (verse 13). This entire chapter was written for the specific purpose of teaching us how to honor those “for whom Christ died” (verse 15) and who differ with us. It is a treatise on how to preserve unity in spite of diversity. Our good brother employs one verse in it to completely offset everything for which the apostle contended. That which was given as an instrument of unity becomes a weapon of division and dishonor.

Brother Thomas says, “One of Brother Ketcherside’s basic fallacies in this whole matter, I think, is his argument that he is reported to make that: ‘Full fellowship does not mean endorsement.’” The report of my argument is incorrect. All of the words are correct but they are misplaced. My argument is not that “full fellowship does not mean endorsement,” but rather that “fellowship does not mean full endorsement.” Fellowship in Christ is created by the Holy Spirit. Endorsement is an act of the mind by which one sanctions that which he approves. I do not fully sanction any brother in all he says or does, for to do so would be to give perfect endorsement to an imperfect being. The only persons on earth with whom I have been in fellowship (except the Spirit), are all imperfect. I am in the fellowship with them, not because of their perfection, but in spite of their imperfections.

If my brother is correct in his contention that “fellowship does constitute endorsement” I am guilty of a basic fallacy. I know that it must seem presumptuous for me, with my meager knowledge and ability, to even imply that the fallacy rests with Brother Thomas. Very humbly do I submit that I think he is mistaken. I doubt that any of our readers would deny that the apostle Paul was in fellowship with the saints at Corinth. He positively states that they had been “called into the fellowship” (1 Cor. 1:9). He calls them “my children” (4:14) and tells them, “I became your father in Christ Jesus through the gospel” (4:15). He declares that they constitute “the body of Christ” (12:27) and that God’s Spirit dwells in them (3:16).

In the language of our brother, Paul wanted to “buddy-up” with the congregation and associate with them. He wanted to worship with them with “some degree of regularity.” He said, “I will visit you after passing through Macedonia . . . and perhaps I will stay with you or even spend the winter” (16:5, 6). He declared, “I do not want to see you now just in passing; I hope to spend some time with you if the Lord permits” (16:7). Not only did Paul want to be with them, but he encouraged other brethren to visit them. “As for our brother Apollos, I strongly urged him to visit you with the other brethren” (16:12). He sent Timothy and wrote, “When Timothy comes, see that you put him at ease among you” (16:10).

Was such association in the fellowship an indication of endorsement? Did Paul endorse the denominational parties (1:11, 12); the arrogance in the face of immorality (5:2); the lawsuits against each other in heathen courts (6:1-8); the injudicious conduct of the sisters (11:5); the abuse of the love feast (11:18); and the disorderly conduct in public services? In all of my experience I have never yet found a congregation of disciples in the sad state of the one at Corinth. If my brethren of today had been in Paul’s place they would have rented the Odd Fellows Hall, on the corner of Tenth and Main in Corinth, and started a “loyal church” before next Sunday. Instead of urging young preachers to visit such a place, they would have urged them not to go near it, and would have “withdrawn” from those who did go. It has been done you know!

What was Paul's attitude? He simply acknowledged that because these were the called saints they were in the fellowship. He repeatedly called them "brethren." He commended them in every area where he could (11:2) and in those areas where he could not be said, "But in the following instructions I do not commend you" (11:17). I think that we need to face up to some real questions in the divided state of the "restoration brotherhood" and I would like to suggest a few queries to the non-instrument brethren with whom I am more directly associated and who cannot even associate with "brethren in the Christian Church" because "they have corrupted the worship."

Were those who composed the congregation at Corinth "brethren in error"? Is it any worse to "corrupt" one phase of public worship than another? Is it any worse to "corrupt" the song service than it would be to "corrupt" the Lord's Supper? Can a congregation be any worse by having an instrument play when they come together than one of which it was said, "When you come together it is not for the better but for the worse"? Can a congregation "corrupt the worship" more by having someone play on an instrument while they sing, than one of which it is affirmed, "When you meet together, it is not the Lord's Supper that you eat"? If you had lived in the days of Paul would you have accompanied him to the congregation at Corinth? Would you have "fellowshipped them" as our brethren so quaintly phrase it? Would you have associated with them with "any degree of regularity"?

Lately, under pressure and to save their modern theory of fellowship, I have heard brethren affirm that they would no longer "fellowship" Alexander Campbell, Barton W. Stone, or David Lipscomb. Will they now become modern Ebionites and cast Paul into the discard as well? The stark truth is that our brethren would have divided almost every congregation mentioned in the new covenant scriptures, and filled the ancient world, as they have the modern one, with dissident factions, all claiming to be "the Lord's church." Perhaps we need again the admonition to Corinth, “Brethren, do not be children in your thinking; be babes in evil but in thinking be mature” (14:20).

Is not “commendation” equivalent to endorsement or sanction? If so when Paul wrote, “I do not commend you,” did he mean that he was no longer in “fellowship” with the “beloved brethren”? If he could stay with and “even spend the winter” with brethren who did things he could not commend or endorse, why can we not visit such folk “with the other brethren”?

Beloved brethren, our attitude of partisan exclusivism is not consistent with our plea for unity as made to the religious world around us. Let us repair the breaks in the restoration wall and cement the rents in the fabric of brotherhood. Let us make character the test of worthiness among our brethren and cease to mistake conformity for unity. Let us meet upon our knees and beseech God to help us restore that which we seem to lack most — respect and regard for each other in Christ Jesus. We cannot untie ourselves into unity, fracture ourselves into fraternity, nor cudgel ourselves into comity.

If I have extended these remarks to too great a limit, please forgive me. I have an earnest desire to be understood and my lack of ability in expression may require more space for clarification than you deem justifiable. I am grateful for the patience of those who have read thus far. I appreciate the friendly spirit exhibited by Brother Thomas in his article. I revere and respect him as my brother in the Lord Jesus. I apologize for any apparent harshness which may appear in my reply and close with the fervent prayer that we may find the way to a greater and nobler peace. If I thought that we must achieve unity upon our own I would despair of ever attaining to it, but because I believe that the Holy Spirit is actively at work in this world to answer the prayer of Jesus, I hold no fear about the outcome. “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all.”

Confusion of Tongues

Mission Messenger (April 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

The attempt to recapture a proper sense of fellowship among heirs of the “restoration movement” is hampered by the fact that it is now a semantic, as well as a spiritual problem. Brethren not only do not know what fellowship is but they do not know what it is not. They confuse fellowship with a great many other things to which it is not related, or in which the relation is remote and indirect. This only adds to the complexity and confusion of our day and hampers and hinders any serious effort toward genuine restoration.

It is not enough to use the words of the Spirit but we must employ them in the same way as did the divine Agent. We must not only “speak where the Bible speaks” but we must “speak as the Bible speaks.” It will gain us little if we condemn the modernist who denies the meaning of the scriptural terms while at the same time we define them in such a manner as to lose their significance. One can forfeit the truth by carelessness as surely as he can defeat it by conspiracy.

The word “profane” has as one of its meanings, “to debase by a wrong, unworthy, or vulgar use.” “To debase” means to reduce from a higher to a lower state or grade, as in dignity, quality, purity, value, etc. It is possible that we have fallen into indiscreet and improper use of the sacred word “fellowship” and have profaned it. If so, we need to correct our vocabulary and lessen “the confusion of tongues” which keeps us scattered abroad and separated from each other. We have repeatedly pointed out that the Holy Spirit does not equate fellowship in Christ Jesus with absolute conformity in opinion, knowledge, or interpretation. To do so would be to render fellowship impossible among finite and fallible individuals.

It is just as necessary that we realize that much of what is called “fellowship” in these days is not fellowship at all. It has become all too common for brethren to announce that “After the service we will retire to the lounge in the educational building for a period of fellowship.” Those who remain and retire will find that “fellowship” consists of getting a cup of coffee and a doughnut or cupcake and standing around informally chatting about this or that light topic as a relief from the “heavy” sermon previously delivered. This brings up a question. Those brethren who bitterly oppose my suggestion that all sincere immersed believers are in the fellowship, will invite the whole audience to share in the “period of fellowship” after the service. Does this mean that when the unimmersed remain at their invitation and share in the coffee and doughnuts at their insistence, that they “fellowship” them, as they use the term? Or, do they keep their fingers crossed when they pass the coffee to “an outsider.”

“Fellowship” as the Spirit uses the term is not something you turn on and off periodically. If the brethren were not enjoying fellowship during the service, what they do after the service will not be fellowship either. It will be coffee and doughnuts they partake of and not fellowship! So widespread has this misconception become that a lot of folk have forgotten that fellowship is a state of the heart and not of the stomach. Paul was as much in the fellowship when he suffered “through great endurance, in afflictions, hardships, calamities . . . hunger” (2 Cor. 6:4, 5), as when he wrote, “I am filled, having received from Epaphroditus the gifts you sent” (Phil. 4:18). He had learned “the secret of facing plenty and hunger, abundance and want” (Phil. 4:12) without the fellowship being affected one bit.

A feeling of sadness comes over me when I visit brethren who pay lipservice to restoration and then want to show me through “the sanctuary” and “the fellowship hall.” They are wrong on both counts. Instead of restoring the ancient order they have borrowed the first expression from the Roman Catholic Church and the second from the Protestant sectarian world. The only sanctuary God has on this earth today is the consecrated heart of a believer. Here is where the Holy Spirit dwells and not in temples made with men’s hands. Wherever a Christian is there is the temple of God. It was well for the poets of Judaism to say, “I was glad when they said to me, ‘Let us go up to the house of our God,’” but now we are the house of God. We do not go to the house of God, it is the house of God that does the going!

Christianity has no sacred places, no sacred days, no sacred rituals. Men can no more erect a “fellowship hall” than they can create “a sanctuary” from bricks and mortar. If we are in Christ Jesus we are in the fellowship regardless of where we may be. Paul was in the fellowship with the saints when he was in the Roman prison and they were in the fellowship with him. Mind you, I am not objecting to the erection of meetinghouses in which the saints may gather about the table of the Lord, nor am I opposing the gathering of the same saints around a table spread with the physical comforts of life. I only say that to confuse the great and majestic concept of “the fellowship of the Spirit” with such occasions and to feel that it is limited and confined to such times is to profane the word.

I seriously question the usage by the saints of such expressions as “a fellowship meeting,” “men’s fellowship,” “women’s fellowship,” “youth fellowship,” etc. The koinonia into which we are called of God cannot be divided, parceled out, or segregated in such a manner. None of these are scriptural expressions nor do I believe there are scriptural terms for the ideas they represent or convey. The fellowship is a creation of the Spirit and there is but one Spirit. There is not a men’s Spirit, a woman's Spirit, and a youth's Spirit. When I meet with the brothers in a special meeting I am as much in the fellowship with the sisters and young people who are not there as with the men who are. There is only one fellowship because there is only one body. There are no separate "brotherhoods" in our Lord.

Every meeting of the disciples is a fellowship meeting just as every such meeting is a communion service. When brethren meet to sing, pray and study together on Wednesday night they have a communion service as certainly as when they gather about the Lord's table on the Lord's Day. The breaking of the bread is not the communion of the saints. It is just one phase of it. Whatever we do in union of heart and purpose is part of our communion with each other, because it is done within the framework of brotherhood. When we fragmentize and departmentalize our lives and Christian experience and designate that which is done "after the regular service" as fellowship—equating it with coffeemakers, "Coke" machines, or chocolate covered cupcakes— we profane the word "fellowship" and postpone the recovery of the spirit of the early saints of God.

Have we become inoculated with the spirit of this age until a call to genuine restoration is an offence? Do we really want to restore the word of truth to a place of authority in our lives, or will we heed it only in those areas where it does not cut across our thinking and practice? It will be exceedingly difficult to restore a true sense of fellowship until brethren know what it is that needs to be restored. May we all be humbled to the extent that we shall answer the call of God with the words, "Speak Lord, thy servant heareth."

The Making of History

Mission Messenger (May 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

It is our personal conviction that history is being made among the heirs of “the restoration movement” in these days. We do not believe that future chroniclers can fail to take note of things which are now transpiring. After almost a century of schism and division, of debate and dissension, hundreds are beginning to hope the trend will be reversed. There are inspiring signs that the party spirit is losing sway over the hearts of men and the Holy Spirit is working mightily within our generation to promote and produce peace. To this revival of the spirit of unity we have been devoting our feeble talents and dedicating our meager efforts.

It is not easy to oppose a traditional attitude. All of us are averse to change. We are afraid of the unfamiliar. We shrink from the shock of modification of that which is hallowed by repeated practice. Some of the things we have been saying about fellowship and unity seem strange to the ears of those who have equated these with conformity and uniformity of opinion. They regard us as traitors to the cause. They think of us as enemies of “the Lord’s church.” It seems to us that you should be informed of this and should know what actions are being taken by us to placate and find common ground with our dissenting brethren. We are not working under cover and what we do is not being done in a corner. We shall share with you in this issue only one phase of the opposition.

The Firm Foundation is a respectable journal of wide circulation within the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood. It is edited by our genial and esteemed brother in the faith, Reuel Lemmons. Universally acclaimed for his knowledge and ability, his editorials are read with avid interest by thousands. His speeches and writings wield a powerful force in shaping thought and directing attitudes. His periodical provides a dynamic vantage ground for disseminating his views.

It was about a year ago in his issue of April 3, 1962, that our distinguished brother directed an editorial against my position. The title was “Blind in One Eye” and in it he charged that I had completely lost sight of any former truth I held. He said, “He has swung from the extreme of the narrowest of sectarian spirits to the broadest cover-everything-stand-for-nothing liberalism.” He described the plea that I make as “insidious error,” “gross error,” and “rank liberalism.” He declared that it stemmed from “an erroneous premise” and said in his closing sentence, “Brother Ketcherside is blind in one eye — and if the blind lead the blind they both will fall into the ditch.”

In the intervening months as other articles directed against me were published, brethren who read Firm Foundation urged that I write my brother-editor and ask permission to state my views and reply to some of the things being said. I resisted the impulse to do so, contenting myself in publishing notice of the articles and urging the brethren to read them. Finally, at the suggestion of a number of younger preaching brethren in Texas and California, I wrote Brother Lemmons, on November 16, 1962, as follows:

My dear brother in HIM: Recently in Firm Foundation a number of articles have appeared in which my name has been mentioned repeatedly. These articles have not been in review (except incidentally) of things which I have written in MISSION MESSENGER, but have purportedly been directed toward examination of a Concourse on Unity in which I was invited to participate as one of the speakers in Denver, Colorado.

A goodly number of readers who are your friends and mine have suggested that I should request permission from you to set forth my views in Firm Foundation so that your readers may be informed of the things for which I contend. The articles which have been offered have not always represented me correctly. If you will permit me to file with you four articles on the subject of fellowship and related issues, I shall make no reference to any brother now living, but will deal with the matters purely as I see them. I will conduct myself as a gentleman and will write in love.

If you will allow me to write and state my own conviction in the same paper which has so often referred to me by name, will you inform me of the maximum length of article which is acceptable? Should there be any doubt about advisability of printing four such articles will you leave it to your readers as to whether or not I should be heard? Enclosed you will find a stamped envelope for reply. With best wishes to you and yours, I am, Yours and HIS. — W. Carl Ketcherside.

To the foregoing, our brother sent the following very gracious reply under date of November 27, 1962:

Dear Brother Ketcherside: In reply to your letter of November 16, I want to say that I will be happy to allow you to be heard in the pages of the Firm Foundation. I think you should be. You know no editor would commit himself unequivocally until he has seen the material you wish to present, but I know of no reason why it should not be welcomed.

Brother Ketcherside, your letter indicates that you feel you have been misrepresented in references to you in articles in the Firm Foundation. If you write these articles, I will expect you to point out where and how you have been misrepresented. I shall expect them to cite the quotations which misrepresented you, and show that either (A) You made no such statement. (B) That the quotation is taken out of context. (C) That it has been given a meaning contrary to your own. (D) Explain what you did mean by the quotation.

Brother Ketcherside, you and I know that you could make in the Firm Foundation a very wonderful gesture saying a lot of good things and things which all of us believe. These things are well to say all right, but they leave the impression that anyone who would differ with you is out of his head. There are, I think, some very valid grounds for differences, and while one might agree with you on all the good things you could say, I shall not expect you to use the Firm Foundation for the same purpose as you use the MISSION MESSENGER. I will be happy to allow you to be heard concerning anything in which you think you have been misrepresented, but I would want you to deal with those points. That, of course, does not limit the articles to those things only, but it would not be profitable to give the articles entirely to things all sensible Christians thoroughly agree without facing up to the things on which we disagree.

As to the length of the articles, they should not exceed three pages double spaced with fairly narrow margins as this is what is required for one page in the Firm Foundation. I try to limit, as you know, articles in the Firm Foundation to one page in length.

I leave immediately for South America and will be returning December 20, if you need that information. Yours in the Faith, Reuel Lemmons.

I prepared the first two articles which I titled "The Scattered Flock" and "Walking Together." On December 20, I mailed them with this letter:

My dear Reuel: "Grace, mercy and peace, be unto you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.”

According to your gracious letter of November 27, this is the day upon which you planned to arrive home from your long and arduous journey. I have been praying that His providence would so coincide with your program as to enable you to carry it out upon schedule, and I will be deeply grateful when I learn that such was the case. Realizing that you are returning to a desk piled high with mail, I am reluctant to offer a lengthy reply to yours of November 27, yet “I beseech you, of your clemency, to hear of me these few words” which I send in conjunction with the first two articles I am submitting.

I have sought to place myself in your position as editor and have written accordingly. It has been my intention to conform to the suggestions and restrictions set forth in your letter, without engaging in any reflection upon the brethren who have so frequently spread my name upon the pages of your esteemed journal. I want to lessen tensions, not promote them; to plead for peace and not for personal vindication. You suggest the possibility of my using the paper in such a manner that I would leave the impression that anyone who would differ with me was out of his head. To avoid any accusation of ulterior motive, I have tried to be frank and positive while, at the same time, maintaining that attitude of courtesy and restraint which seems to me to best become the profession we make.

Reuel, it is not necessary that you concur with what I write to be revered and respected as my brother in Him who died for the sins of us both. I love you very dearly in Him, and I want to labor with you, as you can permit in good conscience, to promote His will on earth as it is done in heaven. Because I am answerable unto Him I must be free in regard to conviction, and I am certainly willing to allow you the same freedom I claim for myself. There are areas of difference between us but there is nothing which either of us holds which is as important as the blood He shed and His love which holds us both.

I am not editing a rival journal to Firm Foundation. I would not expect to use your paper for the same purpose that I use MISSION MESSENGER. I am fully cognizant that we serve different areas and segments and that there will be some conflicts. But the circle of His love is great enough to encompass both of us with our respective missions without our being rivals. For that reason I cordially invite you to feel free at any time to submit any article which you deem to be profitable for the readers of our little periodical. We will gladly give it our earnest consideration. I recognize how meager and feeble is our effort in contrast with your own, but each of us must labor in the sphere and role in which divine destiny has cast him. I find it no problem at all to rejoice with joy unspeakable in that greater realm of service to which you have been called.

I shall, within the week, submit two additional articles, to make up the four to which I referred in my previous letter. I trust that they will meet the requirement for publication even though they may not merit your approval in content. Allow me to wish for you a happy and prosperous coming year and with very sincere good wishes and prayers for you and yours, to be as ever, Yours and HIS, Carl.

Within the next week I prepared the next two articles under the titles “The Concerned Ones,” and “Receive Him Not Into Your House.” These I mailed on December 29, with the following letter:

My dear brother in HIM: “Grace, mercy and peace, be unto you from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.”

I have the honor, through your courtesy and graciousness, to submit the other two articles about which I wrote to you earlier. I have sought to present these in such a spirit as would commend them to your consideration and that of your readers, even those who will disagree with what I have written. It has been my intention to imitate the apostle in giving “no offense to the church of God.”

You will recognize at once, I am sure, that these articles can lay no claim to greatness, either as respects content or literary method. I do not have the poignant power of expression, nor possess the trenchant pen, with which you have been blessed. I do have a great love for all of my brethren in the Lord who will be reading these things through your gratuitous spirit, and unseen and unknown as they will be to me, I pray ever so eagerly and earnestly as I post these to you that somehow, someway, the Holy Spirit may take this feeble effort and use it to the furtherance of His kingdom among men.

It may seem to you presumptuous that I should again suggest to you that if you ever have anything you should like to address to our readers the opportunity is tendered to you to do so, in love. I realize the fact full well that our little journal is quite insignificant in every way in comparison to Firm Foundation, and when I read of journals edited by the brethren which seek to increase their circulation by some 25,000 names, I think how honored I would feel if that were our total circulation. However, there is a possibility that we may reach a different audience than you do, small though it may seem to you, and if your heart burns within you with a message which you should like to convey to these which represent many different factions and segments of the Christian realm, I will be pleased to offer them what you have to say which will draw us closer to the divine ideal.

One word more. I trust there will be no serious repercussion from any because you have allowed me to be heard in your columns. It is my prayer that His Spirit will so infect our beings with the attitude of equity and mercy that we shall become increasingly more willing to hear each other as time goes on. I close with the hope that the divine blessing shall be granted you in the coming year, and that all of us will be drawn a little closer to each other by being drawn closer unto HIM. May His grace sustain you in all good things unto His glory. Carl.

A good many weeks elapsed after I sent the first two articles, and finally on February 9, I received them all back, with the following letter:

Dear Brother Ketcherside: I have had your articles for a month now, and have studied them carefully. The more I study them the plainer it is that you have not complied with the second paragraph or my letter of November 27.

I am returning them to you. In the first place, you can write a much better series of articles. In the second place, these do not deal directly with the criticisms of you; but rather, state a host of good things with most of which every fair-minded person in the brotherhood would agree. On most of the points upon which you touched, you have never been criticized.

In accord with the third paragraph of my letter, I am still willing for you to be heard through the Firm Foundation. Both I and others have had critical things to say of your position. I most assuredly would not deny you the right of answering your critics. But when your articles appear in the Firm Foundation, I want them to be an attempt at least to answer your critics. If you wish to answer the "charges frequently made" in accord with paragraph 2 of my letter, then I will gladly give the space.

The articles I am returning leave the impression that some minor little points are, at most, all brethren could criticize you for. I will gladly give you space to say that you do not believe the things you have been charged with believing, and that you do not hold the positions you are charged with holding. All the brotherhood would be glad to see that.

The door is still open in accord with my former letter. Yours in the Faith, Reuel Lemmons.

On the same day that I received the articles back, I again wrote to my esteemed brother as follows:

My dear brother in HIM: Thank you for your graciousness in returning the manuscripts. Due to the long interval elapsing I was reconciled to the fact that you did not intend to publish them, and was awaiting a communication stating why you would refuse to do so.

I have also carefully studied them again and the more I do so, the plainer it becomes that I did comply with the second paragraph of your letter of November 27. I set forth quotations which misrepresented me and I showed (1) that they were given a meaning contrary to my own; (2) I explained what I meant by the quotation. In the instance of the last article I actually answered a question proposed by a brother who was writing about my position on 2 John 9, 10. I feel quite certain that my articles did deal directly with criticisms of me and of my position.

Brother Lemmons, I sought in an amicable spirit to answer my critics within the space you gave me. It seems obvious that I must allow you to determine the nature of the defence I make, if I am to be heard in the columns of Firm Foundation. I cannot allow you to write my articles for they must be expressions of my own heart and life. I sought to make those I submitted just that, and wrote the best that I knew how to write.

I think the most significant statement in your last letter is that the articles I submitted "state a host of good things with most of which every fair-minded person in the brotherhood would agree. On most of the points upon which you touched, you have never been criticized." It is a genuine pleasure to me to know that these articles generally represent the thinking of the fair-minded members of the brotherhood, and hereafter when I find brethren disagreeing with most of what I expressed in the articles I shall conclude that they are not “fair-minded persons” by your definition.

May the grace of God, the love of the Lord Jesus, and the fellowship of the Spirit, abide with you and yours is the humble prayer of yours and His, Carl.

We are taking the liberty of presenting the articles rejected by our brother. We do this for several reasons. (1) We want the brethren who urged us to write to the Firm Foundation to know that we tried and to see what we submitted. While we regret that readers of the Firm Foundation will not see our replies, we believe that our own readers are entitled to see them. (2) Brother Lemmons says that these “state a host of good things” and we would not want you to be deprived of any good thing contained in them. (3) Our good brother also states that “every fair-minded person in the brotherhood would agree” with most of the things they contain, so they can be considered as a statement in general (not in every particular) of those things for which Brother Lemmons and other fair-minded brethren would contend. (4) The material covered in these articles is evaluated by our brother as containing “some minor little points” which have never been the subject of criticism. You will observe that the first article deals with the nature of fellowship, the second with a controversial Old Testament scripture, the third with the nature of the church, and the fourth with a controversial New Testament scripture.

For the benefit of our readers who would like to subscribe for the Firm Foundation, let us mention that the mailing address is Post Office Box 77, Austin 61, Texas. The subscription price is four dollars per year in advance, and the paper is issued weekly. We are certain that the editor would appreciate your reaction to the articles.

In recent months we have made it a subject of our entreaty at the throne of mercy that we might be so guided and influenced by the indwelling Spirit as to allow our “speech to be always seasoned with salt so that we may know how to give answer to every man.” If we have fallen short of the ideal in this issue, will you please forgive us and join in prayer that we may grow in grace as well as in knowledge of the truth. We want to do unto others as we would have them do unto us. We can best serve our Father by being kind to His other children. Pray for us that we may be fair and just to all.

The Scattered Flock

Mission Messenger (May 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

For several months in the immediate past my name has appeared frequently in the pages of Firm Foundation as various brethren have taken issue with my views on fellowship and the unity of believers in our Lord Jesus Christ. In one article, appearing in the issue of November 27, 1962, it was charged among other things too numerous to mention, that I am fathering a new sect; that I profess to travel the way of love for all and fellowship for any error; that I use, almost exclusively, the Authentic Version of the New Testament, by Schonfield; that I think I am another “Campbell,” etc. At the suggestion of many interested brethren I have made application to the editor and my esteemed brother in the Lord, Reuel Lemmons, for permission to submit four articles in which I shall briefly state some of my own views. To this he has graciously consented within certain limitations and restraints which I will earnestly attempt to observe and respect.

The statements I make will not be dogmatic or arbitrary. I will love and revere those who cannot concur with my expressions as much as I do those who agree. The readers of this journal have a right to know what one advocates who is publicly charged within its pages after the manner referred to above. I shall come directly to the point. It is my conviction that all sectarianism is sin. It is the party spirit as translated in Galatians 5:20 (RSV) and is a work of the flesh. It will debar from inheritance in the kingdom of God. Instead of fathering a new sect I am dedicated to the destruction of all sects by grubbing out the root from which they grow—the party spirit.

The church of God is no sect, and no sect is the church of God. But we have become sectarian in our attitude. Our very usage of the term “Church of Christ” as employed to designate, in an exclusive sense, merely that segment of God’s people who do not employ instrumental music in the corporate worship, is sectarian. Every child of God on earth is in the church of Christ, but not every such child is in the “Church of Christ.” “As many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ” but not all of these have been gathered into one corral. God’s sheep are a scattered flock, and not yet a gathered one. Some of them are caught in strange sectarian thickets. I shall gain nothing by denying that they belong to Him, or by assailing them because of the unfortunate chain of circumstances in life which led them into their present association.

I suffer from no illusions about being “another Campbell.” I know how very meager is my approach to our problems and how feeble is my ability. I freely confess my own factional attitude in the past and I am ashamed of it. I am thankful to be one of the humbler heirs of the restoration which Alexander Campbell said was “a project to unite the Christians in all the sects.” I do not consider that project as completed. Instead, we have fragmented the restoration movement until in many cities there are a dozen or more different kinds of “The Church of Christ.” Each of these proclaims itself to be “the loyal church” and refuses to call upon those from another splinter group to address the Father in their public meetings. In our present divided state, no segment or faction is “the faithful church” to the exclusion of all others. There are some in every segment who are as faithful as they know how to be; there are some in each who are a disgrace to their profession.

Our present state is the result of a mistaken concept of fellowship. Fellowship is not endorsement. Paul did not endorse the attitudes or conditions at Corinth but he was in fellowship with those who constituted the church of God. Bad as they were, they were recruits from the pagan realm who had pledged allegiance to Jesus Christ. They were His representatives in spite of their human defects. The apostle called them saints, brethren, babes in Christ, God's building, God's temple, and beloved children—all in the first four chapters in which he deals with their divisive tendencies. He does this for the simple reason that they had been "called into the fellowship" (1 Cor. 1:9). Fellowship is that state or condition into which we are called by the gospel (2 Thess. 2:13, 14). As regards our relationship unto God, it is sonship; as regards our relationship to one another, it is brotherhood.

Every sincere believer in the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus, who has been immersed in validation of that faith, is God's child and my brother. He is a member of the one body by an act of God. He may, through ignorance, environment, previous training, or other cause, affiliate himself with something else, believing that in so doing he can best demonstrate his allegiance to the Lord. This does not mean he is no longer a Christian, but it may mean he is a Christian in an organization God does not sanction. A Christian is one "in Christ" and such a person in the United States, like some of those in Christ at Corinth, may be in a party of his own choosing. He is my brother in spite of this and I need to regard him as such, even as I deplore the partisan walls behind which he seeks refuge.

I am not, of course, pleading for "fellowship of any error." Fellowship is a relationship between persons. Our spiritual fellowship is the result of the indwelling Spirit. It is called "the fellowship of the Spirit" (Phil. 2:12; 2 Cor. 13:14). There is but one Spirit and if that Spirit dwells in me, I am united through Christ, with everyone else in whom that Spirit abides. The Holy Spirit does not recognize our artificial lines or barriers. He is neither factional nor sectional. He dwells in none of us because we are free from all error; he sanctions no error at all of those in whom he dwells. It is unthinkable that I should avow love for one of my brothers in the Lord and then refuse to call upon him to pray to our Father, simply because he does not agree with me about the millennium, instrumental music, cups, classes, colleges, fermented wine, breaking the bread, uninspired literature, charitable institutions, national television programs, or all that motley host of things which have shivered us to bits.

Every child of God is my brother. I may not approve of where he is or of all that he thinks. I am not obligated to love the things he does or the opinions he holds, but I am obligated to love him because he is my brother and is, therefore, in the fellowship of which I am a part, through the grace of God. That love must not be “in word or speech but in deed and in truth” (1 John 3:18). To deny fraternity is an insult to our mutual paternity. It is a reflection against Him who is “the God and Father of us all.”

I must be tolerant toward my brethren who honestly differ with my views and interpretations. Tolerance is not endorsing things that are wrong but enduring those who think they are right!

Walking Together

Mission Messenger (May 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

“Can two walk together except they be agreed?” (Amos 3:3). Although the prophet Amos was not even remotely referring to fellowship, the subject is seldom discussed in these days without this passage being introduced. This has become a traditional text for sermons on unity, although those who so use it are pleading for conformity under the mistaken impression that it constitutes unity. In the issue of November 27, 1962, a brother in Christ referring to me, wrote, “His interpretation of many texts, Amos 3:3 as an example, is at variance with many of the best and most capable scholars of the past and present.”

For more than five years before I wrote the first series of articles under the heading “Thoughts on Fellowship” I did voluminous research on the meaning of every passage I had previously used to justify my own factional position. No passage received more attention than the one now under review. I did not find a single scholar of reputation, either past or contemporary, who sanctioned the interpretation current among our preaching brethren. The mere reading of other versions than the King James, or even a careful study of the context, will demonstrate how far afield we roam in our attempt to find scriptural backing for pre-conceived notions.

Common experience teaches that two can walk together who disagree about many things. In my father’s family there were six children. We did not always agree with each other or with our parents, but we did not destroy or dissolve the family relationship. Frequently a husband and wife disagree, and seriously so, yet they maintain their unity. I walk with many with whom I disagree on some matters of scriptural interpretation. If I did not, I would not walk with any, for I have yet to meet the person who sees everything as I do. There is not a congregation on the earth in which all of the members agree, but many of them walk and work together in harmony.

We are all willing to allow for wide divergency and disagreement except in the thing which is made the party test. This constitutes our unwritten creed and around it we construct our partisan walls. If it is an interpretation of Revelation 20, we will not walk together with those who do not agree on this point. If we belong to a post-millennial party we must proscribe and hound out those who do not concur. We will tolerate great areas of difference about the meaning of other chapters without dissolving partnership, but all must agree upon this one. If we belong to a pre-millennial party we cannot walk with those who are not agreed. Regardless of how spotless or stainless the character of a person may be, this counts for nothing unless he can bend and bring his mind into submission to the party norm. The same can be said of every partisan test of “fellowship” whether it be cups, classes, colleges, charitable institutions, or whatever else has been allowed to drive us into rival camps.

The ancient prophet was not writing to provide for us a basis of fellowship in Christ Jesus. He was a humble herdsman, summoned from his daily labor to carry the message of God to the luxury-loving and profligate court of Jeroboam II, ruler of the ten tribe kingdom of Israel. It was necessary to justify his reason for being at Bethel, in the king’s sanctuary. This he does by a remarkable speech on the topic of cause and effect. He asks a series of questions about matters with which his hearers are familiar. The one under consideration is the first in this sequence (3:3-8). The RSV correctly translates it, “Do two walk together, unless they have made an appointment?”

A lion roaring in the forest indicates he has found prey. A young lion snarling in his den indicates he has food. A bird falling in a snare signifies the trigger was set. A snare suddenly springing up from the ground indicates the presence of an intruder. People in a city, running in panic, indicates the trumpet has sounded an alarm. Two persons walking together is an indication they have made an appointment. By the same token, the presence of a prophet in a community, is proof that God has a message for the people who reside there, since “the Lord God does nothing without revealing his secret to his servants the prophets” (verse 7). “The Lord God has spoken; who can but prophesy?” It is as natural for the true prophet to speak what God reveals as for a lion to roar in the forest when he has taken prey.

The word “agreed” is from the Hebrew yaad, a primitive root, defined by Strong’s Exhaustive Concordance, “To fix upon (by agreement or appointment); by implication to meet (at a stated time), to summon (to trial), to direct (in a certain quarter or position), to engage (for marriage).” The expression has nothing to do with intellectual or philosophic conformity. When you saw two people walking together you could assume they had made a prior appointment. They had simply agreed to meet but the purpose of the meeting was not under consideration. They might have met to discuss their differences as they walked together.

In our thickly populated areas one might easily run into an acquaintance and walk along with him. Amos did not live in such an area. J. R. Dummelow, M.A., translates with the words, “have an appointment,” and says, “If two people were seen walking together in the desolate regions with which Amos was familiar it might be assumed they had not met by chance. Nothing happens by chance. There is a reason and a cause for Israel’s calamities.”

We have rendered this passage in such a manner as to promote and defend schism and division among sincere brethren who could not conscientiously conform to the party norm. We have been betrayed into the false philosophy that doctrinal purity can be secured only by separation from brethren. Our fallacious thinking has led us to the point that we conceive of but one ultimate aim when differences arise— division; and but one universal attempt at solution when division comes— partisan debate. If we continue this reckless course we will divide ourselves out of existence.

I can walk together with those with whom I do not agree. I have resolved to make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. If the Father can accept me into His fellowship in spite of my frailties, failures, and limited knowledge, I can recognize all others who are in His fellowship on the same basis. If they are good enough to walk with Him they are not too bad for me to walk with them. I can even walk together with those who disagree with me about the meaning of agree. Our unity is in Christ Jesus. He is our peace. I have resolved to walk together with all who are in Him in spite of our differences!

The Concerned Ones

Mission Messenger (May 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

There is only one church on earth. There never was but one, there will never be another. The church is a divine organism. It is not a human organization. It is the body of Christ and every saved person on earth is a member of it. There is really no such thing as The Baptist Church, The Methodist Church, or The Presbyterian Church. These are parties created by men. They have been divisive because they are the outgrowth of the party spirit. Neither is there any such thing as The Christian Church, The Church of God, or The Church of Christ. There are parties wearing these titles, among the believers in Christ, but the church of God is greater than any of them and more majestic than all of them put together.

No sect, faction, or segment now in existence, can lay claim to exclusive possession of all the saints of God within its ranks. The Lord's church cannot be numbered. No census bureau can enumerate its adherents. Such a bureau can catalog the number of members affiliated with the various parties and can publish the statistics of such parties for comparative purposes, but only the Lord knoweth all that are His. We delude ourselves when we refer to the group of believers with which we are affiliated as "the Lord's church" to the exclusion of all others. This great truth, acknowledged and defended by all of our restoration forefathers is now labeled "liberalism" and branded as "new doctrine." This is an indication of how sectarian we have become in the past few decades.

It is our growing sectarian attitude which makes it impossible for us to appreciate the magnificent scope of the kingdom of heaven, and renders our radio pleas for unity ineffective and invalid. Many of us are not really appealing for a unity of believers in Christ at all. We are simply trying to get everyone else to join our party. We confuse “the unity of the Spirit” with uniformity of interpretation and conformity in opinion. The day is past when such a puerile approach will make any impact upon the hearts of thinking people. There is a great yearning for oneness which cuts across all artificial barriers. The sheep of God, scattered over the sectarian hills, are lifting up their heads and hearing once again the call of the Shepherd for a closer walk with God— and a closer walk with men of a kindred spirit.

I think an injustice is done to my own feeble effort to promote “peace upon earth among men of good will” because of my apparent inability to communicate effectively my true convictions to my brethren. This gives rise to such statements as the following which appeared in Firm Foundation, November 27, 1962:

The creed advocates tolerance, fellowship, brotherhood, compromise, amalgamation and finally a loose federation with ‘Christians of all denominations.’ It is presently being called ‘the fellowship of the concerned,’ a term that appears often in Bro. Carl’s paper. Carl admits by his slogan, that he will reject the ‘unconcerned.’ He is therefore not in fellowship with all his brethren— some are not concerned with his new hobby.

I overlook the use of the term “hobby” because I have long ago learned that in our parlance a sectarian is one who has something we oppose, and a hobbyist is one who opposes something we have. I oppose our limited, provincial and traditional view of fellowship and its equation with endorsement.

I consider it to be divisive and factional. But I am in the fellowship with all of my brethren, even those who are not immediately concerned with my plea for oneness. Fellowship is brotherhood, and I can no more choose my spiritual brothers than I could my fleshly ones. Brotherhood is a product of mutual fatherhood.

I borrowed the expression “fellowship of the concerned ones” from Dr. Elton Trueblood. It relates to those in every faction, fragment, sect and segment, whose vision reaches beyond their partisan walls and whose horizon is not defined by traditional lines. This does not mean that the concerned ones are unconcerned about “the unconcerned.” I love and cherish all of my brethren whether they concur in my concerns or not. But it is only the concerned ones who will do anything tangible to relieve the scandal of division and alleviate the tragedy of schism. I think that the Holy Spirit is motivating the hearts of these all over the world to re-evaluate their positions in the light of God’s revelation. And I have something in common with all who are concerned about the problem of religious division. I love all of these and I propose to go among them whenever a door is opened unto me and lift up my voice with theirs in a plea for restoration of the spirit of the primitive saints of God.

I do advocate “tolerance, fellowship and brotherhood,” but I do not advocate “compromise, amalgamation and finally a loose federation with Christians of all denominations.” Instead, I advocate the destruction and abolition of all sectarian and denominational tendencies as being inimical to the eternal purpose of God. I simply plead for a recognition that there are Christians in the sects. God’s family is not all united in a practical and workable program of service, thus His will is not being done on earth as it is in heaven. We have allowed Satan to divide us into rival camps. We are expending our energies and resources in fighting believers with whom we should be united. If we can sit down and discuss our problems as brethren rather than as enemies; if we can cease to debate each other as aliens, perhaps we can accomplish through love what we have never been able to achieve by partisan strife.

It will help us to remember that not a single apostolic injunction to be of one mind or to achieve harmony, was ever written to bring men into the fellowship. Every such admonition was given to those who were in the fellowship and because they were in it. A recognition of fellowship was to precede and help to produce unanimity of thought. "If then our common life in Christ yields anything to stir the heart . . . any sharing of the Spirit fill up my cup of happiness by thinking and feeling alike, with the same love for one another, the same turn of mind and a common care for unity" (Phil. 2:1, 2). Fellowship is not conditioned upon thinking and feeling alike, but these are conditioned upon recognition of fellowship.

All of my brethren, beloved in the Lord, who read these lines, are in the same fellowship as myself. Not all will agree with what I say but this will in no sense militate against my love and respect for them. We are in the fellowship through an act of divine grace and all of us are striving amidst human weakness to come to a greater understanding of His will and purpose for our lives. Fellowship is a sharing with Him and a sharing with each other.

Receive Him Not Into Your House

Mission Messenger (May 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

In the Firm Foundation, Oct. 30, 1962, a brother in the Lord used more than a page to deal with my understanding of 2 John 9. After giving his own interpretation he asked, "Why then should any one think 'the doctrine of Christ' in 2 John 9 should be limited to mean the teaching concerning the deity of Christ?" I want to answer that question because I believe the meaning of this verse is relevant to reduction of factionalism and restoration of unity to the saints of God. The expression, "If any man come and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house," has been used as a basis for treating with cold disdain every brother who could not in good conscience conform to the party norm. "This doctrine" has been made to refer to varied views relative to instrumental music, missionary societies, the millennium, colleges, cups, classes, charitable institutions, radio and television programs, and every other unwritten creed compiled to harass and hamper the heirs of a noble restoration movement which was originally begun as "a project to unite the Christians in all sects."

It is my conviction that the apostle of love had no intention of handing us a convenient club with which to batter our brethren who sincerely disagree with us about these, or kindred matters. His purpose was to prevent the disciples from being exploited by those who would deny the very foundation of the faith rather than furnish a foundation for the strife and division which today exists among believers in the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus. The limited space available to me will not allow a detailed explanation but I suggest the following points for consideration.

It is generally conceded that John wrote his gospel record and his first and second letters to combat Gnosticism. Ephesus, where he resided, was also the home of Cerinthus, leader of the faction which was dividing every congregation in the Greek world. Basic to every form of gnosticism was the belief that all matter was evil and the material world could not have been created directly by God. This led to a denial of the incarnation. Jesus was considered to have been the son of Joseph and Mary, and adopted as the Son of God at his baptism when the Holy Spirit descended from heaven to abide upon Him. It was concluded that, since God could not die, the Spirit returned to heaven before His crucifixion. The Docetics regarded Jesus as a mere phantom and without reality. John was spared to strike the death blow to this combination of Greek philosophy and Oriental mysticism exactly as Paul had rescued the called ones from the narrow confines of Judaistic legalism.

In 1 John, chapter 1, he refutes the Docetics by affirming the visual, audible and manual proof of Jesus. Immediately he lays down the principle that Jesus is the eternal life, that he shared preexistence with the Father, and was manifested unto men. Incidentally, he affirms that it is this message which is the basis of our fellowship with the Father and Son, as well as with each other. In 2:18 the apostle refers to certain characters whom he designates as antichrists. In the following verse he shows they were schismatists and separatists. In verse 22 he labels them "liars" and in verse 26 "deceivers."

These are clearly identified. "Who is the liar but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, he who denies the Father and the Son." In 4:1, he proposes a test of the spirit motivating the teachers and proclaimers. In the following verses the test itself is provided. “Every spirit which confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit which does not confess Jesus is not of God.” He adds, “This is the spirit of antichrist.”

The second epistle is addressed to an excellent lady accustomed to entertaining Christian teachers in her house. Perhaps the ekklesia of God convened there for worship. In verse 7 the apostle refers to the fact that “many deceivers have gone out into the world, men who will not acknowledge the coming of Jesus Christ in the flesh; such a one is a deceiver and the antichrist.” In the immediate context he declares that “any one who does not abide in the doctrine of Christ does not have God; he who abides in the doctrine of Christ has both the Father and the Son.” A comparison with 1 John 2:23 shows that “No one who denies the Son has the Father. He who confesses the Son has the Father also.” Thus, John equates “not abiding in the doctrine of Christ” with “denying the Son.” He shows that such denial has to do with the incarnation. He equates “abiding in the doctrine of Christ” with “confessing the Son.” This is the ground upon which one has both the Father and the Son.

John is warning against “deceivers who have gone out into the world” (2 John 7) whom he identifies as “false prophets that have gone out into the world” (1 John 4:1). In both instances these are identified as those who deny that Jesus has come in the flesh. He warns the elect lady, “If any one comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not receive him into your house or give him any greeting.” Fortunately our brethren are better than their unwritten creeds. Those who take the position that this doctrine refers to divergent views about instrumental music, orphan homes, cups, classes, colleges, or the millennium, not only receive into their houses those who hold such divergent views, but will spend huge sums of money on advertising trying to get them to “come unto them.” When one does come, the ushers will run halfway across the house to “give him greeting” and hand him a songbook so he can “join in the worship” with them. Of course, they would not call upon him to pray, but will encourage him to speak to God in “psalms, hymns and spiritual songs.”

I think it is obvious that whoever is referred to in this passage must not be allowed to come into a Christian assembly. He must be met at the door of the house and turned back without greeting. If the brethren apply this passage to all who differ with them on matters of interpretation or opinion they sin every time they invite one of them to come into their house or grant him the courtesy of a greeting. As usual, our orthodoxy drives us to some strange and ridiculous evasions of plain teaching. Those who assert that “this doctrine” implies a correct view of everything the apostles wrote find themselves in the unenviable position of disobeying what the apostle wrote about what to do with those who disobey. Our mistaken brethren are not antichrists.

Doctrine and Doctrines

Mission Messenger (May 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

It is possible that many of our readers may become bored with our repeated insistence on the necessity of recapturing the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit. Our emphasis stems from recognition of the fact that a direct relationship exists between an idea and the language used to express it. Words are but symbols of ideas. They are the bodies in which ideas become clothed and through which they exhibit themselves. It is difficult for one mind to project an image within it to another mind so that it will be reflected there in an undistorted impression. The purpose of language is to act as a means of communication to transmit through recognized symbols the ideas which exist in one mind, to other minds.

In his revelation of the divine mind to human consciousness, God made use of that means of communication adapted to and employed by rational beings. The divine agent of revelation, the Holy Spirit, conveyed the message of heaven in words. It is not necessary that we take time here to discuss all of the theories which men have devised to explain or account for the means of transmission. In their final analysis these are merely the words of men about the word of God. If we accept the fact of the revelation of the thoughts of God we must admit the employment of words, for this is the means by which thoughts are transmitted. In the same context in which God affirms, "For my thoughts are not your thoughts," he also says, "So shall my word be that goes forth out of my mouth.”

If the thoughts of God are of sufficient value to man that God saw fit to reveal them, they must be of such worth to man that it is in his eternal interest to grasp them, or exert every rational effort to do so. In order to the accomplishment of this, man must discover and employ the vocabulary of the Spirit. He must know the terms the Spirit used and the significance attached to those terms when used. It is useless to argue that the important thing is to derive the idea and it is not important to consider the language. No idea can exist apart from the body of a word to clothe it. One cannot think except in words nor convey what he thinks apart from words. Our words are vehicles of thought.

Those who rebel at word studies not only reveal their current ignorance of thought processes but also doom themselves to ignorance in the future. Indeed, those who file objections to word analysis must use words by which to do so, and those who understand their objections can only do so because they have learned the significance of words. There are those who believe that we should purify our concepts and then our language will automatically become pure. This is “putting the cart before the horse.” If we begin to use the language of the Spirit our meditation will enable us to grasp the meaning of the Spirit.

Our carelessness in the use of words may be one contributory factor to the religious divisions of our day. I shall cite one example. It is common parlance to speak about “the doctrines of the new testament.” A short time ago I received notice of a lectureship, the theme of which was, “Great Doctrines of the Church.” I shall not deal with the palpable error involved in the expression “doctrines of the church,” but will limit myself to the word “doctrines.”

Even a cursory examination of the sacred text will show that the plural form of the word was never used with reference to the divine revelation. The word “doctrines” only occurs five times in the sacred scriptures, old or new. It is applied to the “doctrines of men,” the “doctrines of demons,” and to “strange (foreign) doctrines.” The revelation of heaven is not composed of so many varied and divergent philosophies, theories or speculations. One will search in vain to read about “the doctrines of Christ,” or “the doctrines of the apostles.” There were a number of apostles but there was only one doctrine!

Herein lies the great danger in creedal forms and confessions. Men distil the word of God through finite minds and seek to bind their varied understandings and interpretations upon others as a rule of faith and practice. To deviate from the party creed is then equated with departing from the living God. Conformity rather than community becomes the goal. Fellowship must succumb to dogmatism. When the cycle has run its jaded course and Christian charity again begins to assert itself, all too often there arises the feeling that all of these forms and expressions constitute the “doctrines of the historic church.” A new creed is written which, in effect, embraces all of the old ones in a spirit of ecumenicity.

It is not the charity which produces this spirit that is wrong. It should have been exercised all of the time and would have prevented the original stifling of liberty in Christ Jesus by creedal shackles. Nor is it the goal of that spirit—the gathering of the scattered forces—that is sinful, because our blessed Lord prayed for that very thing. The error lies in enshrining all of the varied creedal forms as “doctrines of the church” and thus binding upon future generations a conglomerate creed which will grow into orthodoxy. Ecumenical orthodoxy is as serious a danger as any other!

It is indeed a strange anomaly when we divide the body by “the doctrines of men,” and then seek to heal our breaches by transmuting all of these into the doctrine of God. We are not alchemists who can change base metals into gold. Let men who respect the authority of God, limit themselves in their conferences to the language of the Spirit. If the Spirit has used no language suitable to convey the idea, it must become evident that the idea itself was not revealed by God.

This is not equivalent to saying that the word of God is a meticulous and scrupulous revelation of every detail. It is simply a plea that if we are to be the people of God we demonstrate our fidelity by respect for the doctrine of God.

The Unequal Yoke

Mission Messenger (June 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

It is rather astounding to observe how we become victims of traditional explanations of the scriptures and transmit them to others with no real personal examination of their validity. Perhaps no better example can be found than the common application of 2 Corinthians 6:14-18. We are constantly receiving letters in which good brothers and sisters cite this passage as the ground for their separation from those who differ with them about some of the things such as cups, classes, or colleges, which we have allowed to fragment the heirs of the restoration movement. I doubt that any faction has been formed in our generation whose members did not quote as justification for their action, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord."

Although we have commented at some length about this portion of Paul's writings in previous years, it seems that little we have said has made any great impact. At the risk of being repetitious we are going to ask you to study again with us the implications of the passage. Let us first read it together so we may know exactly what the inspired writer said.

Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?

And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?

And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you,

And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

I think it is obvious that the expression, “Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers,” has no reference to the marriage relationship. Certainly it would not be advisable for a believer to unite in marriage with an unbeliever. Marriage is such an intimate relationship that it requires much that is held in common by the two participants in order to assure the success of the union. In view of the fact that our religious convictions are entwined with our deepest emotional constitution we disregard at our peril the warning signs which grace the entrance to the highway of matrimony. But while all of this is true, the passage before us has nothing to do with the subject.

To regard it as referring to marriage would be to violate two vital rules of logical interpretation. These are: (1) No passage must be so interpreted as to contradict the apparent meaning of another passage; (2) In any interpretation involving two passages, one of which is obvious and the other obscure, the obscure must always be interpreted in the light of the plain, and never the reverse. Whatever relationship is signified by “yoked” in verse 14, it must be culminated at once by action of the believer and the culmination must be abrupt separation (verse 17).

However, the apostle had shortly before this written to the same brethren and instructed those who were married to unbelievers not to separate from them. He recognized that the unbeliever might leave and said, “If the unbelieving depart, let him depart.” But any separation must be the action of the unbeliever, for the instruction is, “If any brother hath a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away. And the woman which hath a husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him” (1 Cor. 7:12, 13). That this has to do with marriage is obvious from the entire adjacent context as well as the usage of the terms “husband” and “wife.”

The “yoking together” in 2 Corinthians 6:14 could not refer to marriage for whatever relationship it signified must be terminated by the aggressive act of the believer. It would have been very confusing indeed for the Corinthian believers to receive one letter from the apostle telling them neither to put away nor leave their unbelieving spouses, and then receive another letter instructing them to separate from those to whom they were yoked. We must conclude, I think, that “unequally yoked together” has no relationship to marriage in this context. I believe that all such use of the passage has been misuse or abuse.

Perhaps this is as good a time as any to point out that the general tenor of the passage indicates a corporate action. The purpose of separation is to form a people for God and thus to compose the temple of God. To “touch the unclean thing” whatever it might be (and we shall refer to it later), would profane God’s temple. That temple composed of his sons and daughters, as living stones, is to be free from contact with defilement or pollution.

We will follow the text in the King James Version, not because it is the best rendering, but because it is the one most commonly followed by those who refer us to the passage as justification for division among brethren. Immediately it becomes apparent that Paul was writing about two forces in the world which were antagonistic to each other. These had not one thing in common and for that reason no common ties should be sought between them and no alliances of any kind should be formed. There are two proper names used which have great significance— Christ and Belial. These are the leaders of the two great forces of righteousness and unrighteousness, of light and darkness. One determined where he stood by which of these he accorded his allegiance.

Notice that there are six terms used to define these two conflicting hosts and six additional terms descriptive of affinity. In five instances a question is posed which shows that these are opposite and not apposite and there is no basis upon which they can establish any mutual relationship. The six terms used to identify the one group are: believers (by implication), righteousness, light, Christ, he that believeth, and the temple of God. The terms employed to identify the opposition are: unbelievers, unrighteousness, darkness, Belial, an infidel, idols. The word “infidel” in verse 15 is the same in the original as that translated “unbelievers” in the preceding verse. The six words of relationship are: yoked, fellowship, communion, concord, part and agreement.

Let us now consider the conditions existing in Corinth which would give rise to Paul’s special concern that those who shared in the promises should cleanse themselves from all defilement of the flesh and spirit. The city was so situated that it was “the mart of the Greek world.” If you will consult your map you will see that the southern part of Greece is joined to the remainder by a narrow neck of land only four miles across. All of the land traffic from north to south must pass across this narrow strip because there was no way to bypass it. The city of Corinth stood athwart this little neck which made southern Greece a peninsula instead of an island.

While north and south traffic was funneled through Corinth by necessity, most of the east and west shipping passed through the city by choice. It was a little more than two hundred miles around Cape Malea from the suburban harbor town of Lechaëum on the west to the suburban harbor town of Cenchrea on the east. This was a dangerous and dreaded journey because sailing conditions were so hazardous around the cape that the sailors had a proverbial saying, "Let him who sails around Malea first make his will." For that reason most small boats were placed on rollers and dragged across the four mile isthmus, while the cargo of larger vessels was transported by porters and cartage companies to be loaded on other vessels.

All the rich luxury items of the ancient world passed through Corinth and since it was easier to sell at a reduction than to trans-ship their commodities, importers and exporters alike clustered in the city. Banking and exchange firms flourished. Money was easy to come by and easy to spend. Merchants, traders, salesmen and sailors, of every nation and color, congregated here, seeking pleasure and profligacy. Men had time and wealth to spare and to spend and the city administration did not hesitate to advertise Corinth as "the good time capital of the world." Gambling, vice and viciousness were syndicated, encouraged and protected by law.

The very name of Corinth came to be a symbol for loose morals. The expression "to Corinthianize" was universally used to describe drunken debauchery. When a Corinthian was depicted in one of the dramas he was always shown as a staggering drunk. This was bad enough, but to make matters worse Corinth was also the home of the temple of Aphrodite, goddess of passion and love. High on the Acropolis, jutting above the city proper, this famous (or infamous) structure could be seen from afar by the sailors, and it drew them as moths are drawn to the candle flame. Here there dwelt a thousand priestesses who were cult prostitutes, trained and skilled in the art of solicitation for their nefarious trade. Each evening at dusk they descended upon the city below and swarmed through the streets accosting all whom they met. The money they received went into the temple coffers. Immorality was colored by religion until vice was translated into virtue.

It is not at all strange in such a place to hear the apostle say, “Do not be deceived; neither the immoral, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor homosexuals, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor robbers will inherit the kingdom of God. And such were some of you” (1 Cor. 6:10, 11). Nor does it seem at all incongruous that he should write to the congregation of saints in such a city, “Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? Shall I therefore take the members of Christ and make them members of a prostitute? Never! Do you not know that he who joins himself to a prostitute becomes one body with her?” (1 Cor. 6:15, 16). It is interesting that in the same conjunction he mentions that, “Your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God. You are not your own, you were bought with a price. So glorify God in your body.” The temple of God’s love is contrasted with the temple of pagan love. In one, a man joined himself to a prostitute and became one body with her; in the other he joined himself to God and became one spirit with him (1 Cor. 6:17).

Certainly it does not excuse the congregation, but it may help to explain why they continued arrogantly on their way while tolerating in their number one guilty of a type of immorality not even condoned by the pagans, “for a man is living with his father’s wife.” Those who were swimming in a veritable sea of vice and who “would need to go out of the world” to escape contact with “the immoral of this world” (1 Cor. 5:9, 10) could become so accustomed to immorality that it would make but little impression upon them, even in an aggravated form.

It is interesting to note that in dealing with the immoral man, Paul recognizes two realms to which men may belong. Over one Jesus is Lord, over the other Satan rules. In the two sentences in which the apostle affirms his decision and gives instruction for enforcing it he uses the words “Lord Jesus” three times. The decision is that the man must be delivered unto Satan. One who does not recognize the lordship of Jesus over his life cannot continue to live with those who do. The judgment is pronounced “in the name of the Lord Jesus,” it is to be executed “with the power of the Lord Jesus,” and it has as its motive the saving of the spirit in “the day of the Lord Jesus” (See 1 Cor. 5:4, 5).

The pledge of allegiance to Jesus Christ implies the obligation to reproduce the life of Jesus in one’s own life, that is to “cleanse ourselves from every defilement of body and spirit, and make holiness perfect in the fear of God” (2 Cor. 7:1). There are two ways by which one can renounce such allegiance. He can declare as did the citizens in the parable, “We do not want this man to reign over us.” Or, he can live such a life of abandon as to show that he has abandoned the life of Jesus. In both instances he rejects the rule of Jesus and must be delivered to Satan. “If you yield yourselves to any one as obedient slaves, you are slaves of the one whom you obey, either of sin which leads to death, or of obedience which leads to righteousness” (Rom. 6:17).

What we have thus far written will prepare us in a meager way to appreciate the implications in the language of the apostle in 2 Corinthians 6:14-18. Let us analyze his expressions. “Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers.” Who are the unbelievers? What does it mean to be unequally yoked with such? Let us examine Paul’s references to unbelievers as found in his letters to the Corinthians. We can thus determine what the saints in Corinth would understand by the term.

BELIEVERS AND UNBELIEVERS

Paul speaks about the litigation in which some of the Christians became involved (1 Cor. 6:1-8). He says, “But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers” (verse 6). It is evident that the unbelievers are not brothers in Christ. In verse 1 this same group is referred to as “the unjust” and here they are contrasted with the saints. “Dare any of you having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints?” This proves that the unbelievers are not saints. The saints are those in Christ Jesus (1 Cor. 1:2) and composed “the church of God which is at Corinth.” Unbelievers are those who are not in Christ Jesus or in the church of God. This is proven by the context in 1 Corinthians 6:4-6, “If then you have such cases, why do you lay them before those who are least esteemed by the church? I say this to your shame. Can it be that there is no man among you wise enough to decide between members of the brotherhood, but brother goes to law against brother, and that before unbelievers?” No one who is in the church, or in the brotherhood, is an unbeliever, as Paul uses the word.

Let us pursue the matter a little further. In 1 Corinthians 7:12-16 Paul deals with the marriage relationship. “If any brother has a wife who is an unbeliever, and she consents to live with him, he should not divorce her. If any woman has a husband who is an unbeliever, and he consents to live with her, she should not divorce him.” It is evident that the “brother” and “sister” in this case are the believers and the unbelievers are pagans. The unbelievers are those who have not given allegiance to Jesus Christ, a term which best describes the state of the believer as it is understood in new covenant terminology. To put it in other words, the unbelievers are those who have never responded to the call of God and are not in the church. This is evident from the fact that Paul says in this connection, “Only let every one lead the life which the Lord has assigned to him, and in which God has called him. This is my rule in all the churches” (1 Cor. 7:17).

To phrase it another way, the unbeliever is one who is not a brother or sister in Christ, for the apostle contrasts them. “But if the unbelieving partner desires to separate, let it be so; in such a case the brother or sister is not bound” (verse 15). The unbeliever is the unsaved person. “Wife, how do you know whether you will save your husband? Husband, how do you know whether you will save your wife?” (verse 16). Let us summarize what we have learned about “unbelievers.” They are outside of the church and are not saints or brethren. They are the unsaved, those who are not in Christ Jesus because they have never pledged allegiance unto him.

When Paul admonished the saints to be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers, it is altogether possible he had in mind the provision of Deuteronomy 22:10, “You shall not plow with an ox and an ass together.” The ox and ass are distinct species. One is alien to the other and they can never be merged. They are incompatible. One may yoke two oxen together which are quite different in many ways— in strength, temperament, color, markings, size, etc., but the law did not forbid this because they were both members of the same family or species. The original word for “unequally yoked” is heterozugea. Heteros means “another of a different sort or kind.” The people of God are not to be yoked with an alien people, that is a people who have another god. “I will be their God and they shall be my people” (verse 17). But to treat others who have given their allegiance to the Lord Jesus as unbelievers, because they differ with us about some things, is to paganize them and is a grave insult to the one whom they recognize as Lord. A person who “sets at nought a brother” and discounts him as a pagan dishonors the Father!

RIGHTEOUSNESS AND UNRIGHTEOUSNESS

The expression, “For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness?” is a most interesting one. The casual reader would assume that one was simply the opposite of the other, but this is hardly the case in the original. The word for righteousness is dikaiosune, that right relationship with God which is attained through grace by those who trust in the Lord Jesus Christ. The opposite of this would ordinarily be expressed by the word adikia, but that is not the one employed here. The word “unrighteousness” is from anomia, and this is the only time it is translated thus. It literally means “lawlessness” and it has reference to the rejection of God’s rule, or to deliberate flaunting of God’s law.

It appears significant that the apostle in a table of antithetical words, would employ one which he nowhere else uses in exactly the same sense or circumstance. The exact opposite of “righteousness” would be that state in which one has not yet received a right relationship with Deity, but this is not sufficiently expressive for that type of paganism in which the Corinthians indulged. In Romans 1:21-32 the apostle describes the condition of those whose “senseless minds were darkened” and whom “God gave up in the lusts of their heart to impurity.” The “dishonorable passions” and “shameless acts” are there detailed, and a description of the “base mind” and “improper conduct” is graphically presented. This catalogue of criminal perversion which might well have been drawn from the daily behavior in Corinth closes with the words, “Though they know God’s decree that those who do such things deserve to die, they not only do them but approve those who practice them” (Rom. 1:32).

The word “fellowship” literally means “to share a common life.” The one who was justified, for this is entailed in the word “righteousness” as here used, has nothing in common with those who “exchanged the truth about God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature more than the Creator.” Only contamination could come from any intimacy or association with those of whom it is said, “they were consumed with passion for the bodies of one another” (Rom. 1:27). The hope of avoiding the unclean thing lay in coming out from among them to live a separated and segregated life, shut off from the vileness and malignancy of the profligate metropolis.

LIGHT AND DARKNESS

“What communion hath light and darkness?” The superficial scholar usually demonstrates his lack of knowledge by the dogmatic assertion that light represents knowledge, while darkness typifies ignorance. Of course that is true in some cases but such a statement does not exhaust the metaphorical use of the terms. Indeed a great deal more is involved in this case. We must, if possible, look at the words as they would be understood by the primitive saints.

To the early disciples, the moral and spiritual domain was divided into two realms— the kingdom of darkness and the kingdom of light. Over the latter Jesus exercised dominion while over the former “the rulers of the darkness of this world” presided (Eph. 6:12). Each of these states had its host of supernatural beings called “principalities and powers.” In the kingdom of righteousness these were celestial, the angels of light. In the other they were infernal beings, the demons. These latter had conspired to defeat the purposes of God by the death of the Son, but, “He disarmed the principalities and powers and made a public example of them, triumphing over them in the cross” (Col. 2:15).

By taking from them their one potent weapon— death— he made it possible for men to share in life in the Son. Those who were called were thus said to be “delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of his dear Son” (Col. 1:13). When in the domain of darkness they “obeyed the commander of the spiritual powers of the air, the spirit now at work among God’s rebel subjects” (Eph. 2:2). Having been freed from the immorality and indecency which characterizes the children of darkness they are told, “Let no one deceive you with shallow arguments; it is for all these things that God’s dreadful judgment is coming upon his rebel subjects. Have no part or lot with them. For though you were once all darkness, now as Christians you are light” (Eph. 5:6-8).

There was a koinonia (fellowship) of darkness and a koinonia of light. Each of these had its god. In Corinth, the realm of darkness worshiped at the shrine of Aphrodite; the children of light at the throne of the living God. Each had its temple in which the Deity was believed to dwell. The one upon the Acropolis consisted of stones piled up by the hands of men; the other was composed of living stones purified by the blood of Jesus. And because koinonia was generally expressed by eating and drinking together, each had its table. The apostle declared, “The sacrifices the heathen offer are offered to demons and to that which is not God, and I will not have you become partners with demons. You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons. You cannot partake of the Lord’s table and the table of demons” (1 Cor. 10:20, 21).

Demon worship was always accompanied by secrecy and sensuality. It featured indescribable acts of depravity and debauchery. Every type of degradation and perversion disgraced the fertility rites of the pagans. The saints at Ephesus are urged to “Give up living like pagans with their good-for-nothing notions. Their wits are beclouded, they are strangers to the life that is in God, because ignorance prevails among them and their minds have grown hard as stone. Dead to all feeling, they have abandoned themselves to vice, and stop at nothing to satisfy their foul desires” (Eph. 4:17-19). In the same context the apostle says, “Take no part in the barren deeds of darkness, but show them up for what they are. The things they do in secret it would be shameful even to mention” (5:11-13). The King James Version renders it, “Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them. For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret.”

The word “communion” has to do with that which is held in common. The realm of light had nothing in common with that of darkness. They had their own objects of worship, their own temples, their own tables, their own rituals. Their initiatory rites were different. “When we bless ‘the cup of blessing,’ is it not a means of sharing in the blood of Christ?” (1 Cor. 10:16). “The sacrifices the heathen offer are offered to demons and to that which is not God” (verse 20). That which has not one thing in common has no communion, no common meeting ground, no community of interests. “Wherefore come out from among them and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing.”

CHRIST AND BELIAL

“What concord hath Christ with Belial?” Observe that the apostle does not here contrast Christ with Satan, but with Belial. This is the only time the latter word occurs in the new covenant scriptures. It is worthy of consideration. In the old testament writings it is doubtful if it is a proper name at all and the majority of evidence points to the idea that it is not. It is simply a term meaning “worthless, lawless.” It is generally employed in a sense which refers to certain characters who were of the rabble.

In later classical usage the word was applied to the inhabitants of the underworld, to demons, Satan, and the invisible malign forces which inhabit the universe and carry out evil designs. As a proper name it is probably correctly spelled “Beliar” and this was the name of the “god of forests,” the imaginary deity supposed to protect the wilderness regions. Of one thing we can be certain, it is a name associated both with demons and with idolatry.

The apostle Paul knew there was only one God. “As concerning, therefore, the eating of those things that are offered in sacrifice unto idols, we know that an idol is nothing in the world, and that there is none other God but one” (1 Cor. 8:4). But while he discounted the thought that the idol was anything, he did believe that idolatry was demon-inspired. He held that the whole false system was the work of hell, originating with the cosmic spirits of the universe, resulting from “seducing spirits and doctrines of demons” (1 Tim. 4:1). For that reason he writes to the Corinthians, “What say I then? that the idol is anything? or that which is offered in sacrifice to idols is anything? But I say, that the things which the pagans sacrifice, they sacrifice to demons, and not to God: and I would not that ye should have fellowship with demons. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord’s table and the table of demons” (1 Cor. 10:19-21).

Here is a contrast between the koinonia of the Lord and that of demons. The two are utterly divergent. They have their own cup and table. They represent different “brotherhoods.” There is no concord between them. Belial is the name given to the whole secret idolatrous cult of infamy at Corinth. Vine, in his Expository Dictionary of New Testament Words, is correct when he says, “In the N. T.; in 2 Cor. 6:15, it is set in contrast to Christ and represents a personification of the system of impure worship connected especially with the cult of Aphrodite.”

TEMPLE OF GOD

“And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols?” This concluding question definitely establishes beyond dispute the subject of the apostle. It explains what has gone before and is the foundation for what follows. The topic of discussion is not related to matters of difference among those in Christ Jesus, but with the relationship of the saints to paganism. The apostle uses the word temple (naos) six times in his letters to the Corinthians. In five of these cases he refers to the temple of God, in the other he refers to “the temple of the Holy Spirit which is in you, which you have of God.”

A temple was considered by the Romans and Greeks to be the dwelling-place or sanctuary of the deity. So the apostle says, "For ye are the temple of the living God, as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." The word "dwell" is from a word which signifies "to take up residence, to inhabit." It differs from the term used to describe a traveler who stays for a night or two. God will establish a constant residence with his people. He will live in them and among them.

God cannot share his glory with another (Isa. 42:8). He declared, "Thou shalt have no other gods in my presence." Those who are to be his people must choose him as their God to the exclusion of all other so-called divinities. They cannot continue in paganism and have God continue in them. For that reason the ultimatum is issued, "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you" (2 Cor. 6:17).

What is "the unclean thing"? Perhaps we cannot be specific, but in view of what we have learned thus far, and of the context in which the word appears, I should like to make a few suggestions. The word for unclean is akathartos, impure. It is used twenty-one times in connection with the demons who are called "unclean spirits." In Luke 4:33, it occurs in the expression, "a spirit of an unclean demon." Is it too much to conclude that since the subject is "idolatry" and this is demon-inspired, that the unclean thing relates to the sacrifices made by the pagans to demons and the licentious practices in connection therewith?

Let us go a step further. Paul uses the word haptomai, touch, only one other time in writing to Corinth. The other occasion is 1 Corinthians 7:1 where he is dealing with sexual relationships or physical intimacy. To "touch the unclean thing" would be to engage in intimate relationship with the impure pagan rites. With these, God's children have nothing in common. There can be no fellowship, communion, concord or agreement, with them. Only absolute separation can obtain where there is not a single item of spiritual approbation.

This brings us back to our original theme, “Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers.” The word heterozugein was a military term. It was used to describe one who left his own place or rank and joined himself to another company. If two opposing armies were marching through the land, this term was used to describe the man who deserted his captain and marched with the enemy. The “unbelievers” are the heathens. They constitute the opposing force of unrighteousness. To share with them in their service was to renounce allegiance to the Lord Jesus. A child of God had no business sitting at the table of demons.

MODERN MISAPPLICATION

Thousands of good brethren have wrested this scripture in our day, using it in such a manner as to defeat the very purpose of Paul in writing to the Corinthians. Let me explain what I mean. A short time ago I received a letter from a brother in Oklahoma who was embittered because I would not sanction division among brethren. Because he opposed Bible classes he thought that I should urge all who worshipped where they had “the Sunday School” to “come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing.” A sister in Iowa wrote for us to discontinue her paper because I said that “God’s sheep are a scattered flock and some of them are found on sectarian hills.” She printed in large letters at the bottom of her card— 2 Corinthians 6:14-18.

We must have no ill feeling toward those who thus behave. They are merely acting in conformity with what they have been taught. All of these good souls have my compassion. They have been reared in an atmosphere of party spirit and have been taught very little about the indwelling Spirit. Of course those who refuse to read what we write cannot be helped by what is here said, but others who discover truth can share with those whom we cannot reach and the word of truth will be diffused in spite of adverse attitudes. I should like to make a few definite statements about the implications of this passage.

1. The Holy Spirit nowhere summons the “called out” to come out from among the “called out.” The called out ones are commanded to separate from the pagans insofar as any participation in the worship of other gods is concerned, but God does not deliberately and designedly divide his children among whom he walks.

2. In every instance in which division or separation among the children of God is mentioned, it is always condemned, and never sanctioned. The children are never commanded to divide and when they do so contrary to the will of God the Father, they are censured for such division and urged to repair the breach and to restore unity.

3. Dissensions and divisions are works of the flesh and will debar from inheritance in the kingdom. To teach that the Holy Spirit authorizes God’s children to separate from each other, and by the very act to create factions, is to charge the Spirit with advocating works of the flesh.

4. If the Holy Spirit were ever to justify separation from brethren and the formation of another congregation, there could have been no greater opportunity than in the case of Corinth. That congregation embraced those who were in error in doctrine, practice and attitude. In spite of this there was not one word said which would imply that any of the children should come out from among the other children and create a cleavage in the family.

The exact opposite is the case. They were admonished to “agree among yourselves, and avoid divisions; be firmly joined in unity of mind and thought” (1 Cor. 1:10). They were told that, “Anyone who destroys God’s temple will himself be destroyed by God, because the temple of God is holy” (3:17). Again the apostle tells of the special dispensation of God, “that there might be no sense of division in the body” (12:25). His farewell message was, “Mend your ways; take our appeal to heart; agree with one another; live in peace; and the God of love and peace be with you” (2 Cor. 13:11).

No greater injury can be done to the cause of our Lord than to confuse God’s children with idolatrous pagans. The purpose of the command to “come out from among them and be separate” was to unite God’s sons and daughters into a single unbroken family to bring the full impact of the holy witness upon the dissolute forces of Beliar. The temple of God was not to be disfigured by breaks and cracks, but to be a structure in which the stones were cemented together in love. To apply this scripture in such a way as to create, condone or continue division in the ranks of the saints or holy ones is to wrest it from its meaning and purpose and “do despite to the Spirit of grace.”

The party spirit perverts and warps the mind, producing “the will to divide.” Those who are motivated by it will search the scriptures to justify their actions. The phrases “Come out” and “be separate” are made to order for those who are psychologically conditioned for adjusting, or maladjusting disagreements by separation. All that is necessary is to postulate that “the unclean thing” about which the apostle writes is equivalent to the controversial point at issue and the body can then be fragmented without remorse or compunction. To each faction “the unclean thing” is that which they oppose, and ridiculous as it may seem to the scholarly, it is nonetheless a fact that some have equated “the unclean thing” with cups, classes, orphan homes or instrumental music.

In actuality, not one of these has produced division. It is a false sense of thinking with regard to fellowship and brotherhood which is the real culprit. It is difficult to determine whether this has sired the party spirit or is an offspring of it. However, the two have been combined to create a vicious cycle. Unless this is checked we will continue to divide brethren and try to justify it until the family relationship is completely destroyed.

It will help us to remember one salient truth which is all too often ignored. The new covenant scriptures were written for the specific purpose of promoting unity in the family of God and any use of these scriptures for the purpose of encouraging division in the ranks of that family should be eyed with grave suspicion. We can undo many of the currently existing divisions and eliminate the possibility of others in the future if we will here and now abandon “the will to divide” for “the will to unite.” Such an alteration of attitude will enable us to become peacemakers and assure that we will be blessed as the children of God. We can never be blessed so long as we un-Christianize and paganize the other members of the divine family by our misuse of the words of the Father of us all.

Repairing Lines

Mission Messenger (June 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

A few years ago I was in a town which suffered from the onslaught of a freezing rain and ice storm. All overhead wires were snapped under the increasing weight and soon all lines of communication with the rest of the world were cut off. It is a tribute to the efficiency of modern enterprise that within a matter of hours emergency repair crews were converging on the area from every direction. There was an awareness upon the part of all concerned that little permanent repair work could be accomplished until effective communication was again established.

Apparently human nature has not altered a great deal in the past two thousand years. It is still true that “the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light.” It might be a subject worthy of research to determine what factors cause the children of light, who were once children of this world, to forfeit their pragmatic and practical wisdom when their state is changed. That some of them become as “harmless as serpents and as wise as doves” none of us can deny. What is true of the “children of light” generally, is no less true of those who are heirs of the restoration movement.

This noble spiritual experiment undertaken originally to “unite the Christians in all sects” has bogged down in a welter of factional partisanship and is now one of the most divided religious movements on the current American scene. The members of each splinter regard their own segment as the one holy, apostolic, and catholic church of God upon earth, and postulate that the blood of Jesus was shed solely to purchase the faction to which they are attached. This has created an attitude of sectarian exclusivism and self-righteousness which is hardly duplicated by even the most unrealistic denominations of our age.

Under the weight of dogmatic editorializing, pressure from self-appointed official interpreters, and fear and suspicion of the membership, the lines of communication have broken down. There is little exchange of thought on a high level between members of the several factions. The papers have a closed door policy, the lectureships present only men who are “sound,” i.e., who parrot the party line. Any attempt to rise above bigotry and intolerance is shouted down as “liberalism,” any recognition of brotherhood beyond the party confines is branded as “compromise.”

In such a time as this a statement of our own purpose and mission is again in order. We represent no splinter, split, or segment of the restoration movement. We are indebted to no faction, fraction, or fragment for our salvation, nor do we propose to allow any such to come between us and our debt to the One who died for our sins. Because we are not in bondage to any party we are free to love all of our brethren and to move among them as freely as they will allow. We will make nothing a test of fellowship which he has not made a condition of salvation. We shall treat as brothers all whom He accepts as sons!

There are many problems in the family of God to which we do not know the answer. We are simply dedicated to repairing the lines that have broken down so that in the future we may converse as brethren instead of debating as partisan enemies. What our brethren will say to each other when the lines are up again, only time will tell. It will probably not be as bad as the things they have said about each other while the lines are down.

We propose to go wherever the Spirit opens up a door for sharing our thinking with others who are interested in the kingdom of heaven. We shall not be nearly so concerned about those who do not want us to go as we shall be with those who want us to come. One who belongs to Jesus can go anywhere and be safe; one who does not is not safe anywhere he goes. We shall be the slave of no man, but a servant to all men.

The Spirit and Unity

Mission Messenger (July 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

The Holy Spirit is a personality. He is not a nebulous mass of goodness in the spiritual atmosphere nor a gray cloud of righteousness floating about in the firmament. He is not a mere influence or disposition. He is the cause and not a result; a principal rather than a principle. These truths we have previously affirmed and committed to print in this little journal, together with ample scriptural documentation. It is not necessary that we rehearse them.

When Jesus was preparing to depart from this earth he comforted his sorrowing disciples with the words, “I will not leave you orphans; I will come unto you.” One does not cease to be an orphan if you inaugurate a law for him to obey or give him a book of instructions to follow. He remains an orphan until adopted by someone who takes the place of the loved one who has gone away. So Jesus said, “I will ask the Father to give you another Helper to be with you for ever, even the Spirit of truth: the world cannot receive him, because it neither sees nor knows him, but you know him, because he remains with you and will be within you.”

The term “for ever” is an idiomatic expression which means “unto the age” or “during the age.” The Holy Spirit has been sent to abide with the saints on earth during the age in which the Lord is absent. He does not replace Jesus as a savior or mediator. “There is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.” The Spirit is our Helper, or Strengtheners, while the Son directs his rule of conquest from his place at the right hand of the Father. In his present capacity, the Spirit could not precede Jesus to earth nor be here during his presence on earth. The Son said, “I am telling you the truth— my going is for your good. If I do not depart, the Helper will not come to you; whereas, if I go, I will send him to you.”

The coming of the Spirit was not only to refresh the saints and make them flowing fountains of grace and truth, but also to assure them that what Jesus had promised while on earth had taken place in heaven. Since the Spirit was to act as the divine medium of proof of the coronation of the new king in a remote capital city, he could not come until Jesus had been coronated in His glory. This is in harmony with the words of John 7:37-39, “Now on the last day, the great day of the festival, Jesus stood and cried aloud, ‘If anyone is athirst, let him come to me and drink; he who believes on me out of his body, as scripture says, streams of living water will flow’ (he meant by this the Spirit which those who believed in him were to receive— as yet there was no Spirit, because Jesus had not been glorified yet).”

It will be conceded, I think, that the testimony to such an event as the transfer of power from God to His Son, must be presented in undeniable fashion. The two forms of credible human testimony in the order of their validity are visual and audible. Thus the Holy Spirit employed these two methods in his initial coming, so that Peter could say, “This Jesus God raised, as we can all bear witness. Uplifted then by God’s right hand and receiving from the Father the long-promised holy Spirit, he has poured on us, what you now see and hear.”

This is the dispensation of the Spirit so far as God’s elect on earth are concerned. At the foundation of the world the Spirit was associated in creation. God originated the plan, the Logos (Word) executed it, the Spirit hovered over the primordial earth when it was waste and void, bringing order out of chaos. Before the advent of the Logos, who became flesh and dwelled among us, the Spirit motivated the prophets of God, enabling them to predict and describe in advance the coming reign of the Messiah. Now the Spirit has been sent by the Father to complete the divine purpose on earth. He now dwells among us as Jesus once abode with men to perfect the design of heaven. The Son must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet. The Spirit is not a ghost, but a holy guest among us, laboring to this end.

It is not our intention in this article to discuss the many facets of the work of the Spirit. Neither time nor space would allow of this. We shall restrict our theme to the responsibility of the Spirit in the divine imperative of unity and the furtherance of that fellowship of the saints who are made brothers by the blood of the Lamb. So intimately is the Spirit related to this fellowship that it is designated after him, and so important is it that it is associated with the two greatest themes of God's revelation— grace and love. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and fellowship in the Holy Spirit, be with you all" (2 Cor. 13:14). God, Christ, and the Holy Spirit— these embrace all that is called Deity. Grace, love and fellowship — this is the trinity which makes it possible for man to share in divine nature.

Any theory of Christian unity which ignores or minimizes the influence of the Holy Spirit in cementing the saints together must be rejected as inadequate. The koinonia to which we have been called of God is one of the Spirit. It is not a fellowship created by human agency. It cannot be legislated by a convention nor can it be conferred by a conference. It can be enjoyed but not enjoined. The Holy Spirit produces, promotes and protects this fellowship. Each of these is a different action and requires a different exercise of power. Our purpose in this article is to discuss each of these in order as revealed in the new covenant scriptures.

I. PRODUCTION OF FELLOWSHIP

The design of the Holy Spirit is to so operate on the hearts of sinful men as to bring them into one body, where all may be partners or joint participants in the grace of God. “For during the time that I was in prison as well as when I was out defending and demonstrating the power of the Gospel we shared together the grace of God” (Phil. 1:7). We must not overlook the fact that it is the grace of which we are joint partakers, otherwise we will reduce the noble concept of fellowship in the Spirit to the realm of the mundane and trivial. Let us consider the means by which this joint participation in the Spirit is accomplished.

1. While it is distinctly affirmed that the world cannot receive the Spirit (John 14:17), it is just as positively affirmed that He will convict the world of sin, righteousness and judgment (John 16:8). The first two of these have to do with character, the last with destiny. It is observable that the Spirit does not convict of sin by detailing a list of acts which constitute it. The same holds true for righteousness. Acts are fruits and these are produced from thoughts. “A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit” (Matt. 7:18). The divine order is “Clean the inside of the cup first; then the outside will be clean also” (Matt. 23:26).

Accordingly, the Spirit convicts of sin by striking at the very heart of that which destroys relationship with God—rejection of Jesus. “Of sin because they believe not on me” (verse 9). In the same vein, righteousness consists of acknowledgment of the Lordship of Jesus so that every walk of life is an act of faith and not of sight. “Of righteousness, because I go to the Father, and you see me no more.” Righteousness is the opposite of sin. If one is the rejection of Jesus, the other must be acceptance of Him. All sin is disbelief; all righteousness is faith.

The world is convicted of personal accountability in that the very ruler of the world is subject to trial. “Of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged” (verse 11). If the world leader is brought to bay there can be no escape for any of his followers. All conversion is preceded by conviction. No one realizes the need of a Savior who does not recognize that he is lost. Man must make his choice between Jesus and the prince of this world. He must be confronted with the tragedy resulting from the wrong decision. The work of convicting the world is the work of the Spirit. It is the initial sifting of the wheat and chaff and the first step toward creation of “the fellowship of the granary.”

2. The Spirit provided the message of the envoys to an alien world. It was not decreed by human philosophy nor couched in brilliant language. “When I came to you, I declared the attested truth of God without display of fine words or wisdom” (1 Cor. 2:1). God made use of a divine agent as well as human agents. It was the task of the divine agent to convey the mind of God to the human agents who, in turn, relayed it to the world of mankind. “When the Helper is come, whom I will send you from the Father— the Spirit of truth that issues from the Father— he will bear witness to me and you also are my witnesses, because you have been with me from the first” (John 15:26, 27). One of the envoys stated it thus, “We speak of these gifts of God in words found for us not by our human wisdom but by the Spirit.”

It must never be concluded that the Spirit merely gave the word and retired from the scene, or that the revelation of the message rendered him inactive. The Spirit operates through, and in conjunction with, the word, but he operates. Just as the surgeon operates with an instrument, the scalpel, so the Spirit operates with an instrument, the sword (Eph. 6:17). Any doctrine which minimizes or eliminates either the Spirit or the word falls short. It is not the Spirit only, nor the word only, but the operation of the Spirit through the word.

3. The Spirit introduces all of the obedient believers into one body and thus forms an active fellowship of all who respond to the Good News. He does this without regard for national or social distinctions. He generates a vital unity of all who are regenerated. “As the human body which has many parts, is a unity, and those parts, despite their multiplicity, constitute one single body, so it is with Christ. For we were all baptized by the Spirit into one body, whether we were Jews, Greeks, slaves, or free men, and we have all had experience of the same Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:12, 13). The Spirit never inducts an obedient gospel subject into other than the one body. It follows that every sincere baptized believer is brought into the one body, and is in the fellowship of the Spirit.

4. Baptism can only change the state of a believer. It can transfer but cannot transform him. Any inward renewal must be the work of the Spirit. Since the fellowship is one of saints, or holy ones, it is obvious that, as a part of the saving process, the pledge of allegiance to Christ must be accompanied by a new creative act. So we read, “But when the kindness and generosity of God our Savior dawned upon the world, then, not for any good deeds of our own, but because he was merciful, he saved us through the water of rebirth and the renewing power of the Holy Spirit” (Titus 3:5). Peter wrote to God’s scattered people in Asia Minor, that they were “hallowed to his service by the Spirit, and consecrated with the sprinkled blood of Jesus Christ” (1 Peter 1:2).

The Holy Spirit creates the fellowship of the saved ones by convicting the world in pointing out the true nature of sin and righteousness and the certainty of judgment based upon accountability. He does it by bringing the testimony of Jesus to bear on human hearts, leading all who are obedient thereto into the one body by immersion and fitting them to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Thus they share in the divine nature through a renewing of the mind in Christ Jesus. This introduces them into “fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ” (1 John 1:3). They become shareholders in the divine purpose, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ. They share in the suffering of Christ here and in his glory hereafter (Rom. 8:17). This closeness of identification of God and the believers is described as a mutual indwelling. "Hereby we know that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he has given us of his Spirit" (1 John 4:13). The fellowship of the saints is "the fellowship of the Spirit" by right of creation.

II. PROMOTION OF FELLOWSHIP

It is one thing to create and a wholly different thing to sustain that which is created. In any divine creation the originating and the maintaining power must be the same. Thus the universe was created by the power of His word and is now upheld by the word of His power (Hebrews 1:3). "By the word of God the heavens were of old" (2 Peter 3:5) and "the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store" (verse 7). The divine fellowship not only originated with, but is perpetuated by the Spirit. The means which he employs to further that fellowship form a thrilling subject for contemplation of all the redeemed ones.

1. The Holy Spirit makes the fellowship vital by bringing to each participant a real sense of "belonging." The very nature of fellowship demands that those involved realize a genuine feeling of togetherness, regardless of past relationships or present circumstances. Those who were children of disobedience and children of wrath, and who "in times past in the lust of the flesh, fulfilled the desires of the flesh and of the mind" must know that He "hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2:6). We are not only freed slaves but are adopted children. We are part of the family.

It is at this juncture that the indwelling Spirit provides assurance and gives certainty to our fellowship by making it possible for us to call out to our Father in our need. "The Spirit you have received is not a spirit of slavery leading you back into a life of fear, but a Spirit that makes us sons, enabling us to cry, 'Abba! Father!' In that cry the Spirit of God joins with our spirit in testifying that we are God's children" (Rom. 8:15, 16). Our fellowship is based on mutual sonship. We are the children of one father and are brothers if we are in the Lord. Many of our problems of brotherhood are psychological. While we seem to be skeptical of the standing of others it is our own inner conflicts and doubts which bother us. These are caused by our legalistic approach which always produces slavery instead of sonship. The indwelling Spirit makes it possible for us to respect others by producing a proper evaluation of self. "To prove that you are sons, God has sent into our hearts the Spirit of his Son, crying 'Abba! Father!' You are therefore no longer a slave but a son, and if a son, then also by God's own act an heir" (Gal. 4:6, 7).

Our disregard for our brethren, coupled with our judgment of them, is a reflection of our own state of insecurity. We imagine that we become more endeared to the Father by a self-righteous attitude which covers up our weakness by criticism of the failings of others. This is always inimical to fellowship and the Spirit within gives us a sense of relationship which calms our fears. "Let us therefore boldly approach the throne of our gracious God, where we may receive mercy and in his grace find timely help" (Heb. 4:16). "Let us make our approach in sincerity of heart and full assurance of faith, our guilty hearts sprinkled clean, our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10:22).

2. Fellowship is a state in which we are bound together by a common tie, for which reason koinonia is sometimes translated "communion." The Greek word is from the root koinon, which means "common." Of the many attributes which we must possess and wear as an enveloping garment, there is one which has power to draw together divergent elements and hold them together. "To crown all, there must be love, to bind all together and complete the whole” (Col. 3:14). J. B. Phillips translates this passage, “Above everything else, be truly loving, for love is the golden chain of all the virtues.”

Like so many requirements of the divine nature, this love must be supplied by God. He not only specifies the attribute essential to attainment of the human being but also provides the means of attainment. Man is not divine and can never become so while in the flesh. To expect divine nature of us is to expect what is impossible. But the Spirit which abides in us is divine and can project divine qualities through us if we surrender unto Him. One of these qualities is agape, love, and it is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). It is one of a catalog of attributes which can never be achieved by mere legalistic compliance. It is distinctly said, “There is no law dealing with such things as these.”

Those who have been justified by faith “have been allowed to enter the sphere of God’s grace” and in this sphere are enabled to exult “in the hope of the splendor which is to be ours.” Being still human and having often suffered from discouragement and frustration, there is danger that we may be filled with doubt about the fulfillment of our hope. Accordingly, we are given the assuring information that, “Such a hope is no mockery, because God’s love has flooded our inmost heart through the Holy Spirit he has given us” (Rom. 5:5). The deepest recesses of our inward being are flooded with love that drives out “envy, fits of rage, selfish ambitions, dissensions, party intrigues, and jealousies” (Gal. 5:20). None of these exotic plants can thrive in the full light of the warmth of love.

Without the Spirit there will be no outpouring of love to fill our hearts and without such love there can be no real “fellowship one with another.” “By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren” (1 John 3:16). Love is realized and identified only as we recognize the significance of the sacrifice of Jesus in our behalf. We were precious enough unto Him while we were yet sinners that He died for us. Paul says that in this, “God commended his love to us.” John says, “In this is love, not that we loved God but that he loved us and sent His Son to be the expiation for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another. No man has ever seen God; if we love one another, God abides in us and his love is perfected in us.”

It is not by mere chance that the next statement reads, “By this we know that we abide in him and he in us, because he has given us of his own Spirit” (1 John 4:13). Without his Spirit we cannot have his love. Without that love there can be no genuine brotherhood. Our divisions are not, as we so often think of them, testimonies to our faithfulness but indications of our lovelessness. We dare not wait until our brethren are sinless and free from error to commend our love to them, for God commended his love to us when we were yet sinners. This love is a love for the unworthy and it is a love that does something for them. It commends itself to them. It sacrifices itself for those who least deserve it.

Since Jesus gave his life to obtain the fellowship of the saints it will do us well to question what we have ever done to maintain it. We are distinctly told that he pleased not himself, and from this the apostle reasons, “Let each of us please his neighbor for his good to edify him” (Romans 15:2). One cannot have God’s way by insisting on having his own way. Yet there are many divisions among brethren in the religious world which stand as shameful monuments to an inflexible will which often mistakes self-gratification for fidelity to God. We need to cultivate that love which is understanding and forgiving. “But concerning love of the brethren you have no need to have any one write to you, for you yourselves have been taught by God to love one another” (1 Thess. 4:9) God did not teach us love by writing a letter but by sending His Son to die. The cross is the rallying standard of our fellowship.

3. The Holy Spirit promotes fellowship by revealing unto us the true nature and status of Jesus and by transforming our lives from one degree of glory to another on an ascending plane to make us more like Him. One function of the Spirit was to glorify Jesus. “He will glorify me, for he will take what is mine and declare it unto you” (John 16:14). When Paul “preached Christ crucified” in Corinth, he declared that it was “in demonstration of the Spirit and power” (1 Cor. 2:4). No one comprehended the thoughts of God but the Spirit of God (verse 11). These things “God has revealed unto us through the Spirit” (verse 10). The apostles received the Spirit of God to enable them to understand (verse 12) and they imparted these things in words taught by the Spirit (verse 13).

The gist of the message was that “He is the source of your life in Christ Jesus, whom God made our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1:30). If Jesus is everything, then anything else apart from Jesus is nothing. All doctrine finds its relevance only as it is related to Jesus. Any discussion of doctrine for doctrine’s sake is useless and futile. It is powerless to make one righteous unless it leads to identification with him who has been made our righteousness. All study for the mere purpose of gaining wisdom is wasted unless it submerges and overwhelms our being in Him who has been made our wisdom. It matters little how many things in the Bible we know if we do not know Him. It is knowing Him that is “eternal life” (John 17:3).

The Christian system is not a philosophy. It was not propounded by philosophers nor couched in philosophic terms. It is not a systematic theology. It is personal and invested in a Person. He is not to be accepted merely because he is a better teacher of moral values and ethical standards than others, but because He is the Son of God. He is the center and circumference of God’s revelation. That which does not proceed from him has no authority; that which does not lead to him has no value. One of the outstanding causes of strife and division has been the undue emphasis on things of minor importance. As we become engrossed in such matters Jesus is forced to fade into the background and we divest ourselves of his character to defend our concepts of his doctrine. When any point of argument becomes more important than the object of all faith our fidelity is misplaced.

There is no force in any religious system reduced to a purely rationalistic or legalistic code, which can hold all men—rich and poor, great and small, learned and unlearned—together in one body. It matters not if such a system originate in heaven or on earth. Only the magnetic personality of one directly related to our yearning and needs can ever accomplish the task. When Jesus is elevated and held aloft he draws all men unto him. The Holy Spirit, in the revelation, leads us into greater oneness by enlarging our concept of the fulness of his life. “For in him the whole fulness of deity dwells bodily, and you have come to fulness of life in him” (Col. 2:9, 10). In him we have “put off the old nature with its practices and have put on the new nature, which is being renewed in knowledge after the image of its creator” (3:9, 10). We are instructed to “put on then, as God’s chosen ones, holy and beloved, compassion, kindness, lowliness, meekness and patience, forbearing one another and, if one has a complaint against another, forgiving one another; as the Lord has forgiven you, so you also must forgive.”

The apostles, filled with the Spirit, had not time for and gave no space to the discussion of the many trivial points of difference which must have plagued both the Jewish and Gentile disciples. Relative to all such they simply urged, “Mend your ways, heed my appeal, agree with one another, live in peace, and the God of love and peace be with you.” Such problems of difference were to be left to God to adjust since he alone understood the motivation. “Who are you to pass judgment on the servant of another?”

Doctrine which attacked the position and primacy of Jesus was rebuked with severity. Those doctrines which were of such gravity as to separate from God were dealt with unrelentingly. These were doctrines of demons which caused men to give heed to seducing spirits. They were doctrines which scattered the sheep and drew away disciples after designing men, the kind of men who “denied the Lord that bought them.” Any point of difference among the disciples of the Master ought to be measured against the Master himself. If it is not as important as his blood it ought not be allowed to separate us from those who have been cleansed by that blood. We are blood-brothers of the Lamb. That which has been purchased by His blood should never be sold cheaply nor sacrificed for anything of lesser value.

That which separates from God is the opposite of that which unites with God. We leave God by a reversal of the procedure which brought us unto God. We come to God by an acceptance of His Son and by pledging our allegiance unto him. It is obvious that rejection of Jesus and refusal to longer give our allegiance to him will sever us from God. That which will not separate from God is not of sufficient importance to separate us from each other. When we allow any such thing to separate us it is obvious that we think more of it than we do of Jesus. In fact, we substitute a belief in that thing as a Savior for we postulate that unless a man believe in it he cannot be saved. Since Christ cannot be divided it is evident that those who are divided are trusting in something besides Jesus to save them. Frequently it is their own self-righteousness!

The Holy Spirit has revealed that Jesus is the center of our unity as well as its foundation. Obedience to Jesus is the only test of fellowship authorized by God and likeness to Jesus is the only test of character. We must be transformed to have the likeness of Jesus. Only through the indwelling Spirit can this be accomplished. “And we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into His likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit.” As we become like Jesus we become richer in mercy, grace and kindness. Our perspective is changed until we have a proper sense of value which enables us to make allowances for one another in love.

4. The Holy Spirit promotes unity by helping our weakness in prayer. Regardless of who or what may be to blame for our present divided state in Christendom, it is evident that we have failed to preserve peace among God's children. We have allowed ourselves to become fractured and fragmented until our schisms are a scandal and a shame. We must be humbled and humiliated by our tragic miscarriage of the divine purpose. Family ties have been disrupted and severed. We need to call upon the Father with broken and contrite hearts.

Unfortunately, we do not know how to present our petitions in an acceptable fashion. We fall short in prayer as we do in peace. It is in this emergency the Spirit comes to our aid. "Likewise the Spirit helps us in our weakness; for we do not know how to pray as we ought, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words. And he who searches the hearts of men knows what is the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God" (Romans 8:26, 27). An analysis of the content of this verse will prove to be one of the most rewarding adventures of the spiritual life. It is like going down into a mine filled with gems and being told to help yourself to these precious treasures. Almost every word is rich with promise.

Do not forget that Jesus promised he would send another Helper to abide with us during His absence. This passage positively affirms that the Spirit helps us. One area in which he assists is mentioned. This by no means exhausts his help but is an example of what he does for us. There are things we ought to do. These constitute a responsibility as well as a privilege. Notice the expression, "We do not know how." It is true that in our weakness we do not know how to do some of the things we ought to do. One of our problems is how to pray. How can we convey our deepest inner desires and strivings unto God? How is it possible to translate the soul-yearning into the language of the tongue?

All language is but a combination of sounds. There are no combinations adequate to communicate the deepest emotion which tugs at a broken heart. Such a feeling is too deep for words. "But the Spirit himself intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words." The Spirit cannot supply the yearning. He intercedes but does not interfere with the thought processes. It is our desire he conveys and he cannot intercede for a heart that is waste and void. That is what is meant by the expression, "He who searches the hearts of men knows what is the mind of the Spirit." It is obvious that the prayer must originate in the heart of man. God is able to search the heart. He knows the longing exists. He also knows the mind of the Spirit.

In 1 Corinthians 2:11 we are told that the Spirit knows the mind of God. In Romans 8:27 we are told that God knows the mind of the Spirit. This is infinite knowledge and it is also proof of the personality of the Spirit. He has a mind, he knows, and is known. "The Spirit intercedes for the saints." The saints are those in Christ, the holy ones, the children of God. The Spirit dwells in the heart of every saint. "Because you are sons, God has sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts" (Gal. 4:6). "God's love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given to us" (Rom. 5:5). "He has put his seal upon us and given us his Spirit in our hearts as a guarantee" (2 Cor. 1:22). The Spirit inhabits the hearts of the saints. He is in position to intercede for their needs because he is in the place where their desires originate. He knows our minds and God knows His.

The first real step toward securing of unity is a sense of personal remorse for our disunity. None of us is wholly guiltless. Those who claim to be are frequently among the most culpable of all. Their arrogant, loveless, and accusing spirit is the very thing responsible for strife and dissension. There must be confession and this must be accompanied by a hunger for peace and a passion for brotherhood. If this is so intense and ardent that no words can be found to express it the Spirit will intercede in our behalf. It is at this juncture that the legalistic attitude defeats the divine procedure. It is thought that we must debate ourselves into agreement upon every matter of doctrinal difference before we can have unity. Every action of every faction must be argued out to the satisfaction of all; every contention of every community must be contested to a standstill before we can proceed. If it be true that our unity is “the unity of the Spirit” we need to surrender to the power of the Spirit and allow him the freedom to operate freely in our behalf. Those who truly desire unity should not meet to debate but to pray. The procedures of the past have only produced partition and partisanship. In their implementation lies no hope for a better day.

I have been anxiously awaiting that time when the divided heirs of the restoration movement in some community, would include in their programs for the year a “sweet hour of prayer” one Lord’s Day afternoon each month— twelve such seasons of prayer in a year. As I envision it such meetings should be devoted exclusively to prayer. The specific purpose would be confession upon our knees, and the imploring of the Father to lead us out of our present state of confusion and strife. There should be no songs, no readings, no talks. Invitations to join in the meeting should be sent to all segments of the brotherhood of saints. Those who gather before the hour should avoid collecting in groups to discuss but should go directly to their seats for silent meditation. Promptly at the hour appointed the one who presides should call upon all who are burdened and distressed by the state of the Christian world to “take it to the Lord in prayer.” When every one has prayed or when the hour is finished, the president should end it with a solemn benediction.

Those who leave the building should do so quietly and reverently. Any greeting should be soft and subdued. There should be no refreshments served after such a gathering. Indeed it might be well if those who came to the hour of prayer would fast on that day until after the occasion and in preparation for it. Those who have the courage to inaugurate such a program would need the faith that knows no frustration. They must be prepared for only a few consecrated ones at the first few meetings. The meetings would not even be announced by the elders or clergy in many congregations. These often stand between their flocks and unity in Christ. Thus “the fellowship of the concerned ones” who meet to pray the first time would need to petition the Father for the Holy Spirit to surge through and work mightily in the hearts of those not present and to open up great doors and effectual by which to reach them.

Perhaps only one congregation in a community would be willing to make available their facilities at first but as others became interested and invitations were extended the meetings should be held in different places. The prayer band of saints should not be afraid to go anywhere to pray for peace. We may meet with any person or group upon our knees before that throne “where every knee should bow and every tongue should confess.” In a meeting where all cry out unto God from anguished hearts and do so voluntarily, there is no question of “recognition or endorsement” of others because no one has to call upon any other. Only the Father determines who is worthy and who is not. Only the Spirit knows whom to aid!

I might be mistaken about any prediction of results, but judging from past events, I would not be at all surprised if out of such throwing ourselves into the arms and upon the mercy of God, there would come a great revival. It could well be that in such an area where the prayers and tears of the saints mingled, all that was worthwhile in the restoration movement as a contribution to our contemporary needs would be reanimated and a fire be kindled by the winds of God fanning the dying embers, that would again sweep over a world thinking in terms of unity. The Holy Spirit has not lost his power. We have only nullified and negated it in our generation by our prejudices and littleness. We have quenched the Spirit by thinking only in terms of partisan growth as opposed to genuine kingdom extension.

Such a prayer council of all “the concerned ones” carried on regularly, and augmented as other hearts were touched, would identify the attendants with Jesus on the night of his betrayal. It was then he prayed for all who believe in him through the testimony of the envoys, that they all might be one in the Father and the Son. Jesus was literally very close to the cross when he thus prayed. We would be able to draw near and “kneel at the cross” upon such occasions as I have outlined. We must never forget that our blessed Lord conditioned the acceptance of Him by those who believe not, upon the oneness of those who believe. The world will be won to believe in Christ, when those who believe are one in Christ! What good will it do, in the final analysis, for us to expand missionary budgets and send men to the four corners of the earth to plant rival parties to divide those who are led to believe in him? Humble men, with little finance, but backed by our united prayers and efforts could do a great deal more if we could wholly enlist the Spirit to act unreservedly through us to convict the world. But the Holy Spirit cannot promote the party spirit, for this is a work of the flesh.

Perhaps there are those who will object that as much could be done if each individual prayed alone in his own closet. Let me not be thought of as minimizing the value of private prayer. Indeed we need prayers at home daily in behalf of just such meetings as I have mentioned. But it is a part of God’s design that we accomplish the purpose of heaven in a koinonia, a fellowship of the redeemed and sanctified ones. A lone wolf policy is not adapted to sheep.

The ekklesia of God burst in upon the world as the climax of a prayer meeting. “They went up to the upper room, where they were staying, . . . All these with one accord devoted themselves to prayer.” “They went to their friends and reported . . . And when they heard it, they lifted their voices together to God . . . And when they had prayed, the place in which they were gathered together was shaken; and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit and spoke the word of God with boldness.” “When he realized this, he went to the house of Mary . . . where many were gathered together and were praying.”

God does not need a great prairie fire sweeping over the landscape in order to begin his work of answering the prayer of His beloved Son. If we can but unite our forces in prayer, this is a sufficient spark of unity with which to commence. If we are willing to confess our failure to keep the bond of peace and join in confessing that we have fallen short of the divine ideal, such casting down of ourselves will enable the Lord to lift us up.

Nehemiah began his work of restoration by reminding God that, while His people were scattered, He had promised that, upon their reformation, “though your dispersed be under the farthest skies, I will gather them thence and bring them to the place which I have chosen.” God’s people were powerless to return to the place He had ordained for them. But they could return to the person who had called them to be His own. When they did this He could “gather them” and “bring them.” In the same way we cannot see our way out of the Babylon of confusion in which we have become entangled. We do not need to do so. It is the divine task to gather and bring us home. It is our responsibility to turn to God from our factional ways. We do not need to know the way to return, we need to turn to the Way!

A good way for us to begin is like Nehemiah began. Certainly it proved to be effective in his case. “I now pray before thee day and night for the people of Israel thy servants, confessing the sins of the people of Israel, which we have sinned against thee. Yea, I and my father’s house have sinned.” The fact that God’s people were where they should not have been was testimony to their sin. The fact that we are in a condition where we ought not to be is proof of our failure. We need to quit defending the mistakes of our fathers. Their partisan attitudes afford no adequate foundation on which we should build among our contemporaries. Adding fuel to feuds may destroy the world but it cannot save it!

“The Spirit himself intercedes for us.” What a powerful prayer-helper we have. Why should we spurn this divine Comforter and Assistant? Why should we quench the Spirit any longer? “The Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God.” Is it not the will of God that we be one in Christ Jesus? Is it not the will of God that there be “no schism in the body”? Is it not the will of God that we “all speak the same thing”? Is there anything too great for the Spirit to accomplish if we surrender wholly and unreservedly to him? If we could help ourselves out of our predicament why did Jesus send us “another Helper”? Is not the presence of the Spirit among us proof of our own helplessness? If the Spirit brooding over the primeval state of the world brought order out of chaos, why can he not do the same for the chaotic state of the new creation? He can! He will if we will allow him to work effectually in us. “The power at work within us is able to do far more abundantly than all that we ask or think” (Eph. 3:20). As Alfred Lord Tennyson said, “More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of.”

III. PROTECTION OF FELLOWSHIP

The Holy Spirit is active in this world today. The power which brought the universe into existence has not been minimized or lessened. Our God is a God of history. His hand can be traced in the affairs of the nations. There is a design which is divine and this design is being worked out by mankind. All men are servants of God, either voluntarily or involuntarily. Even those who think to thwart his purpose are made to fulfill it. It can be said of many more than the brothers of Joseph, “As for you, you meant evil against me, but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive, as they are today” (Gen. 50:20).

The sacred scriptures reveal that it was God’s intention to effect his will in our lives through a fellowship, that is, a community of the called out ones. These constitute the “life brigade” in a dying world. They are in the fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ. They have accepted the testimony of those who saw “the eternal life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us.” They are children of light. They are addressed as “children of God without blemish in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom you shine as lights in the world, holding forth the word of life” (Phil. 2:15, 16). All of the called ones constitute one great fellowship, or body, as distinguished from those who have not responded to the call. They have not only been called out of something, but they have also been called into Someone.

The called ones are God’s own people. “But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. Once you were no people but now you are God’s people; once you had not received mercy but now you have received mercy” (1 Peter 2:9, 10). God’s people have all been baptized into one body by the one Spirit and they all freely drink of that one Spirit. Thus the fellowship is created and maintained by the Spirit. There is but one Spirit and consequently there can be but one body of the called out ones. Jesus is distinctly said to be the head of the soma (body), the ekklesia (called out ones).

In the constant contact and conflict with the world there is an ever present danger that the called saints will forget their real sense of mission. This danger is intensified when it appears that the Lord delays His coming. Because of such delay some fall victims to the propaganda of false philosophers who assert the impossibility of termination of the present order based upon the continuity of the past (2 Peter 3). Others return to their former state, “having loved this present world” (2 Tim. 4:10). Perhaps an even more prevalent problem is that members of the divine family get on each other’s nerves during the long interval. They fall out among themselves and look upon each other as enemies instead of as fellow servants of the same Lord. Some become dogmatic, assertive and arrogant, and disrupt the peace and order of the household. Jesus spoke of a certain type of servant who said, “My master is delayed in coming,” and who began to beat the menservants and the maidservants (Luke 12:45).

Since the divine plan of the ages cannot be overthrown permanently, and since it involves a koinonia of the ekklesia, that is, a fellowship of the called ones, the Spirit must protect and preserve this fellowship in spite of all of the attempts of Satan to destroy it. It is our personal conviction that the Spirit providentially directs the affairs of the kingdom of heaven on earth during the absence of our King. When the spiritual state becomes arid and dry, springs of hope are made to burst forth and create oases in the desert. When sectarianism and factionalism become rife and men despair of ever having peace again, there comes a period of “Great Awakening.” These are “times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.”

The Spirit works through men, the divine Agent collaborating with human agency. Every reformer and restorer who calls the people of God to return to their true sense of mission has been used by the Spirit. Often, because of the great darkness which covers the earth during their generation, these can see but dimly. We must never judge the reformers of one age or place by those in another era or locality. Progress can never be measured by how far one has to go but by how far he has come. One can only walk in the light that is available unto him. It would be interesting to know what would have been accomplished by some of our modern critics of Luther and Calvin if they had been reared in the identical circumstances of these men. Considering the little impact we make upon the thinking of our own brethren in these days of mass media we should be humbled by the tremendous accomplishments of men in the past. We are warming ourselves by the fires that others have kindled.

We do not know all about how the Spirit works nor do we need to know. We can see the fruits and recognize the results. It is my own conviction that “the leaven concept” is vital to any understanding of the function of the Spirit in our age. Those who are wholly committed unto Christ Jesus radiate an influence that affects others whom they contact. We reproduce in our own lives in a meager way that which our great Example did in such magnificent fashion. The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us in order that we might translate the word into living flesh among those with whom we dwell. The Son of God became the Son of man that the sons of men might become sons of God. By his contact with the world of mankind, the world was transformed. We carry on the work of transformation in our age.

But with the passing of the centuries and the popularization of the Christian system, the line of demarkation between the world and the church becomes less clearly defined. The world assumes so much that belongs to the church and the church so much that belongs to the world, it is difficult to differentiate between the two. In the misty twilight zone which results there is ever the temptation to the faithful to withdraw from the social structure to preserve truth. In former days this was accomplished by creation of monastic orders. In these orders, rigid forms of discipline and self-denial were adopted to discourage the nominal professors and purge out the unworthy. In our modern day, although such orders still exist, the realm of Christendom has generally substituted the faction with its exclusivist attitude and closed door policy.

There is one difference between the monastic order and the factional system. The former was instituted in a time of loose morals when even the clergy practiced and publicly sanctioned licentious behavior. The monastery was primarily a sanctuary from immorality and vice. Now that Christianity has influenced the world in the moral realm until civil governments generally prohibit and punish immorality, the urge to separate from society for the purpose of preserving moral purity is seldom present. There are few indeed who withdraw to caves to live as religious hermits. The feeling is prevalent that one possessed of high moral ideals should remain in contact with the social structure and battle within its framework for a realization of the code he believes to be beneficial for the well-being of mankind.

The result is a change of emphasis. In a world of moral overtones where intellects are highly trained and men have the leisure to engage in research, when universities are scattered throughout the world and thought transmission is universal in a matter of minutes, the great problem is preservation of mental integrity and purity of thought. It is one of semantics and dogmatics as opposed to one of physical relationships. Again the temptation to withdraw from what is deemed doctrinally corrupt is impelling! Factions replace the caves of the consecrated hermits and the monasteries of the loyal ones.

It is true that some sects practice a rigid behavioral code, making certain acts condoned or ignored by others, as tests of admission to or of the continuance in their society. In a majority of cases, however, the test is some doctrinal facet which acts as a barrier to separate the faction from those who do not regard it as particularly significant to the development of Christian maturity, and who are, therefore, branded as liberals, compromisers, or false teachers. The doctrinal test which may consist of a particular attitude toward cups, classes, colleges, or a multitude of other things, tangible and intangible, actually constitutes a form of discipline to hold the adherents "in line." As men have tortured their physical persons to drive out evil and promote chastity, so in an intellectual age they place their minds in a straitjacket of partisan conformity in the hope that by sacrificing their liberty to think they may avoid licence and preserve purity of thought and doctrine.

It is not our intention or purpose to pursue the psychological aspects of the party spirit which make it possible for otherwise brilliant men to defend the most exclusivist type of sectarianism while they vehemently deny that they are sectarian at all. This field of exploration must await another time and occasion. Suffice it to say that the various forms of escapism, including the monastic and factional, are clearly the result of a misconception of the nature of truth. A goodly number of people hold to certain truths who are quite ignorant of the nature of truth. Just as it is possible within the physical realm for people to beget or adopt children who know but little of the nature of man, so they can conceive or adopt certain truths while wholly unaware of the nature of truth.

Truth is imperishable. It requires no defence or protection to insure its own survival. Its ultimate victory over error is assured. The Spirit operates in and through revealed truth to effect the divine aim. When truth is brought into contact with error its effectiveness is multiplied. Leaven cannot achieve its purpose or potential unless it directly affects the mass or lump. Jesus, as the truth, came all the way from heaven to make contact with sinful men. The partisan religionists of his day sought to “bottle him up” and keep him from directly encountering sinners. But he demonstrated the divine method of approach which is not at all one of sectarian bigotry or exclusivism. Jesus contacted both sectarians and sinners and associated with them without becoming either sectarian or sinful.

In our present state the religious parties, miscalled “churches,” require leavening. The constituents have made no real commitment to Christ Jesus. They do not respect his lordship over their lives. They have no true concept of that discipline which is the essence of Christian ethics. The transformation must be from within. It can only be wrought by the fellowship of the concerned ones. These constitute the true leaven in any group. When they withdraw they abandon the group to its fate and place themselves in a position where they are ineffective. They also form another party. Leaven on the refrigerator shelf is inactive. Leaven is not intended to affect or transform leaven.

The Spirit works through the fellowship of the concerned. These are the real leaven and if forced to have a separate identity it is only temporarily so. The spiritual leaven is a small lump with universal vision operating within and upon a larger party with private and provincial interest. The fellowship of the concerned seeks to lose itself in the great ocean of brotherly love; the larger party or sect seeks to protect and preserve itself by building dams of confinement and concealment. The Spirit operates in these times of schism by ecclesiolae in ecclesia (little churches within the church). Those who are called of God to work for unity of all believers must work within the framework of all believers who have been called. Many of these are factional in both outlook and outreach.

Leaven does not achieve its purpose by calling attention to itself. It does not separate to form one lump of leaven and another of dough. It can do nothing from a distance. It is not noisy, violent or abrupt. It does not agitate but permeates, its nature is to ferment rather than to foment, to inspire rather than to incite. It finds the greater life by losing its own. This is the true mission of the genuine ecumenical spirit. It is not to seek ways of salvaging denominational machinery from the tragic wreckage created by the tornadic winds of sectarianism. It is to affect the hearts of all who love the Lord with a sense of fellowship until all the members of the one body may function together in harmony and unison.

Life in the Spirit and with the Spirit is one of genuine adventure. In every adventure there is an element of risk but it is this very element which provides the challenge that summons men from the mundane to the heroic. It is this which impels men who labor daily in an office to train and discipline themselves and then travel thousands of miles to inch their way up the wind-swept slopes of a mountain such as Everest. Such men are called foolhardy by those whose stereotyped lives offer no greater challenge than a change of cereal for their morning breakfast. These critics seldom know the surging thrill that comes from conquest of the elements.

Jesus was the greatest adventurer of all. He met the challenge of the cross and its attendant agony without a whimper. Postulating that it was possible for one to love his enemies, he put this philosophy to the supreme test. Gazing down from the rude tree, upon the ones who had driven the spikes into the torn flesh of his hands and feet, he said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Almost everything that God has done in creation has contained an element of risk. Certainly this was the case in making man a rational being with the power and right of choice for if it is possible for man to choose there is always the possibility that he will choose not to follow God.

We tend to fish too close to shore and dabble in the shallows because it is safer. The result is that we toil all night and take nothing. We need to launch out into the deep and let down our nets. We were not born anew to specialize in the superficial or to scratch the surface. Our destiny is not to joust at windmills nor box at fleeting shadows on the wall. Too often we have lived empty lives because we have suffered from empty hearts— hearts in which the Holy Spirit has been grieved and quenched.

There is no greater challenge in our century than that which comes from active identification with the prayer of Jesus for the oneness of all who believe in Him through the testimony of the apostles. That testimony is being circulated to the remotest bounds of the earth. The printing press is the modern gift of tongues. Day and night, without ceasing, its whirling cylinders imprint the language of the Spirit upon the swiftly moving rolls of white. The trees of the forest, the rice straw from the fields, and the castoff clothing from our own backs, all are blended together into paper and made to bear the message of salvation until jungle-dwellers in the fastnesses along the Amazon and Orinoco, cry out again, "How hear we every man in our own tongue, wherein we were born?"

But the unification of those who believe the message has not kept pace with its circulation. As a result, those who were united in paganism have often been divided in Christendom. The scandal of the church is that it has allowed the message which was given to unite to become the source of its strife and contention. The fault lies not with the message but with our false emphasis. We have forsaken the unity of the Spirit because we have forgotten the spirit of unity. We must recapture the latter so we can openly manifest the former. We must think peace, preach peace, and practice peace.

This will not be an easy decision to make in our present distressed and distorted condition. All of us have been reared in certain factions or have grown up and come into them. Regardless of which faction we are affiliated with, those who are in it regard it as the church of God upon earth to the exclusion of all others. To extend the fraternal hand to others is equated with forsaking the Lord. Loyalty to the party is confused with fidelity to the one body. To share your knowledge with other groups will bring the accusation that you "have gone over to them." This will mean that you will be maligned, misrepresented, and calumniated, by those who have always been your associates. You will become the target of sarcasm, invective and aspersion.

If you have a real concern for unity of all believers your heart will be torn between conflicting emotions. The call of far places and great heights must be weighed against the inner clamor for conformity and orthodoxy. It is in such a strait that the Holy Spirit provides the answer. It is evident that divisions are created by those who deny the personality and indwelling of the Spirit. "It is these who set up divisions, worldly people, devoid of the Spirit" (Jude 19). The real power to risk all you have to gain all He has to offer comes from the vitality of the Spirit.

In his majestic treatise on the unity of the body, the apostle in 1 Corinthians 12, asserts that there are varieties of gifts, service and working, but only one Spirit. He declares, "To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good." Whether supernatural gifts in the supernatural era of the church, or natural gifts in the natural age of the church, it is the Spirit which empowers and makes them effective. The same Spirit by which we are baptized into one body is the Spirit by which we are sustained and maintained in that body. The fulfillment of our Christian vocation is the work of the Spirit. The strength is supplied by God for any service we render. "As each has received a gift, employ it for one another, as good stewards of God's varied grace: whoever speaks, as one who utters oracles of God; whoever renders service, as one who renders it by the strength which God supplies; in order that in everything God may be glorified through Jesus Christ" (1 Peter 4:10, 11).

We face a tremendous challenge in our age. There is evidence that there may be an impending break-through in the "unsound barrier" of division in the Christian domain. We have contributed much to the disunity of the past. What have we to contribute to the unity of the future? In a world filled with dissension we have added our parties and factions to augment the confusion. Can we measure up to the needs of a changing society in which the emphasis is upon unity? What do we have of a constructive nature to offer those who seek for oneness? Will we be content to plod along in our partisan exclusiveness, hoarding behind closed doors and high walls that which should be shared by all? Will we continue to castigate, execrate and anathematize those noble souls whose horizons expand until they heed the admonition to “Lift up your eyes and look upon the fields”?

The crying need of our age is for men filled with the Spirit of God, men who dare break with tradition, and if need be, die for the vision which they have cherished, until now it nourishes them. The call of God is borne upon every whispering breeze to those who have been enslaved by partisan positions, fettered by fears of reprisal, shackled by bigotry and littleness. The world will not be won to the Christ of a national ideal, to a white man's God, a denominational dogma, or a parochial creed. Jesus is not the shepherd of a sect but of the whole flock of God. He is not the Lord of a faction but of the whole church of the redeemed ones. A concept which embraces anything less than the ultimate unity of all who believe in Him as one mighty army, is too meager to match His prayer, and will be self-defeating. There is no power in the universe by which we can reduce the body of Christ into a faction or expand any faction into the body of Christ.

We reject the spurious proposal that we must remain apart and at sword's points until we have argued every action of every faction, debated every detail of every dogma, and reached conformity on every conclusion of every complainant among us. This is the sectarian way. It is the way of prolonged strife and drawn out dissension. We are not called to feud to the death but to find the life that is in Christ Jesus. Our peace is not in a program, a proposition or a platform. It is a person. “He is our peace who hath made both one.” The way to have unity is to unite, not have a debate. We cannot argue ourselves into agreement nor debate ourselves out of division! In all of our decades of debate we have not overthrown a single sect but we have created a great many new ones!

Let us resolve to make way for the Spirit and we will find the path of peace. We deny that the Spirit of God divides the family of God. It is men who are devoid of the Spirit who set up divisions. If we will allow the Spirit to have his way with us we will be united in the Way. Our problem is that we have been in the Spirit's way, rather than in the way of the Spirit. We have been hindering instead of helping, standing athwart the path instead of walking in it. We have gloried in our efforts, gloried in men, gloried in our partisan success. Let us now glory in the Lord— all of us! We can restore the spirit of the early saints if we return to the Spirit and allow Him to dwell in and motivate us. This is truly the great adventure of our day. It can be the crowning achievement of the twentieth century, overshadowing even the conquest of space. The Spirit challenges us to overcome our sectarian attitudes!

The Church Speaks of Discovering and Unleashing Hidden Powers

Mission Messenger (August 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

Editor's Note: This is a speech prepared for delivery at the North American Christian Convention, at Long Beach, California, June 27, 1963. The theme of the convention was "The Church Speaks in the Space Age" and the specific subjects were assigned by the Program Committee.

A short time ago I drove into a filling station which was featuring a sale on automobile batteries. A huge advertising banner was flapping in the breeze. On it were the words "Power-packed for perfect performance!" The thought occurred to me that the angels could have unfurled the same banner when the church of God was introduced to humanity. The primitive ekklesia was a spirit-saturated, power-possessing, might-manipulating, energy-exercising organism, before which no enemy could stand.

You are familiar with the expression, "The Greeks had a word for it!" Their versatile language had more than one word for power, but whatever the legitimate form of power described, the church possessed it. There was dunamis— the power of dynamite and dynamo. There was energeia— operative power— the power of functioning energy. There was exousia— delegated power— the power of authority and activity. There was ischnus— endowed power— the power to produce and propel.

What has happened to this magnificent spiritual body which would prompt someone to write the parody which I received in the mail several months ago, and which read,

Like a mighty tortoise

Moves the church of God;

Brothers, we are sitting

Where our fathers trod.

We are not united,

All divided we,

Torn and rent asunder,

Lacking charity!

I am to address myself tonight to the subject of discovering and unleashing hidden powers. Let us be sure that we understand the nature and scope of this investigation. Discovery is not creation. Columbus discovered America; Balboa discovered the Pacific Ocean; De Soto discovered the Mississippi River. Neither of these men created what he discovered. We create that which has not previously had existence; we discover that which has been here all of the time. The power to turn the wheels of factories and light a multitude of cities was always in Niagara Falls, but it was useless until man discovered it and harnessed it. I do not believe that a single atom has been created since God rested on the seventh day but the power of nuclear fission lay hidden in the buried heart of uranium until prospectors brought it to light and scientists released it from its elemental prison, to enable man to probe the far reaches of the heavens and to prowl the depths of the sea.

The church is not the source of power. Its purpose is not to create power but to channel it, not to crystallize it but to utilize it. The Psalmist declared, "God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God" (Psalm 62:11). The apostle said, "For there is no power but of God" (Romans 13:1). When David blessed the Lord before all of the congregation, he did so with the words, "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty" (1 Chron. 29:11). In the Hallelujah Chorus as recorded by John in Revelation 19:6, the voice of the great multitude chanted, "Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

"Omnipotent" is from the Latin. It is the equivalent of the Anglo-Saxon "Almighty." This word occurs fifty-six times in the Bible and every time it is applied to God. There cannot be two "Almighties." We must be careful that we do not think of omnipotence as merely a superlative degree of power possessed by God. When used of God it is not merely the sum of all power, but the all power of Someone. It is not the aggregate of potency but the attribute of a personality. Whatever power the church discovers or uncovers, it will be from God and belong to God.

When the church speaks of unleashing power it is evident that it has restrained, restricted and retarded the free movement of God's Spirit. That which has been suppressed must be expressed, that which has been stifled must be shared, that which has been held back must be held forth, that which has been sounded in must be sounded out. In too many instances the church is like Lazarus when he was raised from the dead, "bound hand and foot with grave clothes" (John 11:44). He was alive but powerless. He was all dressed up with no way to go. He was bound up, bound down, and bound around, until Jesus said, "Loose him, and let him go!"

The musty smell of the sepulcher exudes like the aroma of death from our winding-sheet of prejudice, indifference, traditionalism, and the party spirit. But the message of God concerning his people when they are powerless is always one of liberation. Whether Lazarus arrayed in ghostly garments, or Israel cringing under the lash of Egyptian taskmasters, the divine admonition is, "Let my people go." Whatever God wants done in any generation, he supplies the ability to do. The power to perform the divine purpose is present and available to the people of God. It is time that we free our feet from the fetters and face the future with full assurance that we need not fail. I want to suggest three areas of neglected power which would enable us like our Lord to go forth "conquering and to conquer."

1. THE PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS

On October 31, 1517, Martin Luther, the monk of Erfurt, nailed his ninety-five theses to the great door of the Castle Church in Wittenberg. Each stroke of his hammer echoed through the corridors of the great stone edifice and also reverberated through the recesses of the hollow heart of a decadent church. Majestic principles of spiritual action were again discovered and brought to light. Hope surged afresh through the souls of the concerned ones. And of all the verities which were re-affirmed, none was more important than that of "the priesthood of all believers." It was like the blow of an axe laid at the root of the tree of priest-craft, shivering the trunk of arrogant pretense and scattering the evil fruit of pomp, pride and pelf.

The Bible teaches that every child of God is a priest and there is but one high priest, the Son of God. Every person on earth who has been called from darkness into light, every one who has laid hold of the mercy of God, is in the priesthood of God. "But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a dedicated nation, and a people claimed by God for his own, to proclaim the triumphs of him who has called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. You are now the people of God, who once were not his people; outside his mercy once, you have now received his mercy” (1 Peter 2:9, 10). The word “people” is a translation of “laos” from which we get “laity.” All of God’s laity are priests. The royal priesthood is composed entirely of the laity of God.

Let us go one step further. God’s laity is his clergy. The word “clergy” is from “kleros” which means “heritage.” This is the word used in 1 Peter 5:3 where the elders, or bishops, are instructed not to lord it over God’s heritage. The heritage is equated with the flock of God. The word of God knows nothing of a clergyman or layman. These expressions are a part of the “speech of Ashdod” and demonstrate how effective was our sojourn in Babylon and how close to its environs some of us still remain. The Protestant world soon forgot the implication of a universal priesthood of believers and there is every evidence that many of us are treading on the same dangerous ground. The spirit of professionalized service rendered purely for the fee involved, rears its head throughout the land, and betokens the fact that it still lives to quench the Spirit and to throttle the gifts of the many. Indeed, when we speak of “gifts” today we have reference to that bestowed upon the church by the people, rather than that bestowed upon the people by the Father to be used in edifying one another.

We need to examine our vocabulary carefully. It is not enough to speak where the Bible speaks but we must also speak as the Bible speaks. When we do we will come to realize that ministry is not something done to the church, but that which is done by the church— the whole church! Every Christian is a minister. One enters “the ministry” by coming into Christ. That which makes one a child of God makes him a minister of God. We do not go away to study to become ministers, although those who have become ministers may go away to study. You can no more make a man a minister of God by handing him a diploma than you can make him a priest of God by giving him a certificate. Men can make clergymen, and if they are made, men will have to do it, but only God can make us ministers of God, and he makes all of us his ministers because he is no respecter of persons.

Because we have lost sight of this concept of the church we have forsaken the ideal of the Master for our lives. He said, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." But the sons of God now come, not to minister, but to be ministered unto. The result is that the saints are no longer participants in the arena but spectators in the grandstand. The pulpit has become the sacred precinct of a professional dramatist and resembles the stage for a polished performance rather than a speaker's stand for sharing life and experience of others of like precious faith.

Thus the congregation is spoon-fed for years and never learns to feed itself. The fact is that we are delivering babies who never intend to grow, enrolling students who never intend to graduate, enlisting soldiers who never intend to fight, and registering racers who never intend to run. Our motto has become, "There he is Lord, send him!" The Ship of Zion is no longer manned by a volunteer crew working for sheer love of the Captain, but is steered by a pilot and an assistant pilot, while the remainder are paying passengers who are going along for the ride and complaining as they go. Many congregations are made up of half-converted individuals who think that when Jesus said we were to be childlike, he meant "childish" and they have to be petted and pampered to even keep them coming, much less to minister to others.

The tragedy of this is recognized when we remember that, in a world bursting at the seams with a population explosion, the preachers of the gospel who should be taking the message to the lost, are tied up and tied down, by having to salvage those who profess to be saved. Men spend years in preparing themselves to reach the masses with the Message and then are forced to become glorified "flunkies" at the beck and call of every petulant member with some pettifogging and pusillanimous problem. By the time the erstwhile gospel proclaimer considers complaints, referees ridiculous ruckuses, rounds up recalcitrants, placates the members of the official board, and the unofficial members who are just plain bored, he has not only had it, but it has gotten him!

It is astounding how much dead timber and dead weight there is in the average congregation. Dead timber produces no fruit and dead weight must be dragged along. Somewhere along the way we have missed the very essence of the Christian concept and the result is that we have the greatest accumulation of unused talent and the richest deposit of untouched ability of any group of people on earth. If we are going to be honest in our plea for restoration it is time that we begin to revolutionize our thinking so that every soldier will don the armor and every child of God will be active in ministering.

The primitive church did not send out missionaries. It was missionary! One reason the missionary society problem did not trouble them was because there was no one who could attend a meeting to discuss ways and means of taking the Good News to the lost. They were all out doing it. The entire church was scattered abroad and all those who were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word.

Our greatest source of power is not in the pulpit but in the lives of those in the pews. We must meet the challenge of making every man of God a man of might. We must use our meetinghouses, not for parading profound pulpiteers, but for training soldiers in spiritual combat. We have moved the battlefield into the mess-hall and our brethren spend their time fighting each other. Let us discover and utilize the tremendous power in the priesthood of all believers, a power that is all too often siphoned off down the drain of disuse and discouragement.

2. THE SANCTIFICATION OF ALL BELIEVERS

God's people constitute a new creation. "Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has passed away, behold, the new has come" (2 Cor. 5:17). A man can no more create himself anew than he could create himself in the beginning. The creation of man belongs to the creator and not to the creature. So the very next verse says, "All this is from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself." The purpose of salvation, as related to Christ, is described by Paul in the words, "He gave himself for us to redeem us from all iniquity and to purify for himself a people of his own who are zealous for good deeds" (Titus 2:14).

"A people of his own." This is the designation of those who pledge allegiance to God's Son. Again the apostle declares, "For we are the temple of the living God, as God said, 'I will live in them and among them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people' (2 Corinthians 6:16). The conclusion is, "Since we have these promises, beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from every defilement of body and spirit, and make holiness perfect in the fear of God" (2 Cor. 7:1). Sanctification and holiness are translations of the same word. To be holy is to be sanctified.

It is to be regretted that the word "saint" has fallen into disuse among us. It was used no less than sixty-two times in the new covenant scriptures to describe the believers in Christ, and every time but one it is in the plural. Being a child of God is not an exclusive relationship. God has no "only" children in Christ. There is no place for a "lone wolf" attitude in the flock of God. The world thinks of a saint as someone canonized after death by other men. But if you are not a saint before you die, what someone else does after you die will not make you one. We need to recapture that sanctification which alone can make saints.

Nothing is more startling than to contrast the lives of the primitive saints with those of our modern brethren who claim to be children of the same Father. Theirs was a constant career of adventure in the Spirit. They lived recklessly and fought relentlessly on the frontiers of faith. They refused to be scared out, starved out, or stamped out. What could the world do with a man like Paul? They threw him in jail and a little after midnight he converted the jailer and his whole family. They sent him bound to the prison in Rome and he started a congregation in Caesar's household. When they threatened to cut his head off he declared that he had a desire to depart and be with Christ, when they agreed to let him live he declared he would die preaching the Word. What weapons are effective against people who regard death as the gate to glory, and who cannot be bribed into substitution, beaten into submission or battered into subjection.

Why were the early Christians different? I think it was because all of them were conscious that they had died and been raised again. Only new men can live new lives! I would not minimize the importance of baptism. No one can any more strongly affirm its essentiality than I do. But I wonder sometimes if our emphasis upon this subject, which is our reaction to the de-emphasis of the religious world about us, may not have conveyed a wrong impression to those whom we have led to Christ. Baptism can transfer us but cannot transform us. It can change our state but not our nature. Our spirits are made new by the Holy Spirit. "He saved us, not because of deeds done by us in righteousness, but in virtue of his own mercy, by the washing of regeneration, and renewal in the Holy Spirit, which he poured out upon us richly through Jesus Christ our Savior" (Titus 3:5, 6).

Our source of personal power is the indwelling Spirit. Paul prays to the Father that "he may grant you to be strengthened with might through his Spirit in the inner man" (Eph. 3:16). Our problem is the age-old one of those who begin in the Spirit but seek to be made perfect by the flesh. The way of "perfection by flesh" is the way of legalism with its deadening conformity and paralysis of conscience. It seeks to be good by pressures from without, instead of by the divine presence that is within. “If you live according to the flesh you will die, but if by the Spirit you put to death the deeds of the body you will live” (Rom. 8:13).

No man can be made truly good by law, not even divine law, for there are some things law cannot do because of the weakness of the flesh. Law can keep one from doing things that are evil because of fear of penalty or reprisal. But merely abstaining from evil is not all that is involved in the good life, for goodness is not negative, but positive. One can be full of legal precepts who is not full of the Spirit. Some mighty wicked men believe some mighty good things.

The fact is that we are either under the reign of sin or the rule of the Spirit. We must either live for self or the Savior. The one who is under the dominion of sin is powerless; the one who is filled with the Spirit is filled with power. It is vital to our spiritual existence that we reaffirm the truth with reference to the indwelling Spirit, so that our lives may be purged, purified and purposeful. We can develop the divine nature only with divine help. The world has no potent weapon against the consecrated life. Men can debate theories of holiness but there is no argument against the life of holiness. When all of the believers are wholly committed unto Christ so he can convey his holiness unto us through the Spirit, we will become “more than conquerors.” We need to be purged from sin, purified from sham, and pledged to the Savior. Then we will be sheep led by a Shepherd and not cattle driven before a storm.

3. THE UNITY OF ALL BELIEVERS

We are the heirs of a noble movement, inaugurated by brilliant but humble men, to “unite the Christians in all of the sects.” Their effort was launched at a time when sectarianism was rife and warring partisans called down heaven’s blessing upon their respective divisive establishments. We have lived to see a complete reversal of that attitude. Schism is now regarded as the scandal of modern Christendom. The sectarian spirit is decried by the children of those who once defended it. There is an almost universal abhorrence of religious strife and this feeling is driving men everywhere toward unity.

It is the tragedy of our own history that, having begun so auspiciously, we have “fallen out by the way” and instead of becoming a catalyst to bring together divergent elements, we constitute one of the most divided movements in the contemporary American picture. We have contributed to the number of factions and fragments in the past; it remains to be seen whether we can contribute anything vital to the unity of the future. I do not hold with those who would abandon the ideal of restoration, but I am not so much concerned for “restoring the restoration movement,” as I am in recapturing that spirit which gave it incentive and impetus.

The movement was an outgrowth of the implementation of those methods and means which were considered to be best adapted to the needs of that generation in forwarding the purpose of God. The fact that it was regarded as a “movement” and not as the church, proves that it was not to become stodgy, staid or static. We should not be shackled by blind devotion to outmoded expressions or experiments, nor should we be stampeded by wide-eyed amazement into adoption of anything in our generation which will make the ideal of God unattainable. Our problem is intensified because we have inherited not only the feeling for fellowship which animated our fathers, but also the subsequent feuds which decimated their successors.

Our Lord prayed for the unity of all who believe in him. With the shadow of the cross falling over his pathway, he first prayed for his chosen envoys, and then said, “Neither pray I for these alone, but for all those who shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one, as thou Father art in me, and I in thee, that they all may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me.” This is the foundation of all Christian unity. It is the point at which we must place our Jacob’s staff for any survey of the promised land of peace.

Observe that it is a universal unity. It involves all those who accept the testimony of the apostles. These were the divinely chosen and qualified witnesses. Those who reject their word do not truly believe in Jesus at all. He declared, “He that rejecteth you, rejecteth me.” In every test of the validity of faith, the assaying scales must be the apostolic word. In a great time of spiritual crisis when the foundations of faith were being assailed by antichrists, the apostle John wrote, “We are of God. Whoever knows God listens to us, and he who is not of God does not listen to us. By this we know the spirit of truth and the spirit of error” (1 John 4:6).

Our unity must be personal. We are to be one as Jesus and the Father are one. Fellowship is a relationship between persons. It is not necessarily related to things, as the very word “fellow” proves. Fellowship is the sharing with others of a common life. It is not the sharing of the same opinions, ideas or interpretations. These things may present problems in the fellowship, and they may cause tensions among those who are in the fellowship, but they do not create fellowship, and by the same token, they need not destroy it. We are in the fellowship with each other because we are in Christ Jesus. It is not that we are all in the same place but in the same person that makes us one.

Our unity must be visible. If it is not exhibited practically the world cannot visualize it and it will have no impact for good. Jesus conditions the acceptance of himself by the world on the oneness of those in the world who have accepted him. The world will be won to believe in Christ when those in the world who believe in Christ are one. Those of us who are within the framework of the restoration movement have a dual task to perform. Now that we have allowed ourselves to become divided we must find the means of healing the breaches in our own walls that we may again get on with the task of helping to unite the Christians in all of the sects.

The divided world of our day will never accept the testimony of one Lord from a divided church. Actually, however, we have a greater unity than we have realized, because unity is the gift of God through the Spirit. Our task is not so much to create unity as to recognize it. We are not instructed to attain unto unity of the Spirit but to maintain it. One attains to that which he has not previously had; he maintains that which he has previously held. A lack of recognition of this has produced tragic consequences on missionary fields where those who lived at peace with each other in paganism have been set to fighting against each other under Christianity.

The greatest challenge of this age is the one presented by our dissension and disunity. This is our worst foe because it is a hydra-headed monster we have created and nurtured and which will devour us and all we hold dear if we continue to defend its right of existence. If it be true that the world will be led to believe in Jesus by an exhibition of our unity, we seek in vain to conquer the universe for Christ by merely pumping finance into partisan programs abroad. What is to be gained in the long run by sending men to call the heathen out of darkness who cannot even call upon each other to lead in prayer to the Father?

We are divided because we have thought in terms of division. We are today just where our thinking has brought us. We shall be tomorrow exactly where our thinking takes us. If we desire unity we must think in terms of unity. We must proclaim unity instead of division. We must distinguish between the word of life and the strife of words. It is for this reason that I have resolved never again to encourage factionalism or division among the saints of God. I have dedicated my life to trying in my very feeble and meager way to restore peace among the adherents of all the dissident factions. I regard every sincere baptized believer in our Lord Jesus Christ as a child of God.

Wherever my father has a child I have a brother. I am convinced that he has many children and I have many brethren who have never even heard of the restoration movement. That movement is not the church and should never be confused with it. There is only one church now, there never was but one, and there will never be another. The church is a divine creation and a divine organism. It is not a human organization. A man might as well try to create another God as to create another church. The church is the body of my blessed Lord and is composed of all the saved of all the earth.

The church of God was on earth before Thomas Campbell read his "Declaration and Address" and before Alexander Campbell was born. Jesus has never been a head without a body, a king without a subject, or a shepherd without sheep, since the Pentecostal birthday of the church. Whether we would recognize and welcome some of the sheep if they came back among us now makes little difference, seeing that "The Lord knoweth them that are his." I am determined to receive all whom God receives, and on the same basis that he received me. He did not receive me because of my perfection in knowledge but in spite of my imperfections. I am no longer so much concerned that others believe all the things I think I know, as I am that they know Him in whom I have believed.

One can be wrong about many things if he is right about Jesus and still be saved; he can be right about everything else but if he is wrong about Jesus he will still be lost. I am determined to make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. Those who are good enough to be in fellowship with him are not too bad for me to be in fellowship with them.

Think of the power we have dissipated in the perpetuation of feuds and fusses. Thousands of reams of paper have been consumed in vitriolic attack upon other members of the family; millions of dollars have been expended to promote partisan programs. If we had taken the finance used to sponsor debates and the travel expenses incidental to their attendance, we could have purchased a copy of the new covenant scriptures for every eternity-bound soul on the face of the earth. Why can we not generate as much enthusiasm for fighting with Satan as we can for skirmishing with one another? Why will men, who seldom contribute a cent for relieving the real needs of the world, spend many dollars to support the participants in a gladiatorial combat between brethren?

I am thankful that we can observe indications of a growing maturity among us. We are no longer as eager to deal with problems upon an emotional level and are seeking to combat them on a rational level. There is every reason to believe that, in spite of remaining areas of bitter factionalism in some localities, we stand upon the threshold of the brightest day in more than a century, for the heirs of the restoration movement. We are substituting association for assault, dialogue for debate, confession for challenges, and heart-cleansing for brain-washing. We can approach each other with open hands instead of with clenched fists. The chip on the shoulder has given way to the tear on the cheek and the tug at the heart.

We have many problems yet to be solved but we are coming to see that we can labor together toward their solution. Our differences may seem multitudinous but we know that differences are not occasions for division, but rather, for discussion. Our doctrinal disagreements can never be resolved by fighting as aliens, but only by loving as brethren. It is not necessary to be in the fellowship that those of us who are in Christ adjust all of our differences; it is only necessary that we adjust all of our differences in Christ.

To that end I pledge you my continued help in alleviating any of the distressing conditions which have arisen in the past. You are my brethren and I love you dearly. Call upon me when I can serve Him by serving you, to the end that when life is over we may all be able to share that eternal togetherness where there will be no more separation, and heartaches will be forever forgotten. “And now, brethren, I commend you unto God and to the word of His grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified.”

Terms of Communion

Mission Messenger (August 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

The development of orthodoxy, accompanied as it generally is, by a dogmatic attitude, has been the bane of all reformatory efforts in the realm of Christendom, through the centuries. When men discover certain truths, or what they consider to be truths, they begin to take those steps which they think are best adapted to preservation of those truths. The first step is to exalt such discoveries to the degree that it is assumed that only by holding correct views regarding them, can one sustain a vital relationship with God. Spiritual life is thus conditioned upon one's degree of attainment in knowledge upon the point at issue.

The next step is to postulate that those who do not concur in the matter cannot be received into, or retained in the fellowship with those who hold the "correct" view, since it has been assumed that they are no longer in fellowship with God. This automatically develops a party in the Christian framework for the advocacy and defence of the discovery and a new sect is born. All such sectarianism results from pride and fear and from these twin evils most creedalism is born. We would not be so much concerned about such exhibitions of pride and fear, since most of us are proud of some things and afraid of others, but in this instance the whole Christian concept is at stake.

The danger in all such creedalism lies in the fact that it creates another system of justification before God. It amounts to “setting up our own righteousness.” It predicates our hope of salvation, not upon faith in Christ Jesus, but upon conformity and uniformity in knowledge. It actually dethrones Jesus, and while clamoring loudly that we respect his authority, it substitutes the authority of the party for his divine prerogative. It is the “official interpretation” and not the revelation of God which becomes the real criterion.

This poses certain questions. Did not the apostles mean to convey certain specific ideas when they wrote? If so, does not the person who grasps these ideas correctly, understand the apostolic doctrine? If so, should he not teach these things and demand that others subscribe to them? If these others do not concur in them, should he not mark and avoid them, and urge others who correctly understand to do the same? This is the reasoning which is the foundation of all that sectarianism which is promoted by honest men. There is a difference between an honest and a dishonest sectarian promoter. The first strives to uphold the glory of God; the second is interested only in his own glory. The first is intellectually mistaken; the second is morally corrupt.

There is a fallacy in this chain of reasoning which betrays good men into becoming unwitting sectarians. Certainly the apostles meant to imply specific things when they wrote and the student who deduces the ideas they sought to convey from the things they wrote, grasps the apostolic doctrine. Surely he should teach what he understands the apostles to teach. But he “cannot demand that others subscribe to them.” To do so would be to substitute his authority for that of Jesus. Others must arrive at these truths as he arrived at them, out of respect for Christ, and not out of respect for a human exponent of truth!

No man has a right to bind his knowledge of any point of apostolic doctrine upon any other person who does not so understand it. To believe a thing only because you have confidence in the judgment and wisdom of another man of superior intellect is to condition your faith upon the wisdom of men and not upon the power or authority of God. In the spiritual realm one is obligated to accept truth because of his relationship to God and not because of his relationship to men, regardless of how good and sincere they may be. The conscience is a sacred precinct reserved for God and no man has a right to invade the conscience of another and bind anything upon it which his own intellect cannot attest as truth. We must respect the consciences of others even while we deplore some of their ideas.

One who pledges allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ thereby obligates himself to respect and embrace all truth, and this obligation implies certain corollary obligations, among which are these: (1) To make a diligent search for truth; (2) To accept as truth those truths discovered as a result of such search; (3) To reject errors previously held and to correct one's thinking and behavior accordingly. In this process of acquisition we may help each other but no one can establish his own doctrinal knowledge as the measure of another man's acceptability with God. We differ in intellectual powers as much as we do in physical appearance.

We need to distinguish between evangelization and indoctrination. To accomplish the first we have "an evangel," or good news, to proclaim. To accomplish the second, a doctrine has been provided. We are begotten by the gospel and sustained by the apostles' doctrine. The first originates life, the second perpetuates it. The doctrine sustains the same relationship to the "evangel" as the daily food one consumes does to the sperm from which he was begotten. No one can eat enough food in a day to last him a lifetime, so the assimilation of food is a continuous process. But one can be begotten at once.

There is a difference between one who is deformed and one who is merely immature. It requires a complete gospel to beget else one would be deformed when born. When Peter proclaimed the gospel on Pentecost he did so fully and those who accepted it obeyed it fully. But those who obeyed the gospel that day had not fully obeyed the apostles' doctrine. They were immature but not deformed. They were born of a proper seed but had not yet grown up. Not one apostolic epistle was written until twenty years after the gospel had been fully preached and it was written to those who had long since obeyed the gospel. Life is produced by the gospel and the gospel must be believed. It is good news and consists of facts. The wellbeing of the child of God is dependent upon his partaking of the bread and meat of doctrine but these no more originate or create spiritual life than the bread and meat upon our tables originate our physical life.

It would seem logical to recognize that the gospel is that which brings us into that relationship in which we are said to be saved, that is, to have life through the indwelling Spirit, by faith. Jesus instructed the apostles to "proclaim the good news to every creature. He who believes (the Message) and is baptized shall be saved." There is no indication that the apostolic doctrine was to be taught to every creature on earth. The epistles were addressed to the churches and written to the saints.

Superficial students are afraid to acknowledge this truth for fear that it will reflect a disregard for the doctrine. This is somewhat ridiculous. One does not speak derogatorily of bread and milk when he insists that he was not begotten by them. And no one ever thinks of judging one's right to be regarded as a member of the family upon the amount of milk and bread he can digest on any given day. Of course, refusal to eat any food, and going on a hunger strike, in revolt against the family authority, would bring about death, but even then there is a difference between such refusal and the inability to digest properly.

Our restoration ancestors clearly understood this and while they were exceedingly zealous for the doctrine of God's Word, they never once thought of making proficiency in doctrine a criterion for fellowship in Christ. We commend unto all of our readers that portion of the “Declaration and Address” by Thomas Campbell, which contains the phrase which forms the heading for this article. Read it frequently, carefully and meditatively. It contains the formula for overcoming almost every one of our current divisions, and also the means by which we can avoid all such in the future.

That although inferences and deductions from Scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God’s holy word, yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so, for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but properly do belong to the after and progressive edification of the church. Hence it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the church’s confession.

Thomas Campbell was not so ignorant as to affirm that the inspired writings did not need to be interpreted. He knew that every communication in human language requires interpretation. When one reasons fairly (that is, by logical rules of interpretation) upon the premises in the sacred writings, the inferences or deductions thus arrived at, constitute the apostolic teaching. Notice the expression “formally binding.” This is the most important distinction in the paragraph. All truths contained in the revelation recorded by the apostles are naturally binding upon every person under the lordship of Jesus, that is, they are obligatory because of the nature of that relationship. As one becomes convinced of them he must accept and implement them in his Christian walk or be responsible to the one Lord for his failure to do so. But no other person can formally bind them upon him as a condition of fellowship, because no one else can read his heart and determine the degree of his responsibility.

Study carefully the expressions “terms of communion” and “after and progressive edification of the church.” The contrast is vital and valid. It is the contrast between gospel and doctrine. The “terms of communion” are equated with “the church’s confession,” i.e., those things which are conditions of salvation, the things bound upon one in obedience to the gospel. What Thomas Campbell was saying was simply that we have no right to make anything a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation.

Since God has not made the arrival at a certain degree of doctrinal knowledge a condition of salvation, we have no right to make it a test of fellowship. Our brethren generally, in their growing sectarian arrogance and exclusivism, have made items belonging to “the after and progressive edification of the church” the “terms of communion” in their respective parties. One even has to believe “the right thing” about the millennium, or rather, believe what “the right people” tell him about it, to be in what is called “the fellowship.” Such persons have so forsaken the word of God and the restoration ideal that they would brand Thomas Campbell “a liberal.”

Perhaps it was a growing tendency to make fellowship contingent upon doctrinal correctness and attainment of knowledge, which caused David Lipscomb to write in Gospel Advocate, April 22, 1875, as follows:

So long as a man really desires to do right, to serve the Lord, to obey His commands, we cannot withdraw from him. We are willing to accept him as a brother, no matter how ignorant he may be, or how far short of the perfect standard his life may fall from his ignorance . . . We will maintain the truth, press the truth upon him, compromise not one word or iota of that truth, yet forbear with the ignorance, the weakness of our brother who is anxious, but not yet able to see the truth . . . Why should I not, when I fall so far short of perfect knowledge myself? How do I know that the line beyond which ignorance damns, is behind me, not before me? If I have no forbearance with his ignorance, how can I expect God to forbear with mine? . . . So long then as a man exhibits a teachable disposition, is willing to hear, to learn and obey the truth of God, I care not how far he may be, how ignorant he is, I am willing to recognize him as a brother.

A Realistic Attitude

Mission Messenger (August 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

One sign of maturity is the ability to recognize problems, to ascertain the real causes producing them, and to deal with them realistically. If these problems lie within the religious realm it is obvious that the realistic approach will be the one sanctioned by our Lord. Only the unwise or unstable do not recognize threats and dangers to what they hold dear, or ignore them to their own peril. A false sense of security frequently betrays men into a dangerous and unenviable condition.

The greatest detriment to the effect of our witness in the Christian world today is the factionalism and division which exists among the heirs of the restoration movement. It is a sad commentary on our spiritual state that adherents of some factions are almost wholly oblivious of the sad and sordid spectacle we exhibit to the thinking world. Living within the “caves” they have hewn out of the rocks of orthodoxy for their respective companies, and equating those who have found refuge in each partisan hideout as the “loyal brethren” they live in the half-light and semidarkness of perpetual intellectual twilight, even as they assume that they have all the light there is.

Of course, not all are like “hermit souls who live withdrawn, in the peace of their self-content.” Many are genuinely aware of the cancerous danger of division. They know that we are sick. They realize that we are poor, and miserable, and blind, and naked. They can see the inconsistency of preaching unity to others while practicing disunity among ourselves. They recognize the futility of trying to alleviate schism by schismatic prescriptions. Yet a goodly number of these are like a physician who attributes all disease to simple malfunction of the gall bladder, and who can diagnose for every patient without seeing any.

Our divisions are complex and they have an unseen root mass which reaches its tangled web out in all directions. They are entwined with the temperaments, desires, ambitions and strivings of men. Frequently those things which are credited with causing division did not cause it at all. Division, like every other sin, first exists in a human heart. No organ, or Bible class, or communion cup, ever divided a congregation of saints. No human institution ever did so. An organ has no power to divide God's people. Only men can do that. People are divided by people, not by things!

To assail things with a fury which drives one to intemperate accusation, while ignoring the basic motivations, accomplishes but one thing. It reveals the inability of the one who engages in such action to deal rationally with the problem at hand. This should cause good men to shy away from him. Unfortunately, many otherwise good men are bitter partisans and they elevate just this type of person to party leadership. From then on, instead of meeting the problem with warm hearts and cool heads they do so with cold hearts and hot heads!

It is frequently said by those of the disciple brotherhood who do not use instrumental music, that if the instrument had never been introduced, we would not be divided today. This is mere childish over-simplification and is not true at all. The fact is that those of us who do not use the instrument have had many divisions in which the instrument played no part (no pun intended). The brotherhood did not divide when the instrument was first installed. The difference in attitude toward the scripturality of its use created some problems and much discussion. But division did not come until brethren separated, and they did not separate when the instrument was advocated. They separated when it was made a test of fellowship, and those who favored it were told that they could no longer be regarded as brethren.

The fact is that human nature being what it is, and with our current concept of fellowship, if we had not divided over the instrument we would have divided over something else. We have proved this by repeatedly dividing over other things since we divided over the instrument. The introduction of instrumental music provided for us the first real opportunity to exercise the will to divide, based on the false philosophy that the way to preserve doctrinal purity is to separate from brethren. When men are motivated by such an attitude they are doomed to division, and we will continue to divide, using first one thing and then another as an excuse, until we are divided out of existence as we already are out of effective influence in a number of communities.

Because things really did not divide us, we start at the wrong end of our problem of division when we assume that we must first determine and agree upon the status of all these before we are in the fellowship with one another. To pursue such a course will only create more division as it always has in the past. The thing we must do is to first restore, or recapture, a real sense of brotherhood. This does not mean the mere reluctant calling of each other, “brothers in error,” but correcting the real error of not treating each other as brothers. This is what caused the division. Schisms among God’s people are caused by their attitude toward each other. Things produce strains upon our relationship, but we produce the schisms within it. We separate when we quit loving each other.

Most of the brothers within the non-instrument segment of the restoration movement, would welcome any move which would heal their many schisms. But they do not want to go back to the original cleavage where the false concept of brotherhood was first applied. They are content to have two sects among the heirs if they can solve the problems in their own side of the family. Such a proposal is superficial and worthless. Unless we deny the unscriptural philosophy of brotherhood based upon conformity instead of upon unity in Christ, we will only heal our sores in one part of the body today, to have them erupt in another part tomorrow.

We need to face up to the fact that we have a very grave and genuine problem of factionalism, sectarianism, exclusivism and intestine strife. The answer to it is not for the inhabitants of each cave to stand in the gloomy doors of their own caverns and try to persuade the occupants of the others to come over and join them. This will never be accomplished. Few there are who will leave their own factional strongholds to enter into a strange one inhabited by those who have bitterly fought them in the past.

The answer to our problem is for all of us to abandon our partisan caves and move out into greater light together. Not only can we see what our other brethren are like, when we have more light; but what is more important, we can get a better look at ourselves. What we see when we do may make us a little more charitable toward others who are not in such good shape either. We need to be honest with each other. The members of every faction quote, "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another," but their practical application of this shows that they mean, "If you walk in the light as we are in the light, we can have fellowship one with another." The "light" in which you must walk is the factional interpretation, the unwritten creed.

Our divisions are not caused by the inadequacy or failure of the first century gospel to meet the needs of modern man, but by our application of a nineteenth century mentality to twentieth century problems. We are perpetuating partisan feuds which began a century ago, with the result that a movement which started out to “unite the Christians in all the sects” is now actually doing less than most of the sects to promote unity. We do not need to change the word of God but we do need to alter our approach to the problems about us. Undoubtedly we have learned something in the last hundred years. If so, it is high time that we awake out of sleep and begin to show what it is. Thus far, we are contributing more to the problem of disunity, than we are to the answer of unity!

Facing a Dilemma

Mission Messenger (September 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

Many of the heirs of the restoration movement are faced with a dilemma. The changing fortunes of history have conspired together to make their practice as vain as their plea is valid. This movement began, according to Alexander Campbell, as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” It was launched at a time when religious rivalry was rampant and sectarian adherents sought scriptural justification for their partisan establishments. The clear call for unity based upon faith in Christ Jesus instead of upon conformity in knowledge or opinion, was like a fresh wind blowing across an arid desert. One can only wonder what might have been the result if the same clarity of vision had been maintained by succeeding generations.

Now, however, the scandal of schism is almost universally recognized and the rest of the religious world is pleading for unity. This places the movement with which we are allied in an embarrassing position, for our brethren are still dividing while those we set about to unite have started uniting. The restoration movement had a real message for a divided church. What is its message to a Christian world seeking to unite? I am concerned about this because I know that the witness of my brethren will make no impact if it is not relevant to current needs. In this article I shall relate my investigation especially to the position of the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood, with which I am best acquainted.

One of the recognized journals of this particular group is the Firm Foundation which is edited by our brother in Christ, Reuel Lemmons. Brother Lemmons is thoroughly qualified by virtue of association and experience to express the orthodox position of the largest faction of our brethren, and this he does in an editorial in the June 25 issue of his periodical. The title of the article is “Some Thoughts on Unity,” and we reproduce it in its entirety so that our readers may have access to it. This article appeared after three successive issues in which our brother wrote in contradiction to my own plea.

We think that responsible journalism requires that we examine what is said in contravention to our position, and that we allow the views examined to be expressed by the one who holds them. To all of those who regret the necessity of publishing this kind of an issue we express our kindred regret, but we feel there is no way by which we can be true to the cause we have espoused and to our inner conscience, and evade or avoid such confrontations. We only trust that this issue of the paper will be regarded as it was intended— a feeble contribution to that unity of all of our brothers in the Lord, a unity for which we daily pray.

Reply to Brother Lemmons

Mission Messenger (September 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

Brother Lemmons regards the stirring of the church by the ecumenical spirit as being good. He rejoices that every splinter of the Restoration movement is dealing with the subject orally and in writing. He affirms that unity is now possible. He concedes that all of the past approaches to unity may have contributed some good thing, although he believes they came to nought because of certain weaknesses inherent in them. We are concerning ourselves with his article because it came as the conclusion of three previous articles in which our brother attacked what he is pleased to call “the Ketcherside unity plan.”

We are serious about an attempt to restore a sense of unity to all of the saints in the shattered restoration brotherhood and to the children of God who may never have heard of the restoration movement. We have been writing, talking and conferring on the theme in many parts of the United States and Canada. We have answered questions by the hundreds in forums. It must be candidly stated that the one “splinter of the Restoration movement” which has done the most to discourage association of free men for honest discussion across partisan lines is the one represented by Brother Lemmons. These brethren have generally refused to participate in forums in which every other faction and segment has been represented. In some places they have threatened reprisals against those who attended and in others have exerted pressures to cause men who promised to confer to withdraw and go back on their word.

I freely offer to give ample space to publication in MISSION MESSENGER of a plan submitted by Brother Lemmons which will be designed to secure restoration of harmony among all of the dissident factions which have grown out of the restoration movement. I am not committed irrevocably to any approach to our grave problem if a better one can be developed. I invite Brother Lemmons to take the space required to present a definite, positive, spelled-out approach without inherent weakness. Since he admits the possibility of having unity, and since he opposes the approach we are making we are ready to hear “a more excellent way.”

We will publicize in advance the fact that he will offer such a program and will do all within our feeble power and with our limited resources to assure him a hearing through the medium of this little journal. We will examine any such approach as objectively as possible. If criticism is deemed essential it will be made in love.

We believe that a realistic approach must rise above a narrow partisan appeal. It must preserve the inalienable freedom of all of God’s children to go to the word of God for themselves and to be accountable only unto him for their sincere and studious deductions from that word. It must provide a means for removal rather than for preservation of traditional barriers between brethren without indignity to any. Brother Lemmons has used Firm Foundation as the base for an extended attack against our plea. We invite him now to use MISSION MESSENGER as a medium for giving to us all a genuine objective and positive program which will lead to the unity of all without the sectarianizing of any. Let us have done with platitudes and generalizations and get on with the real task.

We think an examination of the article by Brother Lemmons is in order. He closes his first paragraph with the statement that “Unity in spite of differences is not unity.” Of course our brother knows that unity is unity where men differ about many things. He has unity confused with conformity. Free men will always differ and the only way to eliminate differences is to surrender freedom to the rule of a dictator who can through coercion and fear make men outwardly conform.

A man and wife can have unity in their marriage relationship and be one flesh in spite of many differences. The truth is that the only unity possible to them is that which recognizes diversity. Does our brother think that those who give the flag salute lie when they say, “One nation under God indivisible”? None of us would be so foolish as to affirm that there are not differences among our elected representatives but these do not destroy the fact that we are united states.

I daresay that in the very congregation where Brother Lemmons attends in Austin the brethren do not concur on every interpretation. Must we conclude that he is a member of a divided congregation? If we cannot have unity in spite of differences can there ever be any unity at all? I do not agree perfectly with any man on earth. Who is going to be the universal regulator of what free men must think about everything? Can we have absolute conformity without creating a pope? Was it not this very type of reasoning coupled with a desire to secure conformity which led to the pontifex maximus of Rome?

Our brother quotes I John 1:7, “But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another.” Every faction quotes that same verse and every faction thinks the members of every other faction are in darkness. Those who oppose cups, classes, and Herald of Truth, think Brother Lemmons is walking in darkness and they will not have “fellowship” with him. We have the ridiculous spectacle of some two dozen groups quoting this passage and applying it in condemnation of all the others. What each means is actually that, “If you walk in the light as we are in the light, we will have fellowship with you.” In every instance the party interpretation is the “light” and if you do not kow-tow to it you are in darkness.

Brother Lemmons says, “we can do those in error more good by preaching the gospel unto them than we can by extending to them a synthetic fellowship.” He also says, “It is a painful thing to find we have no monopoly on the truth, nor are we immune from error.” We presume our brother includes himself in the statement. Now we are as confident that our good brother is in error as he is in thinking we are, but we cannot help him by preaching the gospel unto him. Nor can we help any of our factions by preaching the gospel unto them. They are all made up of people who have obeyed the gospel. Has not Brother Lemmons obeyed the gospel? Does he not claim to actually be “a gospel preacher”? How can one help a gospel preacher who is in error by preaching the gospel to him, the very thing he obeyed in order to become a gospel preacher? Our sinful divisions are not caused by lack of obedience to the gospel for the obedience to the gospel brings us all into one body. It was after we came into that body we became divided.

Our sinful schisms arise from mistaken views about “fellowship” upon the part of those who have heard and obeyed the gospel. Not only can we not extend a synthetic fellowship, but we cannot extend a genuine fellowship. The fellowship is a state or condition into which we are called of God (1 Cor. 1:9). Certainly it is “more than just a nice attitude toward every one.” It is the mutual sharing in the life of the indwelling Spirit by every child of God. It is a joint participation in the Spirit of the living God.

We agree that “a denial of reality is no approach to healing the schisms” and also that “we must correct the error that causes the schism.” But we do not believe that colleges, cups and classes have caused the schisms. The error lies in making brotherhood contingent upon these things and an attitude toward them, and of assuming that the way to maintain doctrinal purity is by separation from brethren and division of the divine family. Our brethren are not divided because of Herald of Truth, but because we do not love one another enough to maintain the family ties of unity in spite of divergent views and interpretations. We do not need to agree about cups, classes, colleges, television programs, and the manner of breaking the bread, to be one in Christ Jesus. Anyone who says we do is just not realistic! Jesus did not die for a “cups party” or an “anti-cups party;” or for a “television party” or an “anti-television party.” He died for one body. All who have obeyed the gospel are in that body and I shall recognize and treat them all as my brothers in Him, in spite of our differences.

Our brother quotes 1 Corinthians 1:10, Philippians 1:27 and 2:2, but he does not apply them as did the apostle. Paul did not write a single admonition to “be of one mind” or to “be of one accord” in order to bring men into the fellowship. Every such admonition was written to those who were in the fellowship and because they were in it. Being of “one mind” is not essential to being in the fellowship, but being in the fellowship is essential to becoming of one mind. We are in the fellowship because we are in one person and because we are in him we strive to achieve harmony. Certainly we are not to ignore differences, and we are to seek to eliminate them, but we are not to divide over them. There will always be differences among free men but these are not as important as the cross. We should allow ourselves to be drawn together by the cross rather than drawn apart by our divergencies of viewpoint.

We are not pleading for “a loose federation of divergent beliefs” but for a close aggregation of devoted believers. The body of our Lord is not composed of beliefs, but of believers, and those who are one in Christ may differ without dividing as we learn from Romans 14. It is Brother Lemmons who substitutes a plan of unity for that proposed by Jesus. He predicates unity upon conformity and makes forbearance an unworthy or unnecessary virtue. “The pattern of unity proposed by the Holy Spirit” makes allowance for differences. It forbids you to “pass judgment on your brother” or to “despise your brother.” The man who “sets at nought a brother” no longer walks in love. He destroys the work of God. Through love I can cling to my brother and hold my opinions.

Brother Lemmons repudiates “the authority of the scriptures” and makes a traditional partisan pattern his rule of faith and practice. The word of God does not authorize the rending and riving, the splitting and shredding of the fabric of brotherhood. Our brother is not pleading for unity but for the sanctification and maintenance of our divisions until every person sees everything as does the party with which he is identified. He seeks to justify division in the family of God but the Holy Spirit everywhere condemns it.

Our beloved brother demonstrates his “denial of reality” when he says, “Unity is not attained by the maintenance of these private interpretations of scripture, but by the abandonment of them.” How can a man abandon what he believes the scriptures to teach? Will Brother Lemmons give up his interpretations of scripture to have unity? Of course he will reply that he refers to interpretations that are “in error.” But who among us deliberately holds an interpretation that he believes is in error? Who clings to an interpretation after he is convinced that it is in error? Are we to allow our brother to become the sole arbiter as to whose interpretations are in error? Do the brethren who oppose classes think they are in error? Do those who oppose Herald of Truth think they are in error? Do those who believe in the pre-millennial return of our glorious Lord think they are in error? Of course, Brother Lemmons thinks they are all in error, but they all think he is. Who is to decide who must abandon what?

God never predicated our fellowship upon surrender of our private interpretations. A man can no more abandon his brain-children than he can his children in the flesh. The word of God does not tell us to abandon such, but says, “Your personal convictions are a matter of faith between yourself and God” (Rom. 14:22). Unity is not attained by abandoning our interpretations of scripture, for this is an impossibility for honest men, but by a proper sense of values which allows us to maintain our interpretations without placing them as obstacles or stumblingblocks in a brother’s way. We agree that “any attempt that offers pardon and heaven to those who have not met the terms of heaven’s King is not a scriptural attempt.” We have no intention to “convey the idea that there is a fellowship much more broad and vast than that defined by the scriptures.” But it is just as dangerous to confine fellowship to “narrowing little bands” with their “zealously defended barriers.” In an editorial appearing in Firm Foundation, April 21, 1959, under the heading, “The Deadly Narrowing,” Brother Lemmons wrote thus:

If the Restoration movement is to escape the inevitable fate of denominationalism we must hold fast the line against the “narrowing of our horizon of spiritual things.” Recent years has seen the division and subdivision of the forces of the Restoration into ever narrowing little bands of vicious and highly sectarian people. We believe it is high time that attention be called to the broad undenominational nature of the Christian religion . . .

This narrowing has produced different brands of Christians, and most of the groups have built “spite fences” separating themselves from all others. By what principle of Christianity do groups of brethren separate into camps with zealously defended barriers that prohibit the fellowship and co-operation of one group of them with another? Every division that takes place makes that group more narrow and more sectarian than ever.

As Christians all of us are members only of that broad, universal church for which Jesus died. If the undenominational view of the early church, and of the leaders of the Restoration, had continued until this day there would not be the divided warring factions among us that spend their energies fighting each other rather than fighting the devil in a united, invincible army.

Does Brother Lemmons equate “the broad, universal church for which Jesus died” with that “sect of the splintered Restoration” with which he is affiliated? Could one believe in the pre-millennial interpretation as did Moses E. Lard and be a member of “the broad, universal church”? Could he accept those from the Baptist Church as brothers without re-immersing them as David Lipscomb did and be a member of it? Could he profess to be a Calvinist as did Thomas Campbell after his immersion and be a member of it? Could he believe there were Christians in all of the sects as Alexander Campbell did and be a member of it? Could he believe in universalism as did Aylette Raines and be a member of it? Could he refuse to make instrumental music in worship a test of fellowship as did John W. McGarvey and be a member of it? Could he oppose the idea of a triune Godhood as did Barton W. Stone and be a member of “the broad universal church for which Jesus died”? Has our good brother Lemmons “forgotten the Restoration principle entirely”?

Brother Lemmons believes that “the plea for unity first made by the pioneers of the Restoration movement was basically sound.” In the same paragraph he talks about “a highly inferior and absolutely counterfeit proposal for unity in spite of differences.” Yet it was “unity in spite of differences” which constituted “the plea for unity first made by the pioneers of the Restoration movement.” In one breath he calls it basically sound and in the next breath labels it as absolutely counterfeit.

In April, 1831, the Millersburg (Kentucky) Christian Church was constituted by a union of a congregation planted by Barton W. Stone and another planted by Robert M. Batson. The record says:

It was the practice of the brethren forming the two congregations to commune together at their several meetings, and finally, finding themselves to be one so far as faith and practice are concerned, they agreed to meet together without regard to difference of opinions, acknowledging no name but that of Christian and no creed but the Bible.

A historian who was an intimate associate of Aylette Raines, writing of his acceptance with his peculiar views, says:

Early in the history of the Restoration circumstances occurred that put its principles to a severe test. Whether the disciples of Christ could be united in faith, and at the same time hold different opinions in regard to speculative matters, having fellowship together in the one body of Christ on this basis, became a question of absorbing interest and vital importance. It was not expected that all thinking minds would reach the same opinions on questions not directly explained or settled ex cathedra in the Scriptures . . .

If the disciples could not be united in faith and have fellowship with each other while holding contrary opinions as respects matters lying outside the circle of faith, then the movement was doomed to dismal failure. But if they could do these two things, the success of their plea could not be thwarted.

The “pioneers of the Restoration” all advocated unity in spite of differences of opinion, and Brother Lemmons declares that their plea was basically sound. Then he writes, “Unity can only come by our putting out of our hearts our own opinions.” Now listen to Alexander Campbell:

But men cannot give up their opinions, and, therefore, they never can unite, says one. We do not ask them to give up their opinions. We ask them only not to impose them upon others. Let them hold their opinions; but let them hold them as private property. The faith is public property; opinions are, and always have been, private property. Men have foolishly attempted to make the deductions of some great minds the common measure of all Christians . . . It is cruel to excommunicate a man because of the imbecility of his intellect . . . I never did at any time exclude a man from the Kingdom of God for a mere imbecility of his intellect, or, in other words, because he could not assent to my opinions. All sects are doing, or have done this.

In the very same article, Brother Campbell wrote again:

Reason and experience unite their testimony in assuring us that, in the same proportion as individuals labor to be of one opinion, they disagree. The greater the emphasis laid upon opinions, the more rapidly they generate. The nearest approaches to a unity of opinion which I have ever witnessed, have appeared in those societies in which no effort was made to be of one opinion; in which they allowed the greatest liberty of opinion, and in which they talked more and boasted more of the glory and majesty of the great facts, the wonderful works of God's lovingkindness to the children of men, than of themselves, their views and attainments . . .

If I were to attempt to produce the greatest uniformity of opinion, I would set about it by paying no respect to opinions, laying no emphasis upon them, admiring and contemning no opinions as such. But if I wished to produce the greatest discrepancies in opinion, I would call some damnably dangerous, others of vital importance; I would always eulogize the sound, and censure the erroneous in opinions. We all know that strife is like the bursting forth of water— it always widens the channels; and many a broil in churches, neighborhoods, and families would have been prevented if the first indication had been sympathetically attributed to the infirmity of human nature.

Not only is our good brother in the Lord, who edits Firm Foundation, inconsistent with the word of God and the pioneers of the Restoration in his contention for unity based upon conformity in opinion, but he is also inconsistent with himself. In his editorial, "The Deadly Narrowing," printed April 21, 1959, he said:

There are many things that most brethren consider to be matters of opinion. Yet they make the acceptance of their opinions the basis upon which they will withhold or extend fellowship. If others will have opinions which parallel theirs then fellowship is extended, but if others hold converse opinions fellowship is withheld. We have never believed that matters of opinion should be the basis of fellowship. We are loathe to see the horizon of our spiritual things narrowed to the limits of any man's opinions.

In 1959 our brother offered what he now calls "an absolutely counterfeit proposal for unity in spite of differences" and castigated the "division and subdivision of the forces of the Restoration into ever narrowing little bands of vicious and highly sectarian people." Now he thinks these "little bands of vicious and highly sectarian people" should remain divided until they can put their opinions out of their hearts. Our brother should have labeled his editorial "Some Thoughts on Disunity." He offered nothing constructive for promotion of unity among our divided brethren but simply rehearsed that traditional thinking which has shivered us to bits and tainted us all with the sin and shame of division. Instead of straightening our walls we should remove them as Christ did that other "middle wall of partition which was against us."

In conclusion, let us voice our sympathy for Brother Lemmons and all the rest of us within the present framework of the Restoration movement. All of our brethren mean well. They do not want to compose "little bands of vicious and highly sectarian people." They are only being faithful to a fatal philosophy which has fractured us into fragments and will continue to do so until we no longer equate it with the will of God. We need to think boldly and act bravely if we expect to measure up to the demands of these stirring times. The noble pioneers of the Restoration movement met the challenge of a universal defense of division. Can we, as their sons, meet the challenge of a universal desire for unity?

Reviving Hope

Mission Messenger (September 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

There are increasing evidences that the long dark night of sectarian bitterness may be drawing to a close. The first gray fingers of the dawn are probing the religious firmament and pointing toward the day when the sun of righteousness may once again bathe the earth with gentle rays of understanding and compassion.

Even among the heirs of the restoration movement there are signs of awakening consciousness of unity. The winter of the deep freeze is slowly giving way to approaching spring. The first tiny rivulets of hope are trickling down the face of the formidable glacier of exclusivism and some of these will join to become a stream flowing with increasing velocity toward a better land and a brighter day. There are still grave impediments in the way, huge boulders of doubt and suspicion, but progress in the Spirit is inexorable. Our brethren are weary of strife and contention. They are sick of gladiatorial contests in which partisan champions hack each other to pieces in full view of a skeptical world. The bromides and cliches with which skilful debaters once drew applause now fall flat. There is a deadly seriousness apparent which can no longer be satisfied with slogans and sly innuendoes. The factional leaders who think in terms of their vested interests are frightened. They are trembling inwardly. They have learned how to capitalize upon disunity but they do not know how to cope with unity.

Some of them still reach up to the shelf and take down the old ware of conformity and offer it in lieu of unity. But it is shopworn and soiled from too much handling, and the dust rag is dirty and cannot restore the former luster. Our present generation will not be as easily fooled by a shoddy substitute. We have reared a new generation under the perpetual threat of world catastrophe. They can see through the glib answer and the superficial rejoinder. They will not be content with the misuse and abuse of scriptural quotations to sustain factional aims.

Our younger brethren are more capable intellectually, but they have not trained their heads at the expense of their hearts. They can respect their fathers for the contributions they made in their day without shackling themselves by their judgments which long since have proven to be faulty and divisive. Their minds are sharp enough to discern between revelation and interpretation. They know the difference between the will of God and party traditions. They will no longer equate the faction in which they were reared as the kingdom of heaven to the exclusion of all others. They no longer think that we have arrived while every one else has departed. For that reason they will not consider that those who get up and go on must of necessity get down and go off!

It would astonish our readers to know how many faculty members in the various religious schools sympathize with our aims and share in our general convictions as to the fellowship of the believers. And it might surprise the members of the faculty to learn how many students, especially on the graduate school level, rejoice that at last a meager attempt is being made to face up realistically to the sin of schism and the disgrace of division within our ranks. The casual reader may be led to conclude that a whole segment of brethren is violently opposed to our plea but do not be misled by attacks in partisan journals. Remember that those who think in terms of unity, rather than conformity, cannot be heard in such media.

Ours is actually a fight for freedom— the freedom to think, act and speak, without fear of reprisal from the self-elected “powers that be.” It is a battle for the freedom of being Christians only without being compelled and coerced into a factional alignment in order to be recognized and regarded as Christians at all. It is a campaign for the freedom to love all of God’s children and our brethren, to move among them freely and manifest our love in action, as opposed to the narrow provincial and parochial view that the more of God’s children you love, the less you love God.

Many of our brothers are not free as yet to speak their honest convictions openly. To do so would bring down upon their heads the maledictions of party leaders. They would be harassed by baying “hounds of heresy.” They would be excommunicated and driven forth, avoided by previous associates, shunned by former friends, condemned as traitors and rebels. This is the price demanded of those among the courageous who cannot concede that the “one fold” is identical with the “party corral” and who believe that the flock of God is not yet a gathered one, but is scattered over the sectarian hills. I am willing to pay whatever toll is exacted for believing that. It is my sincere conviction that the one body is greater than any of our factions, and greater than all of them put together. If this be treason, make the most of it!

It is an encouraging omen that so many are becoming tired of irresponsible journalism, a plague which has blighted the restoration movement for a good many decades. Letters from every section of the country protest the unfairness of those who hold one hand over your mouth while they slap you with the other, or tie your hands before they stab you in the back. The one-way, dead-end street type of editing which allows acrimonious and personal charges to be hurled at one in print and then slams the gate on him when he attempts to enter and speak for himself, no longer appeals to those who have studied morals and ethics. More and more brethren are coming to believe that both sides of a story should be printed. They are nauseated by censorship and boycott. A good many of them feel they are quite as capable of making up their own minds as an editor is of making their minds up for them.

The increasing number of meetings in which brethren of all segments and splinters gather to explore their thinking as to the basis of fellowship augurs well for the future. Obviously, some who attend still regard the church for which Jesus died as the “Church of Christ” in which they have always lived, and they cling to the forlorn hope that they will be powerful enough in “logic” to convince all others that the way to glory is by switching from one faction to another. I venture to suggest that, after a few such meetings, many of the most rabid partisans will find their faith in God’s revelation increased to the same extent they find the faith in their own interpretations has decreased. It will be good when the faith of all of us rests in the power of God instead of in the wisdom of men.

It is much easier to hate brethren whom you have never met. You can conjure up an image, concocted of equal parts of your own suspicion and the suggestions of your fellow-partisans, and a quite genial person may be transformed into a mental ogre. Association tends to give us a better perspective from which to view men and it batters down a lot of imaginary barriers which have always seemed quite real to us. I think it is essential that we recapture the freedom to go wherever we want to go without having to secure permission from some self-imposed authority. The kingdom of heaven is not a police state and should not be under an army of occupation. I propose to move among all of my brethren and share in their insights and discoveries. “I will not fear what men shall do unto me.” I have learned that all of them are as human as myself and about as prone to weakness and error.

I am optimistic. I think the restoration movement heirs stand at the threshold of their greatest opportunity in almost a century. I suspect that we will see a genuine breakthrough of the Spirit. The hard crust of exclusivism will be penetrated. The false notions about fellowship will be dispelled. Men who have never met will meet together and “sit together in heavenly places.” This will be the Lord’s doing and it will be marvelous in our eyes. This does not mean that all of this will be easily achieved. Some will be maligned and misrepresented, they will be pilloried and crucified, but this is ever the case. The battle for freedom is never won easily but the victory is worth the cost in sweat and tears and sleepless nights. No land was ever occupied that was not first explored by pioneers!

Peace must be waged even as others wage war. There must be a “strategy of peace” and it must take into account the forces of opposition and their strength in the field. While these are formidable, we must never become discouraged, because one who pleads for peace among the children of God will find that God is at his right hand. It is He who blesses the peacemakers! We must profit by previous efforts without perpetuating their mistakes; we must fight a battle in full recognition of our own frailty, willing to freely acknowledge error as we become aware of it. All of us have much to learn, all of us can learn from each other. None of us know it all.

The factional approach to the Christian way is outmoded and outdated. Increasing enlightenment has shown that we can never accomplish the purpose of heaven by dividing the family of God upon earth. No faction is “the faithful church.” Factionalism and faithfulness to God are incompatible. He only can be faithful who refuses to be factional, who loves all of God’s children and who refuses to make tests of fellowship which God has not proposed as conditions of salvation. In this day of rapid communication in a shrinking world, no parochial concept will even begin to meet the universal needs of teeming humanity. It is useless to “talk big” while we “think little.” The kingdom of heaven is greater than we think. It cannot be confined by sectarian walls or factional barriers, not even when we build them. It is because so many are coming to realize this that there is real hope that tomorrow will be better than today!

Saying Nice Things

Mission Messenger (September 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

“So do let them, and all the churches see how genuine is your love, and justify all the nice things we have said about you” (2 Corinthians 8:24. J. B. Phillips).

This was written to the congregation in Corinth. There are indications that it followed the first epistle by just a few months. It is possible that the first letter was written in the spring of A.D. 57 and the second in autumn of the same year. The first letter reveals the state of the congregation which Paul had planted. We are made aware of the following irregularities, among others.

- 1. The existence of parties, or denominations, within the congregation.
- 2. The presence of an aggravated case of immorality.
- 3. Lawsuits between brethren prosecuted in pagan courts.
- 4. Difference of attitude toward eating of meats.
- 5. Defiance of custom by the women with resulting reproach.
- 6. Disorderly conduct at the Agape or love feast.
- 7. Rivalry in the use of gifts of the Spirit.

8. A denial of the resurrection by some of the members.

It is such a congregation which the apostle urges to “justify all the nice things we have said about you.” Contrast this with the modern attitude of certain preachers and editors toward congregations of brethren which differ with their personal views about such things as cups, classes, colleges, orphan homes, instrumental music, and a host of other things too numerous to mention. The “faithful” are urged to “come out from among them,” and those who remain are assailed as heretics and apostates. They are assaulted in the religious press, attacked on radio, and blasted from the pulpit. They are treated as outcasts!

It will not do for those who seek to justify their uncharitable attitude to contend that Corinth had cleaned house thoroughly before Paul wrote the second letter. That is just not true, because he said, “For I fear, lest, when I come, I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as you would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults, and lest, when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed” (2 Cor. 12:20, 21).

How can we explain the difference between the attitude of the apostle toward Corinth and that of many brethren toward congregations in this day? The answer lies in the following considerations.

1. Paul could distinguish between the gospel by which we are begotten and which establishes our spiritual relationship in Christ Jesus, and the apostolic doctrine in which we must grow and mature (1 Cor. 4:15).

2. He could differentiate between the fellowship into which we are called and endorsement of the opinions and conduct of those within that fellowship (1 Cor. 1:9).

3. He knew the difference between knowledge which can never be made the foundation of unity and love which must always be the basis of it (1 Cor. 8:2, 3).

4. He knew the difference between the faith in Christ Jesus which saves and justifies and the constant growth toward maturity of one within that faith (1 Cor. 1:30; 3:1-3).

If our modern brethren had lived in the days of Paul they would have divided the congregation at Corinth which he sought to unite. They would have urged brethren to separate whom he taught to love one another. The philosophy of maintaining purity of doctrine by separation from brethren would have shivered the Corinthian congregation to bits as it has the restoration movement in our day. The letters to Corinth stand as a stern denunciation of our false concepts of fellowship. Think of the sin of dividing brethren into rival factions over cups, classes, television programs, orphan homes, the pre-millennial interpretation, instrumental music, and the motley host of things which have been allowed such tremendous emphasis in our age, and compare these with the problems in doctrine and practice faced by the apostle in Corinth. We are victims of the party spirit which breathes hatred and bitterness under the guise of loyalty. We must become partakers of the Holy Spirit so that the fruit of “love, joy and peace” may reside in our hearts.

It is time that we determine whether or not the prophets of past centuries gave their lives to proclaim the coming of a party to uphold the doctrine of “one cup” or “individual cups.” We must decide if the divine purpose from the foundation of the world was to create a faction to defend or decry the use of classes in which to study the will of God. We must determine if the Son of God shed his blood to purchase a party to propagate the use of instrumental music, or one to oppose it. This has nothing to do with one’s personal conviction as to the right or wrong of any of these things. It does have much to do with whether or not we create a sect or promote a party to defend or oppose them. It may be a case of mistaken judgment about the right or wrong of these things, but it is a sin to formulate a sect.

“For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.” By the same token, the kingdom of God is not cups, classes, colleges, instrumental music, orphan homes, or a millennial viewpoint. Jesus did not hang on the cross and suffer in order to demonstrate his right to preside over a party which equates human opinions and interpretations with the great and abiding principles of divine relationship. He is not the sachem of a clan, the prince of a party, or the forerunner of a faction.

I do not want to live for something which Jesus did not die to purchase. I do not want to devote my life to the promoting of any religious organization, but I will consecrate it to functioning as best I can as a member of the divine organism, the one body. Parties are created by men to separate brethren. The one body was created by God to unite them. “Righteousness, joy and peace” never divided any group of people. To the extent we are divided we have missed the nature of the kingdom. We have emphasized what “the kingdom of God is not.”

When one looks at the body as did Paul it is possible to say “nice things about” a congregation of those who are in Christ, in spite of the disagreeable features which arise to trouble the saints because of immaturity and carnality. It makes a lot of difference when one realizes that people act as they do because they are infantile. One can say some pretty nice things about some pretty messy babies. This is especially true if they are God’s babies, and you love the father who begot them. To reflect against their paternity is to reflect against their father!

Our real trouble is that we have too many babies throwing things at other babies. It is plainly said that, “All the time that there is jealousy and squabbling among you show what you are — you are living just like men of the world” (1 Cor. 3:3). We need to grow up in all things in Christ. It is no sin to have been a baby but it is a sin to remain as one. We have been quarrelling over our spiritual toys long enough. It is time that we quit crawling and start walking. Let the restoration movement outgrow its rompers! The world will not be led to Christ by fretful infants but by faithful servants. Let us cease to be bickering babies, let us be mature men!

Reply to Brother Lemmons

Mission Messenger (October 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

In the June 4 issue of the Firm Foundation, the editor presents an article under the heading, “Why We Did Not Run Ketcherside’s Articles.” He assigns two reasons: (1) The articles were not relevant to the objections made against my position; (2) My attitude as shown in the articles was different than that demonstrated personally in the Denver and California lectures. I am willing to allow the articles to speak for themselves and perfectly willing for the brethren who attended the public lectures to testify as to my conduct. Those who were present may wish to write Brother Lemmons who was not.

Our good brother says of me, “He bent over backwards in his public speeches to court the Digressives while throwing insults and slurs at what he calls the ‘non-instrument segment of the Disciples Brotherhood.’” The editor is wrong on three counts in this one statement. First, I conduct public forums simply for the purpose of sharing my views with brethren who are concerned about the divided state of the heirs of the restoration movement. I do not court any group, segment, splinter or fragment, for I never again intend to be allied with any faction or to be a spokesman for such. Second, I have a deep love for all of my brethren in the Lord, whether they use instrumental music or not. I have never intentionally hurled a single insult or slur at any of them. I believe the tapes of the meetings will show that I did not but if anything I said can bear such an interpretation I herewith apologize freely and abjectly. To insult any brother would be detrimental to everything I hope to accomplish in pleading for peace among all the Israel of God.

Third, I have never used the expression twice assigned to me by the editor. I do refer to the instrumental segment and the non-instrumental segment of “the disciple brotherhood,” a term long used to describe the heirs of the restoration movement. The “Disciples Brotherhood” may be quite a different thing as all students of later developments in the restoration movement well know. I had hoped we had arrived at the state of spiritual maturity where we could dispense with such partisan designations as “the Digressives,” and am somewhat surprised to see this label affixed three times by our brother. Those whom he labels as “the Digressives” are my brethren for whom Christ died. I feel that we digress from the spirit of brotherly love when we thus corral and brand those who differ with us about the validity of certain things. This does not make any easier the tremendous task of trying to recover our lost oneness. Brother Lemmons writes that I am “a cunning manipulator of words and phrases.” This throws a shadow over my integrity and makes his readers look for some hidden and ulterior meaning in my words. It is regrettable that we must have such imputations. Our brother asks us to mark carefully that “Brother K. actually denies that there is, or can be, any visible manifestation of the Lord’s church.” This is not true at all as the careful readers of MISSION MESSENGER well realize. It is my contention that when the body is in schism, no part or segment is the whole body. Brother Lemmons is still enraptured with the myth that only those who subscribe to the interpretations on controversial issues set forth by the Firm Foundation, constitute the one body. These have arrived and all others have departed. The fact is that God has a people scattered through all of our factions and sects, and all of these people are members of the one body. Others have not departed from us but we are separated from each other. Not all of God’s sheep are caught in sectarian thickets, but most of them, including Brother Lemmons and myself, have grown up in, or grown up and come into certain fractions or factions in the Christian realm. The one body will manifest itself visibly wherever any congregation of saints refuses to allow artificial barriers erected by men to keep them separated and segregated from each other. This does not mean to ignore our differences at all. It simply means that we cease to regard our differences as more important than the blood of Jesus and love the more intensely those with whom we differ.

Our brother declares that differences create sects. I deny this. Differences place strains upon relationships but do not sever them. This is true in the domestic, social, political and spiritual realms. We differ over many things about which we do not divide. The writers in Firm Foundation do not create a sect every time they differ with each other. Sects are created by the party spirit as unity is produced by the Holy Spirit. It is lack of love that results in division. So long as we love each other as we should we will not divide into factions. Our factions are not so much a witness of our faithfulness to Christ, who condemns them, as of our lovelessness to each other, and this will condemn us.

Our brother directly accuses me of making a plea for unity “that urges a loose amalgamation of various factions.” In this he reveals that he does not begin to understand that for which I contend. Of what use would an amalgamation of factions be? Such an amalgamation would not constitute the one body at all. Since, as he says, “Readers of the Firm Foundation have a right to know what Brother K. believes on this matter,” I think I am better qualified to state it than my esteemed brother editor. I am opposed to all factions and factionalism. A faction is a work of the flesh. A loose (or tight) amalgamation of factions would be but a conglomeration of works of the flesh, devoid of the Spirit. I am set for the eradication of all factions, including the two in which Brother Lemmons and myself grew up. I believe this can only be accomplished by crucifixion of the party spirit within our hearts.

I am branded an “All-factionist” despite my refusal to be a defender of any faction. It is charged that I “support and fellowship all factions,” but I steadfastly refuse to support any, and that is the real trouble. If I had left the faction in which I served and joined the one with which Brother Lemmons serves, I would have been regarded as being in “the Lord’s church.” I have been in the Lord’s church since the day I was immersed, for the Holy Spirit immerses one into no other. I was factional in that church for some years due to my ignorance and I am sorry for it. I do not propose to remedy the situation by switching to another faction.

Wherever my Father has a child, I have a brother. I may deplore his environment while devoted to his interests. My plea is that we restore a recognition of realistic brotherhood so that we can discuss our differences in a framework of fraternity, and not fight as “armies of aliens.” If we can substitute association for accusation, dialogue for debate, and charity for irresponsible charges we may be able to lessen the frightful gaps and chasms which Satan has created between us.

Reply to the Foregoing [article by Lemmons]

Mission Messenger (October 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

We are grateful that Brother Lemmons will publish our replies to his attacks upon our position. We earnestly pray that the exchange will be to the glory of our blessed Lord. We shall not trouble our readers further with what our good brother calls “personal remarks” but will come directly to the issue at hand.

Brother Lemmons admits that one need not subscribe to the interpretation on controversial issues as set forth in the Firm Foundation in order to be in the one body. It is evident, then, that the one body may have in it those who differ with the interpretations of our brother. This is an admission of the very thing for which we contend, i.e., that uniformity of interpretation or conformity in opinion is not essential to our oneness in the body of Christ.

Our brother is going to insist that I answer the doctrinal issues but I am pleased to do it without his insistence. It is not necessary that you concur in my answers to be loved and respected as my brother in the Lord. Let us look at his questions in turn.

1. What about the “sincere sprinkled”? Every person who believes with all of his heart that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, is begotten of the Father, but such a person is not born of the water until he is immersed in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. He is in the womb of “the free woman” (Gal. 4:31) and while there I love him because I love the one who begot him (1 John 5:1).

2. Are they in the kingdom? Not as I view it. They have indicated their desire to become citizens but have not completed the naturalization process.

3. Since baptism is no part of the gospel, will the gospel put them in the kingdom, or does it take something more? Baptism is the proper response of a believing penitent to the good news. This introduces such an one into the kingdom. The gospel is the good news proclaimed by a herald, baptism is the response of a hearer who believes the message.

4. Will they be lost? I presume our brother refers to those whom he calls the “sincere sprinkled.” I am unable to say what God will do with those precious souls who believe in the Sonship of Jesus but do not understand the implications of the word “baptism.” I must leave them in God’s hands to deal with individually on the basis of His love and mercy. I personally feel that there is a difference between those who are honestly mistaken while striving earnestly to obey, and those who deliberately rebel against that of which they have full knowledge. Since I am unable to answer, will Brother Lemmons answer his own question and tell us if they will all be damned.

5. Do people become sons of God at the point of faith or only after having been baptized into Christ? Life begins at the point of vital faith, when one is begotten of God and conceived in the new covenant “which is the mother of us all.” Birth is not for the purpose of procuring life but for its enjoyment. Baptism does not produce life but transfers us into that state in which we can enjoy our spiritual blessings and develop our faculties. Only those who are born are granted the privilege of becoming children of God. “But to all who received him, who believed in his name, he gave power to become children of God; who were born not of blood nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God” (John 1:12, 13). Prior to this they were in an embryonic or foetal stage. Our brother continually misrepresents my position so to make it clear for him I shall spell it out. I hold that those who believe and have not yet been immersed are God’s children in prospect and my brothers in prospect.

6. Is a sincere sprinkled Methodist part of that visible church?
I do not think so, for one enters the church by a proper response to the gospel and this includes immersion upon the basis of faith. Let me ask Brother Lemmons if a sincere immersed person in the Methodist party is a member of the one body and if he recognizes such persons as his brothers in the Lord’s church.

I do not say that “any barrier to fellowship is an artificial barrier.” I said, “The one body will manifest itself visibly wherever any congregation of saints refuses to allow artificial barriers erected by men to keep them separated and segregated from each other.” God has erected certain barriers to fellowship. These are real. They must be respected. But I do not intend to be confined in any partisan pen by rails which men have thrown up to divide the flock. For instance, I shall not be the champion of a “one cup party” or a “multiple cups party,” an “orphan home party” or an “anti-orphan home party,” an “instrumental music party” or an “anti-instrument party.” Jesus did not die for any such party and I have brethren in all of them. I have convictions about all of these items but I shall build no party around them, nor let them or anything else build a party around me.

Our good brother thinks that Jesus commanded John to split the congregation at Pergamos. Read carefully what he says and you will see that this is exactly what he is arguing. It is just not true. Instead, our Lord commended the congregation because, “thou holdest fast my name, and has not denied my faith.” He declared that he had a few things against them because they had those who were corrupt in both doctrine and practice. Yet he declares that those who overcome in that congregation will be blessed beyond description.

It is possible to hold fast the name of Christ and not deny the faith even in a congregation where some hold doctrines which Jesus hates and practice things which he deprecates. Not one intimation is given that “the faithful” in Pergamos should come out and start a “loyal congregation.” Division of God’s family is not a divine solution to the family problems. Purity of doctrine cannot be achieved by division of brethren because such division is a sin! When Brother Lemmons justifies schism among brethren he runs counter to the Holy Spirit which everywhere condemns it. Not one of the seven churches of Asia was commanded to divide. In not one of these were the brethren told to come out and start “a faithful group.” We are not saved or damned as congregations, but as individuals.

We feel that our brother should address himself to certain questions so we can see just where he stands as to sectarianism and the party spirit.

1. Is the Lord’s church in our land identical in membership with the organization listed as “Churches of Christ” in the United States census?

2. Are there any of God’s children in other organizations listed in that census, such as the Church of God, The Baptist Church, Church of the Brethren, etc.?

3. Is absolute freedom from error on all doctrinal matters essential to being in Christ? If not, how much error can one entertain and still remain in Christ?

4. Must a man reach the personal conviction that instrumental music in the corporate worship is a sin before he can be recognized as a brother?

5. If a brother in one of our congregations arrives at the opinion that instrumental music in the corporate worship may be permissible and states it in class as an opinion, should the congregation drive him out?

6. Are honest differences of opinion and interpretation among God's children grounds for dividing the family into rival parties?

7. Does the Father of our spirits ever disinherit his children because they are honestly mistaken in their reverent attempts to obey His will?

I love the Lord who died for me. I love the church which he purchased with his own precious blood. I am going to live just as close to Jesus as I know how to live. I am going to recognize all of God's children as my beloved brothers and I am going to move among them all and share with them as they will allow. The walls they have built around their little factions mean nothing to me. I can see my brothers on both sides of them. They are not my brothers because they belong to their faction but because they belong to my Father.

Brother Lemmons is my brother, not because we are in agreement, but because we are in Christ. On that basis I have tens of thousands of brothers whom I once refused to recognize. They were my brothers all of the time but my vision was impaired and I was spiritually shortsighted. No one is going to build a fence around me and leave Brother Lemmons on the outside because he disagrees with me; neither is Brother Lemmons going to build a fence around me and make me "set at nought" my other brothers in order to love him. I am through with all factionalism. I am in the fellowship with all of my brothers in our blessed Lord. Don't fence me in except with the love of God!

The Optimistic View

Mission Messenger (October 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

Some of our brethren think we are too optimistic about the prospect for a saner attitude and a better relationship among the heirs of the restoration movement. They live in areas where my name is attacked from the pulpit and I am branded as a liberal, or castigated as a turncoat or an apostate, because I insist upon loving and respecting all of my brothers on a family rather than upon a factional basis. They point to previous attempts to breach the walls of exclusivism and prophesy that any effort in this direction is doomed to come to nought!

There are some salient factors they overlook. One is that a troubled corporate conscience is clamoring for correction of an intolerable situation. The hypocrisy of professing unity while practicing division is becoming recognized. It disturbs and troubles all of our factions from the most radical to the most reasonable. There is an inner sense of doubt creeping in that any of our party corrals are big enough to hold all of the sheep of God! Brethren are being forced to face the decision as to whether the divine purpose will be better served by expanding the corrals on one side or another, or by abandoning them in favor of “the one fold under the one Shepherd.” It is at this point the vested interests will make their last ditch stand to preserve their financial investments and concerns of praise! But there will be some “empty saddles in the old corral!”

Another thing that must be taken into consideration is that all of our brethren, especially those who are younger, are becoming better educated. There is a smoldering discontent because those who have been taught to think are not permitted to do so. There is a burning resentment against the pat answers and glib replies which do not furnish adequate solutions to the questions being raised. Our factionalism is the outgrowth of a nineteenth century approach to the situations existing on raw frontiers or in a backwoods environment. Our fathers who lived in constant personal danger and hardship were “quick on the trigger” in both their physical and spiritual relationships. They often divided first and sought to debate it out afterwards. There is no reason at all to assume that their philosophy of attempting to maintain doctrinal purity by division of God’s family was correct, and especially so since God everywhere condemns such division as a sin.

Every faction in our land today is sitting on a potential volcano. For instance, in every religious college demanding abject partisan conformity as a test of loyalty to Jesus Christ, there is a hard core of consecrated young men and women who rebel against the enforcement of such loyalty tests. They gnash their teeth in frustration when professors are summarily dismissed upon no other ground than their refusal to conform to the decrees of partisan political powers in the church. These young people will not always be young! Neither will they always be in school! They will not always be silenced by circumstances!

The things I mention are regarded as dangerous to the welfare of the church. I do not think they are so at all. Instead, I think they betoken the coming of a realistic re-appraisal of our standing before God and the world of mankind. Such an honest evaluation of ourselves can only bode good for the one body. They are dangerous to our factions and parties, and that is actually what is meant by those who forecast danger to the church. Our whole problem comes from equating the church for which Christ died with the faction in which we have always lived. As thinking brethren leave their narrow factional background as an “outgrown shell by life’s unresting sea,” the church of God will mean more to them as their parties mean less. This is not bad. It is good!

For awhile we shall see the old pressure tactics of the past applied with new vengeance— boycott, threats, censorship, innuendoes and false insinuations. But these will soon lose their relevance because most of the brethren will see through them. Many now have enough light to pierce even the partisan smoke-screens which they once helped to create. It will become increasingly more difficult to hold people in line and to make them goosestep to the tune of dogmatism and authoritarianism. We live in a generation which has been reared in crisis. They will not frighten easily!

As I see our current condition, we need to cultivate not only a proper idea of fellowship, but we need to see it at work. We need to see someone who can move among all of the factions and love those who compose them all without endorsing the factionalism of any of them. This is, of course, merely another way of saying that we need an example for our day of someone who is just a Christian and a Christian only. This is the hardest thing one can attempt in a divided factional world. The pressures are always great to “line you up” and make you conform. There are always those who want to get you in and slam the door on you so they can work you over and make you in their own image!

It is what all of us hold in common that binds us to God. It is our peculiarities based upon deductions from the scriptures which bind us to our factions. I think it is worthy of sincere research to determine whether any such peculiarity can possibly be as important as the great reservoir of truth from which all of God’s family drink alike. In other words, can that which makes us a member of a party ever be elevated to the same degree of importance as that which makes us a member of the one body.

All truths are equally true, but not all truths are equally important. Are our distinctions which bind us in factional alignments as valuable to our spiritual welfare and do they contribute as much to our soul expansion as that which binds us to all of our brothers in Christ Jesus?

Bertrand Russell has declared that the world must discover a moral alternative to war or humanity will perish. On the same basis, we must discover a spiritual alternative to division and schism or the new humanity will become sterile and its witness will perish. Surely God did not make men to slay one another and make the earth run red with gore, nor did he make the new humanity to fight and kill one another or to bite and devour one another. It is imperative that we find that common ground of faith upon which we can stand together in our Lord in spite of our differences of opinion and interpretation. To elevate any of these, or all of them, to a status greater than the blood of Christ, is to deny the efficacy of the cross.

I refuse to allow any wall which men can erect to become greater than the cross which was destined to break down walls and make us one. It is coming to the cross that unites us and there I shall meet with all who bow to Jesus. The cross will conquer.

The Manifested Life

Mission Messenger (October 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

(1 John 1:1-7)

Jesus was the embodiment of eternal life. As such he was from the beginning and was with the Father. He was manifested in such a form that eternal life could be tested by the senses. John says that the apostles heard, saw, looked upon, and handled the Word of life. These companions of Jesus had audible, visual and manual contact with him. They even looked upon the Word, which means they had opportunity to carefully and intently scrutinize the Word which was made flesh.

The apostle says, “For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father and was manifested unto us.” Observe the order of this thrilling array of statements. There was the fact of the incarnation, the act of observation and the testimony related to the fact. The design of the testimony was to manifest to others what had been manifested unto them. They were the revealers of that which had been revealed unto them. That which had been revealed was eternal life embodied in a person.

The purpose of the testimony was made quite clear. “That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us; and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.” The best definition of fellowship is “to share a common life.” The Father and Son had shared eternal life with the chosen witnesses. They had lived intimately with that life— hearing, seeing and touching it— and now they declared that which they had seen and heard in order to share with us the eternal life they had seen and heard. Thus we could share in the common life (eternal life) which they shared with the Father and the Son.

But we must distinguish between “the Word of life” and the testimony about him. The Word was with God and was God. The testimony was not “the Word of life” but the joy-bringing news about him. “And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full.” You cannot reduce a person to writing. You can describe him, relate his sayings, tell of his doings, and men may come to know these things without ever knowing the person at all. It is not knowing what was written but knowing Him about whom it was written, which produces fellowship, that is, the sharing in eternal life. Eternal life does not consist of Jesus pointing to a book, but of a book pointing to Jesus— not as the source of life, but as life at its source.

Eternal life is an absolute. It leaves no room for death. If that life is light, and it is, then it must be perfect light even as it is perfect life. This leaves no room for darkness at all. We are not surprised to read, “This then is the message we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light and in him is no darkness at all.” Study the context carefully. The witnesses declared the eternal life which they saw and heard, that we might share in the common life, and the burden of their message was that Deity is perfect light, devoid of all darkness.

What is that quality called “light” which is identified with God in the absolute until it is said, “God is light”? John equates it with love. To love one another is to be in the light. To hate one another is to be in darkness. This is as true of God as of ourselves. “Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you; because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth. He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling (no darkness) in him.”

If it be true that God is light, and if light is love, it follows then that God is love. This is correct. “He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love” (4:8). “God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him” (4:16). Now note the statement: “If we say that we have fellowship with him and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth.” This can only mean that when one professes to share the common life with God in whom there is no darkness (hate for his own), while at the same time walking in darkness (hate for God’s own), he is a liar. So we read, “If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?” (4:20).

“But if we walk in the light as he is in the light we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.” This passage has suffered much abuse. To walk in the light is the opposite of “to walk in darkness” which is equated with hating a brother (2:11). “Fellowship one with another” has to do with fellowship between God and ourselves as contrasted with the previous verse. Let us paraphrase. “But if we walk in the light of love for our brothers, as God exists in the perfect love for us all, we will not lie when we say that God and ourselves are in fellowship, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son will continue cleansing us from all sin.”

Perhaps no other passage is more important to recapture a proper sense of our relationship to God and our brethren than this one. We shudder to think how often it has been used to defeat the very purpose for which it was written. It is time that those who are serious understand and affirm its significance.

Answer to Objections (No. 1)

Mission Messenger (November 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

In an editorial in Firm Foundation, June 11, 1963 Brother Lemmons writes about “Objections Brother Ketcherside Does Not Answer.” He says I am “in direct contradiction to the scriptures,” that my writings contain “a body of error,” and that they contain hidden poison. Our brother proceeds to list twelve objections which he affirms I do not answer. Here are my answers to them.

1. “Brother K teaches that the grace of God is wider than the authority of Christ, and that many may be saved by the grace of God who have never submitted to the authority of Christ.” I teach that the grace of God is greater than the church and existed before it. Grace is not a product of the church but the church is a product of grace. All who are saved must be saved by God’s grace. When the Father made Jesus the head over all things to the church, he specifically exempted himself. I am under the authority of Jesus and I have no right to offer salvation upon any other basis than that authorized by Jesus. The Father is not under that authority. If he chooses to save those who have never heard the good news, or those who have heard it and misunderstand some of its implications in their lives, he will not be acting in violation of his own will or of the authority of his Son.

I am bound by the decrees of Christ but I have no right to try and bind the source of all authority by the restrictions he bound upon me. As J. W. McGarvey wrote: “It is not necessary, in order to contend for scripture teaching on baptism, to take the ground that God has tied his hands and put it out of his power to grant mercy to any who have been misled in regard to that ordinance. He has bound us, but he has not bound himself, except that he is bound to do what he has promised. He has not bound himself to do no more than he has promised. Don’t injure the cause of truth by taking positions which rob God of the power to be merciful.”

I do not think any will be saved who refuse to submit to, or rebel against, the authority of Christ. It is my opinion that some may be saved who have done all they know to do but have never learned about Jesus or have been honestly mistaken about some of his requirements. What is poisonous about this position which I share in common with all the pioneers of the restoration movement?

2. “Brother K makes a distinction between ‘the gospel’ and ‘doctrine’ which is foreign to the Bible.” There are two classes of persons as relates to any kingdom— aliens and citizens. As respects the kingdom of heaven there are two distinct messages adapted to the state of each. Both messages are the word of God. One is “an evangel” or “good news” designed to enroll students (make disciples); the other a course of instruction, or doctrine, for the purpose of instructing and edifying those who enroll. The gospel is to be preached to the whole world, or every creature (Mark 16:15). The apostolic doctrine was addressed to saints and congregations of immersed believers. The “euangelion” (gospel) was to lead men to enlist. You cannot evangelize saved persons. Alexander Campbell wrote: “We preach the gospel to unbelievers, to aliens, but never to Christians or those who have received it” (Millennial Harbinger, April, 1862).

The gospel is the seed by which we are begotten (1 Cor. 4:15); the apostolic doctrine is the food we eat (1 Cor. 3:2). The gospel was proclaimed fully by Peter on Pentecost and those who gladly received his word fully obeyed the gospel. There was never anything added to the good news, but those who obeyed the gospel “continued steadfastly in the apostles’ doctrine,” and this was revealed as conditions warranted and they were able to digest it. The gospel is a message of victory in Jesus to an alien world. Suppose the audience on Pentecost had not asked Peter what to do and no opportunity had been thus provided to inform them they should be baptized. Would this have meant that he had not preached the gospel to them? Baptism is the enabling act by which we are permitted to share in the blessings of the message. We are brought into the fellowship of God and Christ through the gospel and we then grow up in Christ by learning the doctrine.

Dr. Carroll Kendrick wrote in Gospel Advocate (1890, page 373), “There is absolutely neither precept nor precedent for preaching to the church. Preaching the gospel is for the world.” Alexander Campbell wrote, “Preaching the gospel and teaching the converts are as distinct and distinguishable employments as enlisting an army and training it, or as creating a school and teaching it. Unhappily for the church and the world, this distinction, if at all conceded as legitimate, is obliterated or annulled in almost all Protestant Christendom.” What is poisonous about this position which I share in common with the restoration pioneers?

3. “He teaches that after one has been made a child of God he may make all sorts of errors concerning doctrine, but none of these, regardless of how grievous, except for denying the Deity of Jesus Christ, can be a basis for withdrawal of fellowship.” I simply say, as did Brother J. N. Armstrong, late president of Harding College, “I will make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation.” To be in error is not necessarily a sin unless it is voluntary, else all of us will be damned, for none of us know it all. Only those doctrines which separate from God should separate us from each other. One comes into the fellowship of God and Christ through faith in the Sonship and acknowledgment of the Lordship of Jesus over his life. Only by renouncing that lordship through denial of Jesus in word or conduct is that fellowship broken. God never disinherits any of his children because they are honestly mistaken and we should not divide them.

Our differences in the fellowship of the saints are grounds for discussion and not division. To be specific, we sin against God and our brethren when we form parties on the basis of our belief in, or opposition to, colleges, orphan homes, Herald of Truth, use of tobacco, missionary societies, interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy, leavened bread, the manner of breaking the bread, fermented wine, individual cups, Bible classes, uninspired literature, the one-man minister system, instrumental music, foot washing, the hour when we ought to meet, a head covering for women, and such like things. Certainly some are in error on all of these things but the greatest error of all, and a sin because it is voluntary, is forming sects about the “pro” and “con” of such things. We are one because we agree in Christ, not because all who are in Christ agree. It is a sin to be factious and one who builds a party around either aspect of these things is a factious man and will have to be rejected after due warning, not because of his position but because of his disposition.

My position on this matter is identical with that expressed in Propositions 6 and 7 of the “Declaration and Address” as read by Thomas Campbell. What is so poisonous about this position which I hold in common with the pioneers of the restoration movement?

Reply to the Foregoing [article by Lemmons]

Mission Messenger (November 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

It is apparent I will not be able to write in a manner to please Brother Lemmons. He is afraid I will get my thoughts before his readers yet he has devoted many issues of his paper to reviewing his own version of my views. Repeatedly he has asked me questions and then proven reluctant for his readers to see my answers. I am not editing a rival journal to Firm Foundation and I want all of my readers to see the views of Brother Lemmons. If he has the truth, then let the truth be known! We will review his article and answer his questions.

1. I do not believe that my obligation to take the good news of Jesus to all whom we can reach obligates God to damn all whom we do not reach. Our brother would not allow God to save a single Buddhist who had never learned of Jesus. But God regards no man as a Buddhist, Methodist, Presbyterian or Quaker. These are human distinctions. God regards every man on earth as an object of His love and an individual in his own right. Every person will be judged on the basis of his individual responsibility and on this basis God may save some who have never learned about Jesus. I have never thought of the good news as designed solely to keep us out of hell and I suspect it is to introduce us to a relationship which will help to keep hell out of us. To save means to make whole and we are obligated to share the message with all men regardless of circumstances. It does not nullify the great commission to conclude that those who are not reached under it may be saved by the grace and mercy of the loving Creator and Benefactor of mankind.

Certainly I have no right to promise salvation to any person who is not immersed into our Lord, nor to regard those who have not been immersed as in the fellowship which I share by God's mercy unto me, but by the same token I do not need to conclude that every person who is sprinkled in infancy and whose opportunities for learning better are impaired will be dealt with in the same category as those who know better and deliberately spurn the will of God. I am in no position to either save or damn those who have not learned better for I do not know the degree of their personal responsibility.

I am not so sure that God's grace is limited by God's word, and certainly not by my brother's interpretation of it. It was God's grace which gave us both our Savior and the word. I do not deny that all authority in heaven and on earth is given to our Lord Jesus but I do deny that it has been given to Brother Lemmons. Jesus has his authority as a gift and the Giver is greater than the gift. When God put all things in subjection under the feet of Christ "it clearly means to exclude God who subordinates them" (1 Cor. 15:17). "While every man has Christ for his Head . . . Christ's Head is God" (1 Cor. 11:3). "You belong to Christ, and Christ to God" (1 Cor. 3:23). Bro. Lemmons concludes that because we have no right to promise forgiveness except upon terms prescribed by Jesus, God has not right to show mercy to those who have never heard of Jesus. "How can they believe in Him of whom they have not heard?" He thinks that because we are under Jesus, God is also. For God to administer grace outside the authority of Jesus is not wrong because God is not under the authority of Jesus. Nor does it circumvent the authority He gave to Jesus for the Father to do more than He promised. In attempting to defend his theory about the authority of Jesus over creation our brother wants to bind the Creator with that which He gave to bind us.

2. The gospel is to be preached to the whole world to make believers; the apostolic doctrine was addressed to saints and faithful brethren. It was specifically designed to instruct men how to behave in the church. Brother Lemmons says, “Jesus preached doctrine to aliens.” The word “teaching” can always be substituted for doctrine so our brother thinks Jesus preached teaching. Such a confusion of terms was not once made by the Spirit.

But were those whom Jesus taught aliens? Were they not in covenant relationship with God? If not, why did he tell them, “And you, like the lamp, must shed light among your fellows, so that when they see the good you do, they may give praise to your Father in heaven” (Matt. 5:16). They were told not to pray like the heathen and to address God as their Father in heaven, and they were promised that if they forgave others their Father would forgive them (Matt. 6:14). Our brother is hard pressed when he must resort to such an interpretation.

He does no better by his reference to Acts 5:28, when the High Priest who looked upon the disciples as merely another Jewish sect, that of “the Nazarenes,” accused them of filling Jerusalem with their teaching. Sergius Paulus did not hear Paul “preach teaching” but “When the Governor saw what had happened he became a believer, deeply impressed by what he had learned about the Lord” (Acts 13:12).

Certainly God was able to strengthen the Romans on the basis of the gospel which had been proclaimed unto them, which they had received and wherein they stood. But if the Roman letter was part of the gospel, why did Paul write to them, “But they have not all obeyed the gospel” (Rom. 10:16)? How could they have obeyed it if he was just then writing it to them? In view of the fact that he wrote several of his letters after the one to the Romans, why did he say he had already “fully preached the gospel of Christ from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum” (Rom. 15:19). Did he not know there was more to come or could he distinguish between the gospel he proclaimed and the instructions he wrote to those who had obeyed it?

Our brother sadly misrepresents when he says I think one can obey the gospel without baptism. I do not believe any such thing. Baptism is the one act by which a penitent believer of the good news proclaimed by another demonstrates his personal faith in it and comes into the fellowship of our dear Lord.

3. Our brother has difficulty understanding what is meant by renouncing the lordship of Jesus in word or conduct. One comes into the fellowship by accepting the Sonship and Lordship of Jesus and he leaves it by denial of that which he affirms to enter it. Jesus says, “Whoever will acknowledge me before men I will acknowledge before my Father in heaven; and whoever disowns me before men, I will disown him before my Father in heaven” (Matt. 10:32, 33). One either disowns Jesus by word or conduct. Bro. Lemmons says Ephesians 5:5, 6 contradicts this. Instead, it confirms it. One guilty of fornication, indecency or greed rejects the lordship of Jesus over his life and verse 6 says, “Let no one deceive you with shallow arguments; it is for all these things that God’s dreadful judgment is coming upon his rebel subjects.”

True God threatened to remove His candlestick from Ephesus but what our brother needs to find is where God commanded the brethren to remove themselves from the candlestick. Our brother also warps and wrests what Jesus said to the congregation at Thyatira. Jesus commended them for “your love and faithfulness, your good service and your fortitude; and of late you have done even better than at the first.” He did promise dire vengeance upon Jezebel, her lovers and her children. But to those “who do not accept this teaching and have no experience of what they like to call the deep secrets of Satan; on you I will impose no further burden.” Was the congregation at Thyatira a “faithful church”? If not, why did Jesus commend them for their “love and faithfulness”? In spite of the doctrine of modern apostles of schism Jesus not once commanded division of either of His seven candlesticks. Isn't it surprising, with all of the division of congregations today, that despite all of the mistaken ideas and impure lives in those mentioned in the new covenant scriptures, not one was ever commanded to divide, and no one was commanded to split the candlestick in any community? Where did God authorize starting a rival candlestick?

Our good Brother Lemmons is in a real predicament. He does not know what to do with me. I will not count him as out of the fellowship because of his peculiar orthodox opinions and he cannot count me as out of his "fellowship," because, by his definition, I have never been in it. I never was a member of the faction with which Brother Lemmons is allied, and now that I have renounced all factionalism as sinful, I never intend to be, so he cannot "disfellowship" me as he so naively puts it. I regard him as in the fellowship because he is in Christ and he regards me as out of it because I am not in his party. I am free to love all who are in Christ, to move among them, and to commend what is good as I see it, and condemn what is not, as I see it!

Answer to Objections (No. 2)

Mission Messenger (November 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

(Editor's Note: This is the second article in reply to an editorial by Reuel Lemmons, which appeared in the Firm Foundation, June 11, 1963.)

4. "He teaches that every sincere believer in the Messiahship of Jesus is a child of God, whether he is ever baptized or not, and is now his brother or sister in prospect." This statement is not true. I teach that every sincere person who believes that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God (1 John 5:1) and I must love all such because I love the one who begot them. Baptism is the delivery of such believers into the family of God. Before they enter the family relationship they are God's children in prospect and my brothers or sisters in prospect. They are no more children of God before they are delivered than any other embryo or foetus is a child. My responsibility toward them is to act as an obstetrician or midwife and bring them to birth, i.e., deliver them into the fellowship. What God will do with those who die in the womb, or are abortions or miscarriages, must be left to his mercy and judgment. He will no doubt deal with them as with all the rest of us, on the basis of individual responsibility.

5. "Bro. K teaches there must be diversity of belief among God's people in order for them to have unity." I do not teach any such thing. I do not say there must be diversity to have unity, but I do teach that to have unity it must be a unity in diversity. There is no other kind of unity possible for frail, finite beings such as Brother Lemmons and myself. In the domestic, economic, social and political realms all unity is that of diversity. We are the “United States” but no one would deny there is considerable diversity between Alabama and New York, or between Texas and Missouri. God has not bound us to conformity but to unity and Romans 14 was written to show how to maintain that unity in diversity.

6. “Bro. K refuses to deal with the verb form of fellowship.” I have not refused to deal with it. I have said that the use made of the term by those like Bro. Lemmons is not sanctioned by scripture or linguistic research. In his next paragraph he asks, “Should we fellowship those whom God excludes from heaven?” We do not use other words ending in “ship” (signifying state or condition) in such fashion. We do not ask if elders should eldership each other, if apostles apostle—shipped each other, or if citizens should citizenship one another. Nor does anyone ask if a person companionships his wife, partnerships his associates, or sonships his father. Then, why ask if we fellowship this person or that?

In the Koine Greek there grew up an acquired usage in verbal form and Paul employs it in such places as Phil. 4:15; Eph. 5:11; Phil. 4:14, etc., in the sense of “having fellowship,” i.e., sharing in the state, or in the common life. Richard Grant White in Words and Their Uses (pages 141-143) says: “Fellowship used as a verb is an abomination which has hitherto been regarded as of American origin. It is not often heard or written among people whose language is in other respects a fair example of the English spoken in ‘America;’ but Mr. Bartlett justly says in his ‘Dictionary of Americanisms’ (a useful and interesting although a very misleading book), that it ‘appears with disgusting frequency in the reports of ecclesiastical conventions, and in the religious newspapers generally.’ The convictions, however, and the newspapers are those of the least educated sects.” I just do not care to have MISSION

MESSENGER adjudged in that category.

7. “His idea that error in doctrine, except for that of the antiChrist, should never cause us to break fellowship puts him in opposition to Gal. 1:6-9 and Eph. 5:3-12. If God breaks fellowship with those who preach another gospel (or doctrine) why should not we? The latter passage excludes from heaven those who practice covetousness, envy, jealousy and such like.” Certainly we will not be in the fellowship with those who proclaim another gospel, for it is the gospel of Christ that brings us into the fellowship. We do not enter it by an understanding of all the apostle wrote to the churches, but by belief of the gospel they proclaimed to the world, for we are in the world until we come into Christ. Does Brother Lemmons intend to imply that those who differ with him about cups, classes or colleges, are preaching another gospel? Is our brother teaching a gospel of salvation by multiple cups and of damnation by instrumental music?

We should disassociate ourselves from all whom God has cut off and from no others. Those whose conduct denies the Lordship of Jesus over their lives prove themselves unworthy. I never knew of an anti-covetous party, an anti-envy party, or an anti-jealousy party. Our problem is making men’s views, opinions and interpretations the grounds upon which to form sects. Does God exclude from heaven a child of his who is honestly mistaken in judgment about Herald of Truth, classes, cups, orphan homes, instrumental music, or an organization for spreading the gospel? Covetousness, envy and jealousy are works of the flesh. Is an honest mistake in judgment or a misunderstanding of a scriptural passage a work of the flesh? Does our brother think God will damn everyone who does not see everything just like the faction with which he is allied?

8. “He teaches sectarianism is sin (which is true), but then urges complete fellowship of sectarians.” Our good brother uses “fellowship” in a way unknown to the scriptures, but I do not urge “fellowship of sectarians” at all. I only say that I am in the fellowship with every child of God wherever he is. I am in the fellowship with such children of God because God has added them to the one body, not because they have added themselves to something additional. I am not in the fellowship with God’s children who may be in the Baptist party because they are Baptists, for I am not a Baptist. I am in the fellowship with them because they are Christians, that is, have come into Christ. One need not be sectarian because he is in a sect any more than one has to be a Russian because he is in Russia, or a Texan because he is in Texas. One is not a sectarian because of where he is but because of his attitude toward truth. Some members of the “Church of Christ” are very sectarian, some who are not in it are relatively free from the sectarian spirit.

I have urged those in the various factions of the restoration movement to stay where they are when they learn new truths and not switch factions. Above all, they should not come out and start another party on the basis of their newly-discovered truth, under the guise that it will be the “loyal church.” This troubles Brother Lemmons. One time he argues that I am going to start a new sect but the next time he condemns me for insisting that we all stay where we are and share our increasing knowledge with those whom we know best and who need it most. How can you start a new party if everyone stays where he is and loves all the rest. What all of us need to do is not to start a “loyal church” but quit our sectarian attitude toward our brothers and be loyal to Christ Jesus. I am not interested in an anti-party party or an anti-faction faction!

Reply to the Foregoing [article by Lemmons]

Mission Messenger (November 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

4. Our genial brother strives hard to indict me but I suspect that many of his readers share my views. Most of us are better than our unwritten creeds. One is begotten of God when the Spirit quickens him through the gospel upon his belief that Jesus is the Son of God. It is believing this which produces life (John 20:31). The period of gestation differs with the individual. When one is immersed he is born into the family relationship. Prior to that he is God's child in prospect and my brother in prospect. But there is a difference. God can call things that be not as though they were (Rom. 4:17). When one is conceived, even though not yet born, God can foresee his future relationship (Cp. Romans 9:10-12). He knows how those who have believed will further respond although I do not.

In the sense in which John uses the expression, those who are begotten "do no sin" because the divine seed remains in them and they renounce the practice of sin. In the sense in which Brother Lemmons apparently uses it they commit sin just as he does, for I hardly think he would affirm sinless perfection for himself. A believer receives the Holy Spirit when born into the family relationship and becomes a brother in fact instead of in prospect (Gal. 4:6).

5. Our brother now admits "there may be a diversity of opinion and yet unity.” On June 25, he wrote, “Unity can only come by putting out of our hearts our own opinions.” He assailed what he called “a highly inferior and absolutely counterfeit proposal for unity in spite of differences.” Now he has accepted our thesis in a degree and is willing to “counterfeit” in a limited measure. I deny that any honest opinion when held as such by a humble child of God, can ever be made a test of fellowship because fellowship in Christ is not conditioned upon uniformity of opinion but upon oneness in Him. The greatest sin to which diversity of opinion can lead is schism in the body and that is the very thing our brother condones.

He says, “In matters where diversity leads to sin there can be no unity.” If a brother sincerely holds the opinion of the pre-millennial reign of Jesus but is not led into sin does Brother Lemmons consider him as in the fellowship? Will he use the Firm Foundation to urge acceptance of all the humble brethren who hold the pre-millennial view and are not sinners? Has the post-millennial view held by Brother Lemmons led him into the sin of dividing the body into warring parties over the coming of our glorious Lord who is the head of that body and of us all?

6. I did not say that fellowship used as a verb is an Americanism. I quoted from Richard Grant White, a distinguished linguist, who in turn referred to John Russell Bartlett and his “Dictionary of Americanisms.” In his book Words and Their Uses, Mr. White lists the verb “to fellowship” in a chapter entitled “Words that are no Words.” He declares that it is “the least educated sects” who use the word “fellowship” in this fashion. The passages cited by our brother do not obviate my position that fellowship is a relationship between persons. In Phil. 4:14 the brethren were commended for sharing with Paul in his difficulties; in 1 Timothy 5:22 the evangelist was warned against sharing with others in their misdeeds.

It is proper for our good brother to point out our own lapses into the factional speech we are striving to correct. We regret our mistakes but rejoice when someone is gracious enough to point them out to us. We are surprised that our brother did not find more errors in his meticulous search of our writings. No doubt there are others which he overlooked. It is our aim, God willing, to free MISSION MESSENGER from error as we learn better and in the words of our brother to “clean up the sheet.” We invoke the prayers and help of all the brethren that we may edit a journal deserving of the consideration of every member of the concerned ones.

7. No, Brother Lemmons, those who have believed the facts of the gospel but have not been immersed into our Lord have not entered the fellowship. Will our readers note the statement that I cannot sidetrack the issue by calling attention to minor opinions? I mentioned “Herald of Truth, classes, cups, orphan homes, instrumental music, or an organization for spreading the gospel.” Are these minor human opinions? If so, will our brother give up his human opinion on all of them, to have peace? This is his recommendation with reference to opinions.

Certainly we are to “take no part in the unfruitful works of darkness” mentioned in Ephesians 5:3-12. But does Brother Lemmons classify all of God’s sons who use instrumental music with those who are immoral, impure, covetous and idolaters? We are not divided over such things. We are divided over cups, classes, colleges, etc. Why equate our brothers who disagree with us with the pagans of Paul’s day? Does God break fellowship with one of his sincere humble children over a misunderstanding relative to orphan homes or instrumental music? Does Brother Lemmons?

8. Our respected brother assumes that every one in a sect is a sectarian. But sectarianism is an attitude. It is the party spirit. A great many people are caught in the meshes of the sects who are not sectarian, just as a great many who are sectarian have been caught in the same faction as Brother Lemmons. I do not urge “complete fellowship of sectarians” at all. I simply affirm that I am in the fellowship with the Christians who are in the sects. I am opposed to all sectarianism but I am not opposed to God's children wherever they may be. I deplore their errors as I do mine but I love them as He loved us all.

I am castigated as having a "far more liberal view of the essentials." Our brother mentions instrumental music and premillennialists. I am opposed to the use of instrumental music in the corporate worship. I do not hold the pre-millennial interpretation. What makes me a liberal? Simply that I love God's children and my brothers who disagree with my views about instrumental music and the millennium.

I will not drive them from me. I will not make a test of fellowship out of these matters because God does not. I will not subscribe to a creed of orthodoxy which makes a man's relationship to my blessed Lord depend upon his having a correct view of instrumental music or the millennium. I will not build a party around my opposing views and make membership contingent upon conformity to my interpretation.

I believe all sectarianism is dangerous and none more dangerous than that which develops an exclusivist attitude which attempts to cut men off from God because they will not bow to our unwritten creeds. I am through with factionalism—all of it! I am through with all parties and partisanism! I intend to be just a child of God and a brother to all of his other children. To deny their paternity is to insult my Father. Our brother applies to me the quote from Henry V, by Shakespeare, about "the valiant flea." It is an undeserved compliment. Instead, I have taken the advice of the immortal bard as suggested in Macbeth, "Take no care who chafes, who frets, or where conspirers are."

Answer to Objections (No. 3)

Mission Messenger (December 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

(Editor's Note: This is the third in a series of replies to an article by Reuel Lemmons, in Firm Foundation, June 11, 1963, under the title, "Objections Brother Ketcherside Does Not Answer." For a complete copy of the article by Bro. Lemmons and our previous replies see our issue of last month.)

9. "Bro. K. thinks all the sons of God are in the church of Christ but they are not all in one corral. . . . Brother K should tell us what other corrals the Lord has sheep in besides the church of Christ." All of God's sheep are in the church of Christ but they are not all in the partisan corral or faction with which Bro. Lemmons is identified. The church is in a state of schism. The flock of God is scattered. Not all of God's sheep are in the corral that sponsors Herald of Truth or in the corral that opposes it. Not all are in the one-cup corral or with the individual communion service corral. Not all are in the non-instrument "Church of Christ." Not all are in the "Christian Church." Does Brother Lemmons think the church of Christ is confined to the restoration movement? Did Jesus shed his blood for the restoration movement? God's sheep, who have been received by him, have allowed themselves to be herded into many sectarian corrals, but they are still his sheep even though caught in strange thickets.

10. "The Roman Catholics, Mormons, Baptists, and scores of others have ‘believed the report’ and have ‘climaxed the manifestation of that faith by baptism.’ Has God made them our brothers because we have a common father? Does ‘the fellowship’ include all these and more?” Every sincere believer in the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus who has been immersed into Jesus Christ as an implementation of that faith is God’s child and has been called into the fellowship of God’s Son. Regardless of who immersed him he is God’s child because he has been born again. He is my brother because he has the same father as myself. No one is in the family of God because he is a Roman Catholic, Mormon or Baptist, but because he is a child of God. There may be those in all of these sects who have been born again of the water and the Spirit. All such are my brothers. They need not leave the family and go out of what God brought them into, in order to come back in again. They need only to renounce that to which they aligned themselves which separates and segregates them from the rest of God’s children and be just Christians, and Christians only!

11. “His entire contention that unity is equated with brotherhood is false.” Our brother concludes that the fellowship may be equated with brotherhood in one sense, but denies they are equated with unity. My position is simply that “unity of the Spirit” is created by the fact that the one Spirit dwells in every son of God because he is God’s son (Gal. 4:6). This creates the “fellowship of the Spirit” (Phil. 2:1; 2 Cor. 13:14). Since all of God’s sons are brothers and constitute the brotherhood, and since only one Spirit dwells in all of them, producing unity of the Spirit and fellowship, these are the same in the sight of God. I am united to every other brother in Christ and in the fellowship with them through the indwelling Spirit in every son of God.

12. “The brother’s position makes God responsible for unity, or the lack of it, because God is the author of ‘brotherhood.’ If he were right, then it would be as impossible for us not to have fellowship with each other as it would be impossible to be sons of the Father without the new birth.” I do not understand Brother Lemmons' reasoning at this point. While I believe that God is the author of our fellowship I believe that we can so act as to have God disinherit us, and those whom he rejects from his family we must also reject if we remain in the family status. I do think we have made tests of fellowship which God has not made and does not sanction or recognize, and in doing this we have split and shivered the brotherhood into rival fragments. Since these walls are artificial and not created by God to divide his family I do not recognize their validity and I can see my brothers on both sides of all of them. I do not say that others must do this but I do say that I must do so, for I can no longer be factional with my present conviction leading me to love and respect all of my brothers in Him.

In closing, let me say that I believe we are victims of a factional philosophy that purity of doctrine can only be maintained by separation from brethren. We have mistakenly equated fellowship with endorsement and confused unity with conformity. As a result the restoration movement is one of the most divided religious movements on the contemporary American scene. I am earnestly trying in a very weak way to restore a sense of brotherhood and fellowship in which it will be possible for us to discuss our differences as loving brethren, rather than as warring aliens. To this end I beg the prayers of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ with pure hearts.

Reply to the Foregoing [article by Lemmons]

Mission Messenger (December 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

9. I do not share the views of either sectarian preachers or Brother Lemmons as to the extent of the one body. They think it is composed of all sects; he thinks it is limited to one party, that is, to those heirs of the restoration movement listed in the United States Census as “Churches of Christ.” The body of Christ is neither a sect or a party. It is composed of every sincere immersed believer on this earth who is joined to Jesus as head. I do not attack the church. I love it as does my blessed Lord. The problem with my good brother is that when I point out the sectarian attitude of the particular faction with which he is allied, he thinks I am attacking the church. To him “the entire brotherhood” is composed of those only who oppose instrumental music and certain societies. True I once was associated with a smaller faction than the one which my brother now represents but since coming to “know where the boundaries of the church are” I have renounced all factionalism and factional alliances. I no longer intend to be hemmed up in any partisan corral, God being my helper.

10. I do not hold that any person is in “the fellowship” who has not been immersed into Christ. This I have repeatedly stated and many readers are disturbed about the motive which prompts Bro. Lemmons to misrepresent my position. All such should remember that our brother is editor of a party journal and he must defend its orthodoxy at any cost. In other articles, when not directly attacking my position, he has conceded virtually everything for which I contend. He needs the prayers of all that he will be able to shake off the chains of orthodoxy and be a free man in Christ Jesus. Then he will not need to employ those tactics which place a false construction on the words of a brother with whom he disagrees. I do not contend that “the sincere sprinkled” or “the pious unimmersed” are in the fellowship. I never did do so. He cannot find any such statements in my writings!

The gospel is the good news proclaimed by one person, baptism is the act by which another, a believing penitent who hears the news, responds to it. It is the act of enrollment in the school of Christ by one who believes the report. Our good brother now concedes there are “people in the denominations who may have become children of God through satisfactory obedience to the gospel.” How can this be when he thinks the gospel includes everything contained in the new covenant scriptures? Are there any in the denominations who have given satisfactory obedience to every word the apostles wrote? For that matter, has Brother Lemmons himself done so? Our brother needs to be careful or he will be making a difference between the gospel which makes people “become children of God” and the doctrine upon which they grow. That is my position and he is learning rapidly. To God be the praise!

11. I do not deny the existence of disunity. I am devoting my life to helping overcome disunity among the saints. There is a difference between the actual unity conferred by the indwelling Spirit as a gift of God, and a practical demonstration of it by weak mortals such as ourselves. Every person in whom the Spirit dwells is united with every other such person through Jesus Christ. But we allow opinions, interpretations, and personal convictions to disrupt our corporate witness. My approach to the problem is to recognize that the unity conferred by the Spirit is greater and nobler, being of divine origin, than any of the walls we have erected. I shall recognize that unity, stress it and allow it to guide my behavior until I can show to the whole world that I am one with every child of God in spite of mere human differences. I shall make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. We are actually united in Christ while divided from each other and that unity in Him is more precious to me than our disunity.

12. I am glad that every sincere Christian is in hearty agreement with my objectives. Of course, any viewpoint which differs with Brother Lemmons is an “unscriptural doctrine” because our brother mistakes orthodoxy for God’s word and his fallible interpretation for divine revelation. This is true of all of our factions. There are “accursed children” and the same verse describes who they are in this language, “They have eyes full of adultery, insatiable for sin. They entice unsteady souls. They have been trained in greed.” Does Brother Lemmons apply this to those who differ with him about cups, classes, colleges, Herald of Truth, orphan homes, or instrumental music? If not, why did he introduce it? What does it have to do with being in the fellowship with pure and humble saints who differ with us about the things that divide us into rival parties? I hold no brief for fellowship with “cursed children” but what I want to know is why Brother Lemmons is not in fellowship with those who are not cursed. I want the whole world to know that I am in the fellowship with every sincere immersed believer who trusts in the Lord Jesus and seeks to serve Him. I would suffer my right arm to be cut off before I would brand one of “these little ones” as being in the category of those alluded to in 2 Peter 2. If it is poison to plead that we love all of God’s children and our brothers then I have been poisoned on the love of God shed abroad in my heart through the Holy Spirit!

We can never unite all of the believers in Christ Jesus so long as we equate our own party with the one body. We must recognize that those whom we seek to unite, and with whom we seek to be united, are as much believers in Him as ourselves. The exclusivistic attitude which assumes that God belongs only to us because we belong unto Him is wholly out of tune with the divine revelation and with the quickening spirit of our times. Never before have those within the restoration movement heritage had such a wonderful opportunity to share with other eager seekers the truths they have discovered. I have resolved at all cost to go wherever a great door and effectual is opened and share the little truth I have gleaned. I am willing to answer unto Him for doing so!

Reply to Brother Lemmons

Mission Messenger (December 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

In the Firm Foundation, June 18, 1963, Brother Lemmons presents his third editorial against my appeal for unity among believers in Christ. In it he directs some questions at me to which I presume he desires my answer. Lack of space will not permit an exhaustive reply but I am happy to submit the following. Our brother postulates that “the Ketcherside plan is nothing more nor less than the Ecumenical movement of the World Council of Churches boiled down and applied to the church.” He is wrong. The Ecumenical movement would preserve denominational structures; my plea is for a destruction of all the factions among us by eliminating the party spirit. I am not so unrealistic as to think this can be done in a day so I simply urge that all who are in Christ work together on the problem in a spirit of love. All factionalism is sin and we must overthrow, not defend or protect it.

Brother Lemmons asks, “If differences have destroyed fellowship, how can fellowship exist in spite of them?” Differences do not destroy fellowship. They only place strains upon the relationship. It is lack of love which destroys fellowship. Fellowship is that state into which we are called by the gospel. When we are called we have differences, and we always will have. We need not be divided over them. That “sect of the church” (to use his own terminology) with which Brother Lemmons is identified is composed of brethren who differ over the war question, divorce and remarriage, method of caring for orphans, support of institutions, and a host of other things. Does Brother Lemmons consider these differences have destroyed their fellowship? It is the dogmatic attitude which makes partisan tests of points of difference which destroys fellowship. I refuse to recognize the relevance of these tests men have devised to divide God's family, and therefore, I am in the fellowship with all of my brethren in spite of them. It is easy to see how fellowship can "exist in spite of differences" when you learn to love your brothers more than you love your differences.

I am asked, "If it is wrong for the World Council to disregard error why is it not wrong to disregard it among the divisions of the Lord's church?" It is wrong to disregard error anywhere. I do not plead that we disregard error but that we regard as brothers beloved those for whom Christ died and who have been called into him, and that, in spite of their errors. I just do not have any brothers who are not in error, although they are not all in the same error. Error is not necessarily sin, unless all ignorance is sin.

I am asked, "If Brother K can accept the error that exists among the sects in the church, why can't he accept the error that exists among the denominations outside the church." I cannot accept error anywhere, not even in the Firm Foundation. I love the truth and am dedicated to seeking for it and accepting it. None of us are perfect in knowledge, so all of us are in error in some of our concepts. If any person on earth accepts me he has to do so in spite of my error. I do not consider that in so doing he accepts my error any more than I conclude that God accepted my error when he received me. Our trouble arises when someone dogmatically decides "which mistaken view" must be made a test of fellowship. I no more accept the lines that men draw against my brothers, than I accept their errors, for I think it is an error to draw such lines.

I am asked, "Why is error so important regarding how one gets in, but unimportant after one gets in the church?" Error is never unimportant, but while all truths are equally true, they are not all equally important. One must believe a certain fact to have life. "That you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name." Freedom from error in Christ is not essential to life else one would have to be perfect in knowledge the day he was immersed. What our brother really asks is, "If a person can be wrong about anything after he was born and still be a child, why could he not be wrong about how he entered the world and still be a child?" God has conditioned life upon belief of certain facts related to Jesus, but he has not conditioned that life upon knowledge of all truths at a given time. A man may be right about Jesus and wrong about many other things and still be saved, but if he is wrong about Jesus he can be right about a lot of other things and still be lost. We should never confuse the process of birth with our digestive system.

Our brother affirms that "the entire restoration plea is surrendered in toto by K's unity plan." In this he reveals his lack of knowledge of both the restoration plea and my proposals. The fact is that the very point against which my brother inveighs in this editorial is merely a re-statement of the great principles enunciated in Propositions 6 and 7 of the "Declaration and Address" by Thomas Campbell. These propositions express my position exactly. It is their rejection that has fragmented and factionalized us.

It is charged concerning me that, "He means that he does not believe that instrumental music and other digressive practices are really any more than matters of opinion." What does our brother include in "other digressive practices"? Many good brethren in Texas affirm that individual cups, Sunday schools, and use of women teachers, constitute digressive practices. Some regard Bible colleges and the Herald of Truth program as in the same category with missionary societies. To them such things are matters of faith and they do not feel they can “gloss over the errors” in that “sect of the church” with which Brother Lemmons is identified.

When other brethren oppose individual cups and Sunday schools, our brother insists that they are “matters of opinion.” He asserts the right of those who have them to determine how they should be regarded. But when it comes to instrumental music he insists that those who oppose it should determine its category. It all depends upon whether you have something you wish to defend, or other brethren have something you wish to oppose— in any event, you are to be the final judge as to whether it is a “matter of faith” or a “matter of opinion.”

I do not endorse instrumental music in the corporate worship of the one body but I propose to allow those who use it the same rights I demand for myself in dealing with those brethren who oppose what I feel is justified. I regard as my brothers all of those in what Brother Lemmons calls “the various sects in the body of Christ” and I propose not only to call them brethren, but to treat them as my brothers— every one of them! I think there might be hypocrisy involved in “calling” men brothers, and treating them as aliens. “My children, love must not be a matter of words or talk; it must be genuine, and show itself in action” (1 John 3:18).

Reply to the Foregoing [article by Lemmons]

Mission Messenger (December 1963)

Volume 25

[Abstract]

Our good brother Lemmons claims to have found “false doctrine” in our appeal for unity but he sets up a straw man to belabor. Our plea does not include those “who have never really become the children of our Father” and the fact that he must make such a statement in order to have a case against me proves he cannot deal with my actual position. He is troubled and uncertain. In one issue he accuses me of trying to create another faction, in the next he assails me for telling all those who learn additional truth to stay where they are and not switch factions or start a new one. He thinks this gives endorsement to “denominational structures.” It does not if one deplors such structures as I do and seeks to offset and overcome them. All reformation is wrought from within. One who separates himself from his brethren forfeits all hope of reforming them.

The trouble with Brother Lemmons is that he is thinking of reformation produced by one faction opposing another, or by one religious organization operating against another. We know that all fellowship is personal and individual. We are not concerned with one faction absorbing another, but with all lovers of truth in all of the factions acting as leaven where they are and thus gradually destroying all sectarianism from within. To call out all of the leaven in order to create a new “leaven party” will not destroy sectarianism. It will only augment it by creating another rival and vindictive party. This has been our mistake for a century. We have only increased and multiplied our factions. Let the brethren stay where they are if they are in Christ and be faithful to Him. This is the true restoration plea and the only one that can ever achieve our goal.

Notice how adroitly and abruptly our brother switches from “differences” between those in the fellowship to “any sinful thing.” This kind of reasoning is unworthy of an editor of the caliber of our respected brother. What relationship is there between differences over cups, classes and colleges, to the sin of Adam? To unbelievers? To the impenitent? To perverters of the gospel? To one who deliberately adds to or subtracts from the word? To the works of the flesh? When I say that “we should love our brethren more than we love our differences” does any serious and unbiased person think this means we can overlook “any sinful thing”? Are our differences over perverting the gospel or over various opinions held by those who have obeyed the same gospel and love the same Lord?

If we love the truth will we not love all of our brethren as that truth enjoins us to do, even those who differ with our concept about the things which have troubled the family? When brethren sincerely differ with me about the Herald of Truth program, for example, must I choose between love for those brethren and love for the truth of God. I refuse to do so. I love them both! I am amazed to know that Brother Lemmons thinks Paul withstood Peter at Antioch over a matter of opinion. Peter “drew back and separated himself, fearing the circumcision party.” The party spirit is a work of the flesh. Separating yourself from other brethren is a sin. This was not a question about opinions. It is distinctly said that Peter acted insincerely! It is true that “love will not whitewash error” but it will embrace all who have washed their garments and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

I’m not certain that my brother is even fair in his accusation that all denominations foster sectism. I have talked with a great many denominational leaders in the past two years and I have yet to find one who defends or condones sectism. All of them, without exception, regard sectism as the scandal of modern Christendom and the greatest hindrance to the Christian witness. They have concurred in my condemnation of sectism when I have addressed them, and although they do not all agree with the remedial steps I recommend, they do agree that something must be done and many of them are prayerfully trying to do something. I thank God for such an attitude and take new courage because of it. Brother Lemmons is apparently still living in the nineteenth century with its sectarian bitterness.

Does our brother really believe that all who have the Son have life? Does he not actually mean that “All who have the Son and agree with my interpretation on every point of scripture” have life? If not, why does he make tests of fellowship out of the opinions and interpretations of other sincere brethren? If so, then does he not make life contingent upon knowledge of the scriptures instead of upon faith in the Lord Jesus? Are our brethren reprobate who disagree with us about orphan homes and instrumental music? Does one no longer “have the Son” when he disagrees with us about Herald of Truth? Does he cease to have life when he does not share our views about Sunday Schools? Does a brother who reaches the conclusion that the scriptures teach the premillennial coming of our Lord Jesus become reprobate? Does this opinion make him “ignorant and unsteadfast”? Can a brother hold the premillennial position and “have the Son”? Brother Lemmons needs to be careful at this point lest he chop off the very pioneers of the restoration movement whom he so eagerly embraced a short time ago! The great danger of orthodoxy is that one who was “faithful” in one generation would not even be called upon to lead a prayer in the next.

Our brother is so perturbed about instrumental music that he again misrepresents what I said. I pointed out to him that when certain brethren oppose classes which he endorses, he puts classes in the realm of opinion; but when he opposes instrumental music he does not allow those who use it to determine its category but insists it is a matter of faith.

I think the restoration movement is long overdue a definition and an analysis of “matters of faith” and “matters of opinion.” If you hand one hundred brethren each a sheet of paper and tell them to classify a list of one hundred things as matters of faith and matters of opinion, you’ll get back as many different answers as you have persons engaging in the test. We are in danger of being strangled by a slogan, mangled by a motto, and crucified by a cliché. Everyone agrees that in matters of faith we should have unity and in matters of opinion we should have liberty. But no two agree on what constitutes matters of faith and matters of opinion, so we know neither where to unite nor to allow liberty.

It is interesting to note that to Brother Lemmons “the antis” are those who oppose classes. To the Disciples the “antis” are those who oppose the United Christian Missionary Society; to the Independents those who oppose instrumental music; to the advocates of orphan homes those who oppose such homes; to those who have Bible classes those who oppose such classes. All of us are “antis” to some groups and “liberals” to others. Recently another Texas journal branded Brother Lemmons as a “liberal” and Brother J. D. Thomas as a “modernist.” Are we a bunch of “antis” fighting other “antis” or a group of “liberals” fighting other “liberals”? Or, are we all “liberal antis” or “anti liberals”? We are in a mess, aren’t we? And yet we propose to tell the world how to be one in Christ!

Brother Lemmons is even confused about Paul’s attitude toward circumcision. Paul did not say it was wrong in Galatians 5:24, or anywhere else. If he had thought it was wrong he would not have committed the wrong upon Timothy (Acts 16:3). Not once did he teach the Jews not to circumcise their children (Acts 21:21-24). He said that “In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is of any avail, but faith working through love” (Gal. 5:6). What Paul opposed was the binding of circumcision upon the Gentiles as a basis of justification, instead of personal faith in the Lord Jesus. Circumcision as a national rite or as a matter of personal and family preference among Jewish Christians was a matter of indifference to the apostle, although it was not so to many of these Christians.

It was when men came from Jerusalem and taught the brethren, “Unless you are circumcised according to the law of Moses, you cannot be saved,” that Paul and Barnabas rose up against them. Paul was not at all opposed to the Jews circumcising their children if they wished to do so, but he was opposed to a circumcision party in the church of God. It was “the circumcision party” which criticized Peter for taking the good news to the Gentiles (Acts 11:2). It was this same party which tried to make salvation contingent on this rite at the Jerusalem conference (Acts 15:5). I mention this because substitution of anything as a basis of justification before God, except faith in our Lord Jesus Christ in all that embraces, is sheer legalism and is an attempt to saddle upon God’s children a yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear.

An “instrumental music party” or an “anti-instrument party” which makes one’s standing before God dependent upon abject conformity to the party line is just as sinful as a “circumcision party” and for the very same reason. Brother Lemmons does not stand with Paul in opposing things as a basis of justification before God. He is with those who say to the brethren, “Except you agree with us about the instrument you cannot be saved.” This assumes for the party the prerogative of God and this is really “a body of error and hidden poison.”

Our brother emphasizes that I have proposed “absolutely nothing new” in my appeal for unity. I think this is correct. The furore is not so much about what I have proclaimed but over the fact that I am also practicing it. I refuse to allow any faction to restrict my efforts to any segment of the great brotherhood of saints. I shall move freely among all of God's children, commending what I can and refusing to commend what I cannot. I shall allow all of my brethren to be answerable to God who also will judge me in the last day. I intend to be a Christian and a Christian only and to share with every other Christian on the earth, regardless of his current factional or sectarian alignment. I am opposed to all sects and I love all Christians. Perhaps this is new in our age!

This concludes our arrangement with Brother Lemmons to publish in MISSION MESSENGER the articles he reproduced in Firm Foundation. We are grateful to him for publishing our four one-page articles in his paper and we pray for our brother and for all of our other brethren who read Firm Foundation. Better days are ahead for all of us. There are signs everywhere that attitudes are changing. Brethren are becoming more bold in their declarations against orthodoxy and legalism. Of course we anticipate further areas of personal attack and boycott, but this is a small price to pay for freedom in Christ Jesus. Be sure that we shall not allow ourselves to become embittered or cease to love. Our hope of sharing with Jesus over there depends upon our exhibiting love to all of the brethren over here!

To our readers who have been so patient and understanding during this published exchange we express our gratitude for your longsuffering and forbearance. As we now prepare to get on with the tremendous task of waging peace among all of our dissident forces, we "commend you to God and the word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you the inheritance among all those who are sanctified." We entreat you, true yokefellows, to pray for us!

MISSION MESSENGER ESSAYS (1964)

Volume 26

The Brotherhood of Faith

Index to Volumes

- The Relation of Baptism to Fellowship
- Our History and Our Division
- There's A Difference
- A Redemptive Society
- Where Would Paul Attend?
- Orthodoxy and Reform
- With Simple Joy
- Full Speed Ahead!
- Prophet and Priest
- Spiritual Insight
- The Rim of the Wheel
- The Inaugural Address
- Preaching the Word in Writing
- The Ultimate Conquest
- Pentecost
- The Three Births
- The Two Great Foes
- The Moment of Truth
- The Divine Provisions
- The Peaceful Harvest
- Queries to the Editor (1964)
- Questions to the Editor

The Relation of Baptism to Fellowship

Mission Messenger (January 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

A speech delivered at the forum on fellowship, Hartford, Illinois, Dec. 26, 1963.

This is a forum for free men in Christ Jesus. It is not a partisan conclave nor a factional conference. The brethren who participate are not invited to do so because they agree upon everything but because they do not. The purpose of our discussions is not dogmatic or arbitrary. It is pragmatic and exploratory. We have simply met to share our insights into truth with each other and to do so in that attitude of mutual respect which should characterize mature children of God. But the very fact that we can meet together on such a program and in such an amiable atmosphere is indicative of the great gains that have been made in cultivation of the fraternal spirit, and betokens the brighter future awaiting the heirs of the restoration movement.

My theme concerns the relationship of baptism to fellowship. This requires, at the outset, a definition of the two major terms. By fellowship I mean simply that state or condition in which we have a joint participation with God, Christ, and the other saints through the Spirit, and into which we are called by the Father (1 Cor. 1:9). As respects our relationship with God our fellowship is based upon sonship; as respects the other heirs it is a brotherhood resulting from a common Fatherhood. The fellowship in Christ Jesus includes every person on earth in whom the Holy Spirit dwells and is therefore designated the fellowship of the Spirit.

Baptism, as defined for this thesis, is the immersion in water of a believing penitent, in obedience to the will of our Lord Jesus Christ. What relationship does this act have to admission into the fellowship of the saved ones? To offset any doubt and to make it easier for you to follow my presentation, let me inform you now that it is my conviction that baptism is the enabling act by which a proper subject is translated, or transferred, from the domain of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son. It is the inductive act by which he enrolls in the fellowship of the saved ones. Before such an audience of informed students of the word of God one need only mention certain scriptures without giving the contextual setting. I shall briefly state some of my reasons for regarding baptism as essential unto entrance into the fellowship.

1. The fellowship embraces those who are in Christ Jesus. Whatever is requisite to bring one into Christ is essential to induction into the fellowship. "For in Christ Jesus you are all sons of God, through faith. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Gal. 3:26, 27).

2. The fellowship embraces those whose sins have been forgiven and who have entered into covenantal relationship through the indwelling Spirit. "And Peter said to them, 'Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit'" (Acts 2:38). It is not by mere chance the record continues, "So those who received his word were baptized, and there were added that day about three thousand souls. And they devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and fellowship, . . ."

3. The fellowship embraces those who have been brought into relationship with the Godhood. "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19). Note that the original does not bear out the idea of baptism in the name of the Godhood, but into the name. Jesus is not giving a ritual to say when performing the act of baptism nor did he mean to imply that in performance of the act the apostles would be doing so by the authority of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. He was telling them into what relationship they were to disciple believers of the Good News by means of baptism.

4. The church of God at Corinth, composed of those who were sanctified in Christ Jesus, that is who were saints by calling, was made up of those who were distinctly said to have been “called into the fellowship.” They were temporarily divided over men and for this reason the apostle proposed certain questions. Not one of these, however, related to whether they had been baptized. He did not say, “Were you baptized?” but “Were you baptized in the name of Paul?” Indeed, he affirms that all were baptized, and by this act brought into the one body. “For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body— Jews or Greeks, slaves or free— and all were made to drink of one Spirit” (1 Cor. 12:13).

I think the scholarship of the world will agree that within the period of apostolic labor and teaching every congregation of saints on earth was composed only of baptized believers in the Lord Jesus Christ. There is no record in the apostolic memoirs of any person being recognized or regarded as being in the community of the saved ones who had not been baptized into Christ. All such ideas are post-apostolic and, therefore, without scriptural warrant. While they may appeal to those who would construct a religious economy based on human wisdom and philosophy they can have no place in the thinking of those who are wholly committed to a restoration of the primitive order and who should have as their starting-point a recognition of the Christian scriptures as “the only rule and measure of Christian faith and learning.”

Our responsibility is not to reveal to God what we would believe, but to believe what God has revealed unto us. We should seek to recover what he has uncovered in His word and to abide therein regardless of cost. Our task is not to draw lines, but it is to discover where God has drawn them, and remain within them while urging others to do likewise, not out of respect for our views but out of reverence for His authority.

I have repeatedly said that I will make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. Unthinking and casual critics have assailed this in an attempt to find some inconsistency. These critics have been of two sorts. One is made up of those who would remove the limitations God has set, the other of those who would set limitations God has not placed. The first would receive those whom God does not and the second would debar many of those whom God has received. To be quite frank and candid, I do not regard as being in the one body those who have not been baptized for the simple reason that this is a condition of entrance established by God.

I hold that entrance into the fellowship of the saints is conditioned upon belief of one fact and obedience to one act in validation of that fact. That fact is the only foundation of Christian union and communion. It is the only creed to which one must subscribe to fulfill the requirements as to the faith essential to justification. No man has the right to ask another to confess any less, no one has the authority to ask another to confess any more. That fact is that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God. The one act is baptism on the basis of, and prompted by, that faith.

The reason I regard baptism as a test of fellowship is because God has made it a condition of salvation. Jesus said, in commissioning the apostles to proclaim the good news to the whole creation, “He who believes and is baptized shall be saved” (Mark 16:16). It is not my prerogative to question why God proposed this condition. I must simply recognize it and abide by

it. The fellowship is constituted of those who are saved from their sins, belief and baptism are divine conditions for such salvation, consequently I regard baptism as a test of fellowship. Those who have been baptized into Christ Jesus are in the fellowship, those who have not been baptized into him are not in the fellowship.

Because of my attempt to be plain in stating my conviction I am charged with condemning many good people who are as sincere as myself. To this charge I plead not guilty. I do not question the goodness or the sincerity of those who differ, but freely acknowledge it. Nor do I condemn those who differ, for it is beyond my power to condemn them if I were inclined to do so, and I am not. My insistence that I must recognize and enforce the will of my Saviour as I understand that will, no more condemns those who differ with me, than their position condemns me. I do not change either their state or status one bit by what I recognize as the will of God. They are not answerable to me at all but to the same God as myself. "There is one lawgiver and judge, he who is able to save and to destroy" (James 4:12).

If it should turn out in the day of final accounting that I was wrong in who composes the fellowship, and if the good and sincere folk who were not baptized, were in the communion of the saints all of the time, then my mistake will not affect their eternal welfare. If it should turn out that I was right, and God who knows the secrets of the heart is willing to accept them on the basis of their goodness and sincerity without their having been baptized, I will rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. My theme then, will be the same as my theme now, "Thy will, O God, be done!" In any event, right or wrong, I must cast myself upon His mercy and grace, and I must, like all others, prove my worthiness to plead for divine mercy upon my willingness to do His will as I understand it. And the question with which I am dealing is not the relationship to ultimate triumph and eternal salvation but to the fellowship of the saints here and now. There may be a difference!

You will note that I have defined baptism as immersion. This presents another problem to a great many among my brethren in this day. It is obvious that my definition is much more restricted and limited than one found in a contemporary American or English dictionary. In view of the fact that thousands of people will rely upon the dictionary to justify sprinkling, and thus conclude that they have been baptized because they have been sprinkled, the spirit of charity would prompt many of the brethren to receive such into the fellowship, or, at least regard them as having been received of God.

Again, let me make it clear that I do not doubt the sincerity nor impugn the motives of those precious souls who are sprinkled under the impression that they are being baptized. Neither do I question or censure the charitable attitude of those who would receive such upon what I regard as mistaken views. But neither sincerity nor charity can change a fact, and the meaning of any word is a question, not of opinion, but of fact, and thus it must be ascertained by examination of credible witnesses.

The English Dictionary is not a proper criterion for judging the meaning of a term used by the Holy Spirit. A dictionary only purports to give the current or contemporary significance attached to a word at a given period in its history. Thus, we cannot be governed by Webster's Dictionary and the new covenant scriptures at the same time. We must decide which one we will accept as our rule of faith and practice.

It may be urged that common usage can so alter and amend the meaning of a term as to make it extremely unlikely that the average person will even doubt or question the validity of that meaning, and such person with the deepest sincerity will take the action suggested by popular usage in full conviction that he has done all that is required. This we freely and unreservedly admit, and yet in the spiritual realm such reasoning may be of little genuine consequence. It overlooks the fact that our relationship to God is individual and personal, and that each individual is obligated to ascertain the will of God and to implement it in his life. If he is incapable of determining or understanding the will of God that is a wholly different thing.

The will of God could not be known by man until it was communicated to him and the method of communication had to be that which was familiar to man. Since the highest form of communication known to man is that which employs words as symbols of ideas or vehicles of thoughts, we must turn to the words of God if we would know the thoughts of God. It is affirmed that “No one comprehends the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God” (1 Cor. 2:12). It is further affirmed by the same apostle that he did not receive the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is from God, and the purpose of such reception was to enable him to understand the things communicated or bestowed by God. He then says, “And we impart this in words not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit, interpreting spiritual things in spiritual language.”

No man can do what God requires by doing something else. That God requires one to be baptized as a means of entrance into the one body few of us would deny. The only problem which concerns us then is as to the action required by the word “baptism.” The question is not what a modern dictionary, a theological creed or an ecclesiastical compendium assigns as a meaning of baptism, but what significance was attached to it by the Holy Spirit. The apostle clearly distinguished between words as taught by human wisdom and those taught by the Spirit. It is just as essential that we maintain the distinction between what human wisdom suggests and what the Holy Spirit taught as that the distinction be made originally. Indeed, to do otherwise would place us in the position of sitting in judgment upon the apostles and prophets and declaring by caprice that what they wrote was of little consequence and could be abrogated by subsequent denominational creeds and vagaries of opinion.

If the word “baptism” when used by the Spirit indicated a certain action, and if that action was regarded as baptism, then any other action is not baptism as defined by the Spirit. Such other action may be designated baptism by other authority and may even come to be regarded as baptism because of common usage, but it is not baptism at all when measured by the authority of God’s revelation. When I speak of baptism I must mean the same thing Jesus meant when he spoke of baptism. I must mean the same thing Paul meant when he spoke of baptism. I must mean the same thing Peter meant when he spoke of baptism. If I mean something else it is not baptism at all within the scriptural context, and I have simply substituted the words which human wisdom teaches for what the Holy Spirit taught.

Baptism is a positive ordinance and not a moral precept. God commands a moral precept because it is right, but a positive ordinance is right only because God commands it. That which makes a moral precept right is inherent in it and stems from its nature, but that which makes a positive ordinance right is the will and authority of the lawgiver. For that reason no moral precept can ever be a test of faith in God, for one who conforms to such a precept may do so because of his rational conclusion as to its utility, benefit or expediency, or a combination of these. Only a positive ordinance can truly act as a criterion by which to measure the depth of faith in the lordship of Jesus, because such an ordinance will be obeyed out of respect for His lordship, that is, His sovereign right to require it.

It would seem that, because of both its nature and purpose, a positive institution must be one which is specific and which requires a properly designed and exact action performed by a qualified subject. Since God does not act capriciously nor require that of us which is incongruous with Christianity as a system, any action required to bring us into the fellowship of the saints must be compatible with what has been done by the Godhood to create and establish that fellowship. God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself and the ministry of reconciliation is based upon the announcement of three great facts, viz., that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, that he was buried, and that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures. This is what one must believe to be saved, and by it he will be saved if he holds it fast.

To serve as a test of faith in these facts divine wisdom has ordained that each individual shall re-enact in his own life those acts which Jesus performed for all mankind. That which was done for all by one must be done once for all by each one. Every man must be a dramatic participant in the “passion play.” So the apostle declares, “We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life” (Rom. 6:4). Buried with him by baptism! This is the act God requires of us all and the purpose of the requirement is obvious.

Baptism is not an act we perform but an act performed with us or for us by another. It is the task of an administrator to baptize. The subject is passive, the administrator is active. The subject sustains the same relationship to the administrator as the corpse does to the mortician. While the subject is required to be baptized it is the administrator who is commanded to baptize. “Go you and make disciples of all nations by baptizing them into the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.” One who is dead has no functioning will of his own, he is simply a subject for burial. No administrator has ever been authorized to do anything with such a subject except to bury him. An administrator who performs any other action has not baptized one at all. He acts with no authority except the dictates of human wisdom and the one who submits to the action he imposes has not actually demonstrated faith in the authority of Jesus, duly arrived at by honest and impartial investigation into the requirements of the Sovereign. There is a great difference between faith in Christ Jesus and belief of the articles of a creed, confession or concordat. Baptism is a divine ordinance to test faith in the former and was never intended to be a test of faith in the latter. To make it so is to abuse it and abort it from its sacred purpose.

It seems to me that a great many of our contemporaries, in an attempt to evade the force of God's revelation, employ a very subtle form of sophistry. It is argued that dipping or plunging in water was universally recognized as a means of cleansing in the age when Jesus was on earth and that baptism was chosen as a symbol of our cleansing from sin because of its adaptability to that simple era. It is further reasoned that, in our more sophisticated age the symbol has lost its significance because of changing emphases and divergent patterns of thought. Accordingly it is assumed and even taught that other symbols may supplant the one authorized by our Lord and be just as effective in bringing one into the desired spiritual relationship. It is urged that it is the spiritual or inward cleansing that is important and that the outward symbol is of no real consequence except as an overt witness to it. To this reasoning we humbly beg leave to file the following objections.

1. There is no indication that the ordinance of baptism was to be either transient or transitory. Instead, it is in conjunction with the commission to baptize believers everywhere into the name of the Godhood that Jesus specifically says, "And be assured, I am with you always, to the end of time" (Matt. 28:20). In view of the fact that baptism was a command growing out of the universal authority of Jesus, we may logically conclude that it will be operative while he possesses such authority, or until he exercises his authority to rescind it as specifically as he authorized it.

2. In his dealings with man the divine creator has made our well-being and happiness dependent upon ordinances of his appointment. All blessing is dispensed in conjunction with ordinances. This is as true in the natural or physical as in the spiritual realm since the same God is author of both. It is not ours to question why, nor is it essential for God to tell us why this should be so. It is enough that we recognize and acknowledge it.

In neither the natural or spiritual domain can we even substitute one divine ordinance for another, much less substitute one of our own devising for the divine. Each ordinance has its own value and virtue. In the realm of nature there is no substitute for air, light, or warmth; in the spiritual realm there can be none for faith, repentance, or baptism. One cannot substitute the Lord's Supper for faith, nor repentance for baptism, without doing despite to the institutions of grace and suffering irreparable damage to his growth in Christian character. The substitution of another "symbol" for baptism is not the sign of inward cleansing but an open demonstration of presumption.

3. No man can substitute another act for baptism by divine authority. If he quotes any passage of scripture relating to initiation into Christ Jesus he must reckon with baptism. Thus, the real problem is not whether something else is just as effectual as baptism, a thing we can never possibly decide without another revelation from Jesus who authorized baptism, but whether we will respect the authority of Jesus. If we will not accept His authority as given in his revelation, on what ground do we conclude that one would accept His authority in additional revelation?

4. It is to be seriously questioned whether baptism is a mere overt symbol of inward cleansing. It is the language of the creeds which states that it is "an outward sign of an inward grace." Nowhere in the sacred scriptures is it called either a sign or symbol. Cleansing from sin is by an act of God and any sign it has been effected should be given by God to the pardoned individual. The seal given to us is the indwelling Spirit. Baptism is an act of obedience by which we announce the acceptance of the lordship of Jesus over our lives and place ourselves under His authority, thus bringing ourselves into that relationship where pardoning grace can forgive us of our sins and free us from their guilt.

Lordship creates a master-servant relationship and one can only acknowledge it by doing what the lord requires or demands. Verbal assent is not enough. “Not everyone who calls me ‘Lord, Lord’ will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only those who do the will of the heavenly Father” (Matt 7:21). “Blessed is the man whom his lord when he cometh shall find so doing” (Matt. 24:46). “Why call ye me ‘Lord, Lord’ and do not the things which I tell you?” (Luke 6:46). It is only those who are willing to allow the Lord to reign over them who are entitled to the bestowal of blessings in Christ and who can thus be received as in Christ. Baptism is a test of one’s willingness to submit to the Lordship of Jesus.

5. We readily concede that it is the inner cleansing of the temple by God which is of supreme importance, but since God imposes His will upon no man and since acknowledgment of the right of Jesus to exercise sovereignty in our hearts is essential to the divine entrance into our hearts, and since such acknowledgment must be made in action and not in mere statement, is it too much to conclude that baptism is the key provided by which we open the door of our heart by faith? Is this not faith working by love to achieve the divine purpose in our lives?

For a long time we have been endeavoring to determine what motivation prompts men in our day to disparage or depreciate baptism in view of its sacred origin and the approbation given to it by the Holy Spirit through the apostles. Often its validity and essentiality are attacked most bitterly by those who give lipservice to it. We have been forced to the conclusion that we have become victims of a plot by Satan to undermine the spiritual battlements and accomplish by gradual erosion what he cannot succeed in doing by frontal assault. Certainly if a plain ordinance connected with obedience to the Good News and the forgiveness of sins can be relegated to the realm of the indifferent, an effective blow has been struck at the authority of our Lord.

The real question is not whether we have a right to make the understanding of one word a test of admission into the fellowship but whether the Lord has established an ordinance as a condition of entrance into such fellowship and if such an ordinance is positive in nature, action and design. If there is but one door constructed by the builder of the house as a means of access to the blessings within, we argue in vain when we contend about whether we have the right to make access to those blessings contingent upon discovery of such a small thing as the right key. Our complaints are not actually against those who use the key and seek to get others to do so but constitute a reflection against the wisdom of the builder.

Perhaps because we are passing through an age of wisdom we have become imbued with “the wisdom belonging to this passing age” (1 Cor. 2:6). But in our reasoning that insistence upon clinging to the ordinance of baptism may make our plea appear foolish and weak to the theologians and philosophers, let us not forget that “Divine folly is wiser than the wisdom of man, and divine weakness stronger than man’s strength.” We will gain nothing by leading men together, if together they are not led to Christ. It is not simply unity that we seek but unity in Him. Whatever brings us into Him brings us into the unity for which He prayed.

We do not affirm the importance of baptism as related to fellowship because of the historical position of a reformatory movement. We do not assert its relevance because it is a tradition within that background in which we have grown up. We have nothing that is “ours” purely because of historical or traditional emphasis that we would not gladly surrender in the interest of peace. All such matters we would cheerfully entomb that they might “rest in peace” and allow us to do the same. Our view of baptism stems from a firm personal conviction that it is the will of God and that we cannot be walking in His paths while weakening His words. Our Lord still sits at the right hand of the Father and must still rule in our own lives. The word of the absent King is precious to us and we propose to proclaim it as best we can and to implement it by our conduct. The love for others which does not stem from faith in Him will eventually supplant Him in our hearts with the worship of self.

Our History and Our Division

Mission Messenger (January 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

An address delivered at the Fellowship Meeting, Rolla, Mo., Nov. 16, 1963

We are bound together by the common ties of parentage and historical origin. We are children of the same Father. Jerusalem which is from above is the mother of us all. Thus, we are brothers, members of the same family. We are also heirs of the restoration movement launched by worthy sires in the latter part of the eighteenth and the dawn of the nineteenth century and to us has been thrown the torch from the failing hands of those who bore it aloft in other days to guide men to the path of peace.

We have allowed ourselves to be rent by the winds of destiny and torn by the storms of strife. The sword which was to be directed against the enemy has been turned against brethren and has been bathed in fraternal gore. Our witness for unity has been negated by our disunity, our plea for oneness has often been stifled by our own schisms. It is time for us to see ourselves as others see us, or, what is more important, to see ourselves as God looks at us. In facing up realistically to our current status here are some guidelines which I suggest we may use as criteria.

1. Division within the family of God is not a whim to indulge, nor is it a luxury we can afford to perpetuate. It is a sin, an offense against God and the majesty of heaven. Disguise it as we may, glamorize it as we can, it remains that it is still a matter for which we must give answer before the judgment seat of Christ. He who is indifferent to this problem or unconcerned about its existence is like the insensitive body which disregards the warnings of malignancy until the cancer has consumed his vitals.

2. Our schisms are signs of immaturity and carnality. They betoken that we have not grown up in all things in Jesus Christ and that we are still childish and jealous. They prove that the old man of sin has not been wholly buried and that we still keep the putrefying corpse of our lower nature hidden in the inner closet of our hearts.

3. The party programs which we indulge are a scandal in the far-flung mission areas of the world where the problems indigenous to one land and culture are transferred and transmitted to a soil not adapted to them, and are kept alive by forced growth, fertilized by open animosity and watered by unhealthy fear.

4. The spirit of exclusivism sired by the “holier-than-thou” attitude which makes contact with each other a sin to be denounced, instead of a virtue to be enhanced, is still a smoke in God’s nostrils as it was in the days of the prophet who cried out against it. It is a symptom of ingrown sectarianism and a snare of Satan intended to prolong the divisions which he has sponsored.

5. The categorizing of brethren by our epithets of convenience, the branding of men with our own labels, in order better to offset and overthrow any witness they may wield, is uncharitable, unwarranted and unholy. We should respect the dignity of every individual who has pledged allegiance to our King and not seek to corral him in order to curtail his efforts or kill his influence for good.

Our current status demonstrates beyond doubt that we have forsaken the ideal of the restoration movement and forged a body of traditional opinions and interpretations which we now equate with the faith once delivered to the saints. Each faction among us, with few exceptions, feels that it is the one holy, catholic and apostolic church of God, and beside it there is no other. Each such faction has its own test of fellowship, its own yardstick for measurement, its own criterion of party loyalty. One must measure up to that test regardless of what wide divergency may be allowed on other matters which can always be relegated to the realm of incidentals.

It occurs to me that it would be well for us to think again of the foundation upon which this historical movement began and proceeded until it wrecked upon the rocks of digression and disagreement. No one is better equipped to define the goals than Alexander Campbell. We make no apology for introducing to you once again his fifteen point thesis entitled, "Synopsis of Reformation." Perhaps it will serve in orienting those of us who live in this generation and it may well be commended to a religious world fascinated by its own roseate dream of ecumenism.

1. The restoration of a pure speech or the calling of Bible things by Bible names.

2. The Bible must be proposed as a book of facts, not of doctrines, nor opinions; it must be understood and regarded as arranged upon the principle of cause and effect, or that action is to produce corresponding action.

3. The Bible alone, instead of any human creed, as the only rational and solid foundation of Christian union and communion.

4. The reading and expounding of the sacred scriptures in public assemblies instead of text preaching, sermonizing and philosophizing.

5. The right of private opinion in all matters not revealed in contradistinction from the common faith, without the forfeiture of Christian character or Christian privilege.

6. The church of Jesus Christ is constitutionally composed of those who have confessed their faith in the celestial proposition— that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, the Son of God, and the only Saviour of the world, and have put him on by a baptism into his death.

7. The administration of the internal and external affairs of the church is placed in the hands of bishops, deacons and messengers extraordinary.

8. The sanctification of the Lord's Day by meeting in honor of the resurrection of the Saviour, and especially with a reference to the celebration of the Lord's supper, is essential to the edification, to the spirituality, holiness, usefulness, and happiness of the Christian community.

9. The church not being of this world, cannot levy any contribution on those without for any religious or political purpose, neither ought she to go a begging to the world for aid to support or extend Christianity.

10. The gospel is the proclamation in the name of God of remission of sins and eternal life through the sacrifice and mediation of Jesus Christ to every one that obeys him in the instituted way. The gospel is not preaching about faith, repentance, baptism, regeneration, or any other word or phrase or thing in the Bible. It is rather the authoritative statement of pardon and eternal life from the philanthropy of God through the interposition of Jesus.

11. Three things are essential to a Christian— a peculiar disposition, state, and character. These must be changed from a preternatural or fleshly state to that which is spiritual and heavenly.

12. The resurrection of the just, the coming of the Lord Jesus in his own proper glorified person, and eternal life, constitute the grand objects of the Christian's hope.

13. No theory of spiritual influence in conversion is the influence of the Spirit. Therefore, to deny any theory, is not to deny the influence of the Spirit.

14. As personal intelligence, purity and happiness is the end of all public and private, theoretic or practical reformation, the present standard of personal knowledge, faith, piety, and morality being too low, must be greatly elevated.

15. Family education and domestic religion must be greatly advanced.

No ardent lover of revealed truth can peruse this noble declaration of the genius and aims of reformation without feeling his heart burn within his bosom. Their author lived in a simpler social structure than that in which we reside. His mode of transportation was antiquated in comparison with ours, his facilities for transmission of thought more restricted. Yet these thoughts which wrestled within his mighty intellect until they were born in the inky fluid flowing from his quill, come as a distinct challenge to those of us who live in this space age. What a difference it would make in those halls of debate where theologians gather to grapple with problems of religious controversy if they could be drawn from their speculations to address their hearts to these proposals which first saw the light of day, and brought a new day of light, among the tree clad hills of a verdant Virginia countryside.

One could but long for the time to analyze and discuss them all with his brethren, applying minds filled with a desire for research to the hidden depths which beckon on to still unexplored lodes where rich treasures of intellect remain concealed. The limitations of such an occasion as this will not allow more than a casual stroll along the path leading to a cursory examination of the points as made. It is as if one ambled through a beautiful garden filled with brightest blooms, with but time to stoop and catch the fragrance of one or two while a clear voice signals to keep moving. Let me mention briefly the first principle enunciated for it was not by chance that Alexander Campbell placed it foremost in his list.

When men sought to promote a unity project in the plains of Shinar contrary to the divine will, God chose confusion of tongues to enforce His demand that they scatter and populate the whole earth. Taking a cue from this, Satan has employed the same tactic to keep apart those whom God would have united. The entire religious spectrum of today is affected by virtue of the theological jargon which has developed and which makes the Christian system a mystery, unassociated with the life and thought of the average person.

The revelation of divine truth was never given to an exclusive group, for truth like the atmosphere we breathe, belongs to us all. It is no more to be doled out by an upper echelon than the air is to be metered to us for a physical existence. When the language of truth is smothered beneath layers of ecclesiastical linguistics it ceases to be a revelation and reverts to a secret unattainable to the man on the street. It is to this sad state we have been brought by the creeds of men which are distilled from the controversy of centuries on matters of opinion and abstraction.

It is true that Christianity suffers from the ignorance of the masses, yet its greatest foe is the wisdom of this world. It has endured more from philosophers than from others. When the apostle Paul came to ancient Corinth, it was not so much the ignorance of the populace which concerned him for light will penetrate dark recesses by its very nature. His challenge was,

“Where is your wise man now, your man of learning, or your subtle debater— limited, all of them, to this passing age?” He declared, “As for me, brothers, when I came to you, I declared the attested truth of God without display of fine words or wisdom.” He said, “The word I spoke, the gospel I proclaimed, did not sway you with subtle arguments; it carried conviction by spiritual power, so that your faith might be built not upon human wisdom but upon the power of God.”

Just as the Russian overlords jam the “Voice of America” so our modern gnostics jam the voice of heaven. The message of grace is scrambled until men weary of trying to unravel it pass it by to follow the lure of the secularistic and materialistic age. Our first task is to recapture the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit. It is reasonable to assume that if men become divided when their languages are confused, they can hardly become united until they have one speech and can communicate simply and freely.

The ideas of God were revealed in words which the Holy Spirit taught. If we grasp the ideas it will only be because we have attached ourselves to the vehicles in which they are conveyed. If there is no word in the revelation of God to express an idea, it is logical to conclude that the idea is not there. If I am to share in the thinking of God for my life I must understand the significance of the words of God. It is through my grasp of the words of God, that is, the testimony of heaven, that I am able to lay hold upon the Word of God who is eternal life. The place to begin in any reformatory or restorative attempt is with the word of revelation.

To recapture the vocabulary of the Spirit means more than merely mouthing or pronouncing the words of the Spirit. Words are like the intelligent beings who use them— they possess both body and spirit. And the body without the spirit is dead. We must not only embrace the form but also the signification, and having done this, it must frame and formulate our conviction. Those who do not stand for something will fall for everything and the wishy-washy, languid, impotent and enfeebled lives of many who profess to be followers of the slain Lamb are a stern reminder of what happens when men have no rock to which they may fasten their trailing anchors.

Alexander Campbell wrote: “The Bible is to the intellectual and moral world of man what the sun is to the planets in our system— the fountain and source of light and life, spiritual and eternal. There is not a spiritual idea in the whole human race that is not drawn from the Bible. As soon will the philosopher find an independent sunbeam in nature, as the theologian a spiritual conception in man independent of the one best book.”

It was on such a foundation of reverence and trust that the restoration movement was launched and its principles proclaimed. And it is because a chain of circumstances and their consequences have conspired to produce a generation quite ignorant of the spiritual values revealed in the sacred volume that we find ourselves in our current state. Perhaps no greater task could we perform in our generation than to aid in restoring the Bible to its proper place in the lives and affairs of men.

This means more than reading the Book as literature, even as sacred literature. It means more than dissecting it in the laboratory of linguistic research to analyze its structure and forms. It means more than the circulation of the volume in modern speech. All of these have their place. All of them contain value. But it is only as we regard the word of God as food to sustain life and partake of it regularly and freely that we may digest and assimilate it and build spiritual character from it, that it will do the most good. It is not a book held in the hand but its principles enshrined in the heart that will transform.

It is not enough to adapt the Bible to our needs. We need to adopt it to ourselves. We need to make it our guide, our staff and our strength. It is not a theory about the Bible, a philosophy based upon it, nor a creed distilled from it, which will ultimately satisfy— but the Bible itself, the word of God, appropriated and apprehended. If this seems naive and childlike, let us not forget that it is just such an attitude which is calculated to receive the blessing and bounty of heaven. It was not in vain that our Lord said, “Except you repent and become as a little child you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven.”

The place to begin a true reformation on earth is with the revelation from heaven. A correct attitude toward the word of God will pave the way toward settlement of most of our difficulties. It will mean but little gain indeed if we unite men only to separate them all from God.

There's A Difference

Mission Messenger (April 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Not long ago I visited an old abandoned meetinghouse in a rural area. It was a dilapidated frame building. The siding was truly “drop siding” in some places and the paint had long ago flaked from the surface. The interior was both dusty and musty. A bird flew through a broken window as we entered. Wasps and “dirt daubers” buzzed about, angry at our unwarranted intrusion upon the domain to which they had filed claim. The seats were all gone and now occupied places on the back porches or under the shade trees of homes in the community. But the old speaker’s platform was still there with its faded carpet tacked upon it— a carpet from which the pattern had been worn away just behind the speaker’s stand. The brackets were still upon the walls indicating where the kerosene lamps had once hung to give forth a pitiable little yellow light falling upon the pages of hymn books held high to catch their dim glow.

The couple who took me to this site then drove to town to display the new brick structure in which the congregation was meeting. This was the second house which had been built since the old rural location was abandoned. The air conditioned interior provided welcome relief from the heat. The cushioned pews offered comfort to a fatigued body. My host broke the silence. “Quite a difference, isn’t there?” he said. I agreed but as we talked further it became obvious that there were differences which were not merely material. The more I thought about them the more I wondered if the congregation had gained or lost.

The baptistery with its clever lighting arrangement, its heating element, and its gaudy depiction of the Jordan River for a backdrop, was certainly more convenient than the pool under the big sycamore down at the creek. But those who stood on the bank above the clear water filled with darting minnows and sang, "Shall We Gather at the River?" often found themselves unable to continue the song because of their unashamed weeping that a precious life had been born anew. And as they crowded forward to extend the hand of fellowship to the blanket-shrouded dripping figures there was a warmth of sincerity that all too often is lacking today among those who do not even trouble to catch the name of the one being immersed.

Granted that there are much larger audiences than there used to be, except at the "big meeting," but try to get them to visit the sick and you will be amazed at how many are really concerned. Gone are the days when the wife baked an extra loaf of bread or an apple pie, and the husband came in from the field for an "early supper" so they could have time to visit and sit with a sick neighbor and carry food to help the worried wife of the patient. Gone, too, are the days when friends gathered in to share the grief of those who sat huddled around a casket in the parlor—the room opened only when death or the preacher visited the home. Certainly we feel a sense of relief at a time of sorrow when a smoothly-functioning organization commanded by a suave mortician grabs our dead and whisks them out of sight, not to be seen again until time to debate solemnly whether to leave the glasses on the sightless eyes of the corpse or remove them.

But I am not so sure that our well chosen expressions of sympathy are not as shallow as an old-fashioned coffin.

I admit there is a difference in the amount of the offering as shown on the polished walnut board hanging on the front wall to the left of the pulpit and that formerly scrawled in uneven figures on the cracked blackboard with a piece of white chalk in the country church building. There has to be if you are going to hire someone to do the things that were formerly accepted as a part of life and done freely without pay. Did one of the members become sick during the summer? All of the members suffered with him. On a chosen day they met to plow his fields, or to gather in his harvest and transport it to market, while the women cooked dinner for the whole group. Not luncheon— but dinner! You would have grossly insulted these people if you had offered them money. They didn't think of it as manifesting their religion or serving Jesus. They simply thought of helping a needy neighbor, and that's why it was really helping Jesus!

They had their troubles in the old days because they were human but they also forgot them in times of stress and need. They couldn't take time out to have a nervous breakdown and they didn't have the money to do it anyhow. It costs to do things like that. So they didn't get the "jumping jitters" when a baby cried at home or in meeting. I think sometimes that cushioned pews have softened one end of our anatomy and cushioned preaching has softened the other end. It seems that the larger our buildings grow the smaller our hearts become. We have cooled both our buildings and our spirits. Maybe we have sacrificed concern for comfort!

A Redemptive Society

Mission Messenger (May 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

The word “church” was hallowed as a translation of ekklesia by the revisionists appointed by King James to see that “there should be one more exact translation of the holy Scriptures into the English tongue.” In order to insure that it would not be too exact, the monarch issued orders in advance that they were not to use the word “congregation” as had preceding translators. Since James was authorizing a Bible to be read in the Church of England, of which he claimed to be the titular head, he did not want men to conclude that he was merely the ruler of a congregation.

The word “church” is actually not a translation of the original at all. There is nothing about it which signifies response to a call. It came to us from a wholly different source and has a quite different meaning in its origin. But long use has bred familiarity with it and any attempt to substitute a better word would create a general furore. Men ordinarily have their emotions entwined with their religion and by the time you cut through the jungle growth of tradition in an attempt to rescue them from a misplaced vocabulary they resent it as if you were trying to destroy God’s word. Inadequate or not, it appears that “church” is here to stay!

We are not so much concerned about it as we are the idea which it purports to convey and which the Holy Spirit wrapped up in the word ekklesia. If we are mistaken about that we will have a warped view of our relationship to God and each other. It is very important that we understand the nature and purpose of the church. We can begin by pointing out that it is a community of persons united to a person, and united with each other because they are united to him. These persons are in him because they have been called. This implies a summons by the one who calls and a proper response by those who are called.

The called ones are those who were alienated from God by sin. The summons consists of a message to be proclaimed which is designated good news. It consists of facts and not speculative matters. These facts relate primarily to what God has done for us in our weakness and helplessness while under the tyranny of sin. The proper response to these glad tidings is faith and obedience. Those who act upon the basis of the good news to reform their lives and change their state are said to have “obeyed the gospel.” The church is simply the congregation of obedient penitent believers. All such persons on earth are in it. No saved person in the world is out of it.

No man can call another out of sin and remit his transgressions. Therefore, no man can create a church. The church is a divine organism. It can never be a human organization. Only God can call men out of sin, so only God can create a church. Since all whom God calls out of sin constitute the church, there can never be but one church. There can be no rival to the church with divine sanction for this would pit God against himself.

Identity of the Church

The church is not a sect. It is not a federation of sects. It is not even the aggregate of all the sects. Sects are works of the flesh but the church is the creation of the Holy Spirit. These are contrary the one to the other. The church is composed of all whom God has called out of the world. Sects are composed of those who are called out from other believers. God seeks to separate the saved from the domain of sin, sects seek to separate those who profess to be under the dominion of Christ from each other. Satan opposes the first separation and initiates the second.

Just as the church is not composed of sects, so it is not composed of congregations. It is a fallacy to think that unity of the Spirit consists of getting all of the congregations of a given order to doing everything in exactly the same meticulous fashion. In its ultimate this would always amount to reducing every congregation to the status of the most reactionary one under a plea of false charity, and they would compare themselves among themselves, and measure themselves by themselves, a procedure which the apostle declares is unwise. Such a course is blind conformity and is not unity at all!

The church is the body of Christ and there is but one body. It is composed of individuals who are joined to each other only because they are joined to the same head. “Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it” (1 Cor. 12:27). The church does not consist of those who interpret every point of doctrine alike, nor of those who agree in every matter of opinion. Parties exist on such a basis, but these are formed by men, and exist in contradiction to the will and authority of Jesus. The body is formed of members who are indwelt by the Holy Spirit, but parties are formed by those who are filled with the party spirit.

It is ridiculous to talk about the church losing its identity. This is a “scare tactic” used by factional leaders to hold their adherents “in line” and to assure that they do not learn from any other source and never grow beyond their present spiritual stature. My body can never lose its identity as long as it is joined to my head. If you can identify the head you can certainly know whose body is attached to it. Parties may lose their identity and all of them ought to. They should never have established a partisan identity to begin with. They can lose their identity simply because they have created a synthetic fellowship consisting of those who agree upon a certain thing, or even a method of doing a thing. The party exists to propagate that thing or method. If enough of the members learn better their defection will eradicate the body.

A Witnessing Community

The body of Christ was not created for such a purpose at all. Its members constitute a witnessing community. They compose it simply because they are God's own people. They are His people because they have been called from darkness into marvelous light. A witness can only testify to a personal experience, that is, to what has happened unto him, or in his presence. He may be quite ignorant of all the involvements and implications of his experience, but these are separate and apart from the experience itself. "You are God's own people that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. Once you were no people but now you are God's people; once you had not received mercy but now you have received mercy" (2 Peter 2:9, 10).

The body of Christ was created through the blood of Christ. Those who compose it are blood-brothers— his blood, not theirs! By physical blood we are related to every son of Adam, by the blood of Christ to every person who is in the last Adam, the Lord from heaven. I sustain a fleshly kinship with every one who is born of woman; I sustain a spiritual kinship with every one who is born of the water and of the Spirit. "As was the man of the dust, so are those who are of the dust; and as is the man of heaven, so are those who are of heaven" (1 Cor. 15:47, 48). Jesus did not die to form a party for the defence of particular or peculiar views within the family of God. He is not the head of any such party. He is Lord of the whole church, not of a faction within it. Factions must always choose their own heads and generally these are their creators or benefactors.

There is no danger the church will ever die. So long as the head lives the body must live. Even the grave could not retain the head. Because “he ever liveth to make intercession for us,” the body is indestructible. It is true that parties and sects will rise and wane and will even die and disappear. If they all departed it would not affect the church. Scraping the barnacles from a ship does not lessen its power but may increase its ability to move more rapidly and freely on its way. Parties die because they are launched by dying men; the church lives because it is the creation of the living God. When you hear men speculate as to the fate of the church after their death you can be sure they are simply members of a faction while they are alive. No man can kill the church unless he can first destroy the Son of God who is its head.

Our witness is not to consist of “the wonderful deeds” we have done. We are simply to “declare the wonderful deeds of him who called us out of darkness.” When we begin to tell of our accomplishments we always end up in partisan pride. The church is not to glorify itself but its creator. When the church worships itself it becomes its own god. When we parade what we have done we inevitably compare it favorably or unfavorably with what others are doing! We fail to realize that we are merely a group of “unprofitable servants” comparing ourselves with other “unprofitable servants” and there can certainly be no profit in such a procedure. While there is no profit, there is a reward. Jesus says that those who parade their piety before men to be seen by them “have their reward.” It is amazing how much time and effort is expended on declaring our wonderful deeds, our growth and our accomplishments. All such display is vanity and vexation of spirit.

Much of our modern “machinery” which was wholly unknown to the church in its age of greatest triumph, has been devised to pump life into the members. But one does not use a pulmotor unless he thinks a person is dying. Artificial respiration is not administered to a healthy body. It follows, then, that what we point to as an indication of our strength is merely a symbol of our weakness. Nor does frantic activity always denote real accomplishment. The world will not be saved by our own fluttering about from one meeting to another. Some people attend so many meetings they have no time in which to really serve God. Certainly they have all too little time in which to meditate in quietude and solitude and contemplate “the wonderful deeds of him who called us.” Even spare moments must be given over to compiling statistics, drawing charts or making graphs to show our progress for the fiscal year. The artificial stimulants which we administer to keep those coming whom we can never get going, and which we prize and advertise so highly, are but tokens of our nearness to collapse. They may have betrayed us into forsaking the world of the Spirit for the spirit of the world.

A Redemptive Fellowship

The church is a redemptive fellowship! This defines its true nature and purpose. When we lose sight of this fact we are adrift without a rudder. We may do a great deal of good and accomplish a great many things but we will do so while floundering about and with no sight of our real goal. We may even mistake our lifeboat for the Ship of Zion and conclude that all who are not rowing with us are hopelessly doomed to be engulfed in the waves of destruction.

The church is a redemptive fellowship, first of all, because it is a fellowship of those who have been redeemed. Those who compose it are not in it because of their superior character, knowledge, or attainment. No one is in the church except sinners saved by grace. Not one of these came in by pleading his own righteousness but by trust in the righteousness of Jesus which caused him to renounce every other claim upon his life and to pledge allegiance to the Son of God. All were equal before they crossed the frontier from death unto life and all are equal since. They had nothing to boast of then, they have nothing to boast of now. In their former state they were dead and the life they now have is a gift.

We do not enter into Christ en masse, or as a faction or party. We come into him as individuals. Every man who is born again is in Christ Jesus. No other person can add him to Christ, no other can remove him from Christ. Only God can introduce one into the one body and only God can discharge him from it. Men may “separate you from their company” (Luke 6:22) but they cannot destroy your relationship with God. Only the one who has power to include you in the community of saved ones can ever exclude you from it. The redemptive fellowship with one another grows out of the mutual fellowship or joint participation with the Father and the Son, through the Holy Spirit.

Though we enter into Christ as individuals we come into a fellowship. We are not detached members but members one of another. So close is our relationship that “if one member suffers, all suffer together; if one member is honored, all rejoice together.” Our factional alignments have obscured the breadth of meaning in this statement. It does not mean that we are to suffer or rejoice only when an adherent of our faction or sect suffers or is honored. We are joined by the invisible bond of spiritual love to every saved person in the whole world. I cannot be unaffected by the suffering of an African or Chinese brother in the Lord even though our color differs and we live thousands of miles apart. Nor can I be unconcerned if such a brother is a member of another religious party than myself. The nerve that is struck when a brother suffers is not a partisan nerve, but one that runs from his heart to my heart through the person of Jesus, our head. “For it is from the head, that the whole body, as a harmonious structure knit together by the joints with which it is provided, grows by the proper functioning of individual parts to its full maturity in love” (Eph. 4:16).

God made us and knows our basic needs. Sin brought disharmony into the world and into the life of each of us. It marred all of the basic and finer relationships of life. By separating us from God it deadened our sensibilities until “we all lived our lives in sensuality, and obeyed the promptings of our own instincts and notions. In our natural condition, we like the rest, lay under the dreadful judgment of God” (Eph. 2:3). In order to “transfigure us into his likeness, from splendor to splendor” (2 Cor. 3:18) we had to be introduced into a new environment where our selfish instincts could be transformed into social interests. This necessitated a fellowship in which each person was free and yet a servant of all others.

The Christian concept is one which is designed to deliver us from the effects of sin upon our personality and enable each of us to develop to his highest potential. Man is a social being. He is destined to share in an unbroken association with God and with the redeemed of all ages. The church of which he is an integral part or vital member makes possible the inauguration of this fellowship on the divine and human level. The fellowship provides an arena in which each participant can strive toward that perfect harmony which, while it can never be achieved on earth, must be sought as eagerly as if it could be attained. We must always rejoice in hope even while we labor in faith. The apostle writes to those in the fellowship at Rome, “May the God of steadfastness and encouragement grant you to live in such harmony with one another, in accord with Christ Jesus, that together you may with one voice glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom. 15:5, 6). He blazes the trail toward such harmony in the immediate context. We must learn to “shoulder the burden of the doubts and qualms of others” (verse 11). “Each of us must consider his neighbor and think what is for his good and will build up the common life” (verse 2). We must “accept one another as Christ accepted us to the glory of God” (verse 7). Fellowship can only accomplish its divine purpose when a brother is valued above what he thinks. Jesus did not die just for brilliant men and the church is not a fraternity for philosophers nor an institute for the intellectually elite.

As a redemptive fellowship we are to be primarily concerned with persons. Jesus died for men. He did not die for a code of laws, a set of dogmas, or a compilation of doctrines. He did not shed his blood for us because we were worthy or deserving. “Christ died for us while we were yet sinners, and that is God’s own proof of his love for us” (Romans 5:8). We prove our love for each other when we do not extend it purely on the basis of worthiness but on the basis of need, even as God did. The purpose of God’s revelation through the apostles is, and that of our lives should be, the upbuilding of all who are in Christ Jesus. We dare not interpret the word of God or inject our lives into those of our brethren in such a way as to destroy them. Jesus died for these men. “Do not by your eating bring disaster to a man for whom Christ died” (Rom. 14:15). We need always be concerned that men may despise the doctrine of God, but we need also to be concerned that men may interpret the doctrine of God in such a manner as to divide or destroy brethren.

World Impact

The church is a redemptive fellowship, not only as a means for providing an atmosphere of spiritual growth for individuals but because of its impact on the world of mankind. It has both a personal and a universal aspect. The Christian world has been disturbed for centuries as to the role of the church. It is not an exaggeration to say that almost all of the disputes which have arisen within the framework of our religion have been the result of an inability to understand or define the nature and purpose of the church. Let us briefly refer to some of the ideas which have developed on the subject.

1. The church is an authoritarian structure for the defining of faith and morals, with the divine right to demand absolute obedience to her commands and unqualified subservience to her demands, under threat of condemnation.

2. The church is the repository of the doctrine of God and is the authorized interpreter of the same with power to determine what is orthodox and must be taught as the accepted and infallible word of truth, and with the power to condemn as heretics and excommunicate all who do not conform to such orthodoxy.

3. The church is simply a social welfare organization delegated by God to relieve inequities and adjust inequalities in the economic and political structure, and possessing the right to employ any legal means to accomplish this purpose throughout the earth.

Much of Christendom accepts one or the other of these, or a combination or modification of them, as the basis of relationship in the church. In so doing the groundwork has been laid for fracturing those who profess to be children of God into several hundred rival camps and tribes.

As to the first, the church possesses no authority. It is simply the body of Christ and all of the authority is vested in the head. In order to become an authoritarian structure the church would need to have an infallible interpreter on earth to whom all questions could be relayed and whose judgment would be final. Such an interpreter would require perfect knowledge or an unction of the Spirit without measure.

That no man possesses such knowledge is evident from 1 Corinthians 8:2, and that no man is authorized by the Spirit to “dictate the terms of faith” is evident from the apostle’s disavowal of any such intent (2 Cor. 1:24). As to the second, it must be observed that the doctrine of God belongs to each child of God and not to a corporate structure which can dole it out to him at will and control his consumption of it. The sword of the Spirit belongs to every soldier from the moment of his enlistment. He need not secure permission to check it out of an arsenal when he wishes to use it. The bread of life has not been placed in a basket to be dispensed under centralized control or supervision. There is no “official interpretation” any more than there is an “official interpreter.” It is as ridiculous to assume that men can create an infallible interpretation as to suppose they can elect an infallible interpreter.

Certainly the word of God requires interpretation as does every communication employing human speech or words. Those who say it does not are always the most dogmatic in demanding that you concur with their viewpoints. The Constitution of the United States is interpreted by the Supreme Court. When so interpreted that interpretation becomes the law of the land. Whether you agree with it or not it becomes the standard by which you will be judged. What is the supreme tribunal for interpretation of divine principles? Is it the church? If so, is it the church universal or the local congregation? If it is the church universal, how will the decision be reached and how will it be enforced? If it is the local congregation what will be the result if congregations differ in their findings? Will we have the ludicrous spectacle of those who have no jurisdiction over others seeking to bind their will upon them as God’s will? Will we be subjected to the absurdity of one “autonomous” congregation “withdrawing” from another which will not be coerced into acceptance of its decretals?

The answer lies in the fact that the church in its local or universal aspect was never intended to be the official interpreter of apostolic doctrine, and its usurpation of this prerogative has involved the Christian realm in constant turmoil and strife. It will continue to do so until we correct our thinking. Who is the supreme court for determining what constitutes “matters of faith” and “matters of opinion” for every child of God on earth?

My reply is that the individual conscience is the sole monitor for every true saint. No one has the right to bind upon a fellow-disciple that which does not commend itself to him as correct. We are all “disciples” and there are no “masters.” The minds of men cannot be forced or coerced by other human minds.

There is a difference between the faith in Christ which justifies and which all of us must hold in common, and the personal faith or conviction of those who are in Christ, which must be altered or amended with increasing knowledge and understanding. In this realm one stands or falls to his own Master. No one else has the right to pass judgment upon him. How can unity be maintained under such circumstances? The apostle replies, “Accept life with humility and patience, making allowances for each other because you love each other. Make it your aim to be at one in the Spirit, and you will inevitably be at peace with one another” (Eph. 4:2, 3). Because no human mind is infallible God did not commit the interpretation to any one, but allowed it to be the right of every one.

Will this not breed anarchy? Will it not create a state of chaos in which every man does that which is right in his own sight? God has wisely provided against this very thing by placing an effective restriction against exercising even that which we deem to be our right. But will not such a restraint need enforcement, and if so, does this not bring us back to the place of the external authority of the church? Not at all, for the regulation is not placed in the hands of others but in the hearts of each of us. It is not external and arbitrary but internal and voluntary. The restraining force is the only absolute quality in the Christian system, the epitome of all law, the golden chain which binds all of the other virtues in perfect harmony—brotherly love.

The Divine Governor

This regulatory power forbids my acting on the ground of superior knowledge in such a manner that I destroy a brother for whom Christ died (1 Cor. 8:11). It brands as a sin against Christ the sinning against brethren and the wounding of their conscience (1 Cor. 8:12). It requires that those who have a robust conscience accept as their own burden the tender scruples of weaker men (Rom. 15:1). Thus, while my conscience must be free to act without restraints imposed authoritatively by other men, it will always be throttled by the only principle imposed without limit upon us all— love for one another. Jesus has placed no control upon my growth, increase of knowledge, or rate of attainment but he has placed a governor on my spiritual speed, lest in my haste to grow closer to a spiritual ideal I ruthlessly destroy those for whom Jesus died, as he died for me. “If your brother is outraged by what you eat, then your conduct is no longer guided by love” (Romans 14:15). Conduct that is not guided by love is misguided and it is misconduct.

It is important that I understand doctrinal matters but it is just as important that I understand my brothers— their motivations, needs and fears. The very purpose of the doctrine is to teach me how to be at peace with them, how to live in harmony with them, how to avoid divisions and schisms. If I can quote every passage in the sacred scriptures and if I use them to promote or defend division, I have missed the whole purpose of the doctrine. To study doctrine for doctrine’s sake may make of me a legalistic disputant but it can never make me a peacemaker. It is only as doctrine changes life and conduct for the better, only as it enhances brotherly love, that it is lifted from the pages of a book and translated into a godly life. The apostle Paul only once became a philosopher when he wrote, “The aim and object of this command is the love which springs from a clean heart, from a good conscience, and from faith that is genuine” (1 Tim. 1:5).

The church was not created to be a monolithic structure with authoritarian claims. It was not brought into existence to be the guardian of orthodoxy, or a social welfare agency. The church is a redemptive society composed of those who are “the people of God” and it has a task which no other institution in the world can imitate or duplicate. It is the exponent of the only power in the universe which can transform the world. Its very existence is proof of the reality of that power for nothing else could have created it.

This force can change the vilest criminals into the most useful servants of humanity. It can move men whose lives are sterile and futile to sell their earthly possessions and live in stinking jungles for the sole purpose of sharing their greatest treasure with naked, uncivilized savages, whom they covet as brethren. It can drive others with a consuming passion to feed the hungry, clothe the naked and minister to the sick and never ask a word of thanks in return. The church is the divine organism ordained by God to furnish an undeniable example of what that power can accomplish.

The world has to be shown. Men are conditioned to see power at work. They are accustomed to judging energy by its practical demonstration. Electricity is appreciated only as it lights homes, operates appliances and furnishes motive power. Magnetic force is best understood as it lifts huge loads of iron for transfer to train or ship. Atomic energy is comprehended in its fueling of submarines or in the firing of rockets which launch space vehicles into orbit. God understands human nature and he has furnished the whole world a clear demonstration of power at work in a timeless and ageless organism.

The church is a redemptive fellowship created to prove the transforming power of love. Jesus said to those who were to become the foundation of the church, “This is how all men will know that you are my disciples, because you have such love for one another” (John 13:35). All men will know! It is for this reason our souls are purified by obeying the truth and we are born again. “Now that you have, by obeying the truth, made your souls clean enough for a genuine love of your fellows, see that you do love each other, fervently and from the heart” (1 Peter 1:22). Love satisfies every claim of law and sums up all law (Romans 13:8, 10). It is the royal law, the king of all laws (James 2:8).

The One Body

If we interpret the commands of God to permit us to bite and devour one another we defeat the very purpose of revelation. “Indeed this command comes unto us from Christ himself: that he who loves God must also love his brother” (John 4:21). We must learn the art of forbearance, forgiveness, patience and tolerance. We must “recommend ourselves by the innocence of our behavior, our grasp of truth, our patience and kindness; by sincere love, by declaring the truth, by the power of God.” We must “give pride of place to one another in esteem.”

Now is the time for us to recapture the real nature and purpose of the one body. In it we are all joined to the Lord who loved us and gave himself for us. Through him we are joined to every brother on earth. All of these are frail, faulty and feeble. None are perfect. They are all “brothers in error” but they are also, and this is more important, “brothers in Christ.” If he can receive them in spite of their error we can do the same. We no more endorse their error in receiving them than he does. Let our love for the brethren triumph over our differences. Let us not allow the things upon which we disagree to cancel the effect of his blood that makes us all one.

Let us not be stubborn and adamant, seeking and searching for flaws and failures upon which we can harp and harangue. Let us give all who love God credit for honesty and integrity in their sincere attempts to serve him. The world is weary and worn with our wars and janglings. They are sick and tired of debates and strife. Brotherhood is based upon fatherhood, fraternity is based upon paternity, fellowship results from sonship. Factionalism can never present a perfect image of the church. We cannot divide ourselves into effective influence nor fracture ourselves into unity.

We are one body! Let us treat each other as members of the same body and not regard each other as allied with alien tribes or foreign clans. Our disregard for others of God's children is a reflection against him who is their father as well as ours. If he has bestowed such love upon them as to call them sons of God, let us bestow such love upon them as to call them "brothers in Christ." Wherever God has a child I have a brother. I shall love all of my brothers because of his love for all of us. "Consequently I will most gladly spend and be spent for your good, even though it means that the more I love you the less you love me" (2 Cor. 12:15).

Where Would Paul Attend?

Mission Messenger (May 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Not long ago I saw an advertisement of “The Church of Christ” in the Saturday edition of a newspaper. The local minister announced as his subject for the following evening, “Where Would the Apostle Paul Attend Church in our Town?” This seems to be a favorite topic with a lot of the brethren. They assume that if Paul arrived in the city the first thing he would do when he walked to the city limits would be to make enquiry for them. The inference is that “The Church of Christ” as we know it is an exact replica of the ekklesia which Paul knew. This is no doubt wistful thinking and it would probably be nearer the truth to say that any likeness between the two is purely incidental— or accidental.

There is a widespread notion extant that we have restored the primitive order of things until Paul would feel quite at home among us. Some debaters, possessed of more brass than knowledge, affirm that the church of which they are members is identical in origin, name, doctrine and practice, with that of the New Testament scriptures. Occasionally we are treated to the sight of two champions of rival “Churches of Christ,” both of whom affirm this about their respective parties at the same time they deny the claim of each other. Both are right and both are wrong. They are both wrong in what they affirm and both right in what they deny.

The fact of the matter is that most of us have been considerably brainwashed. I use this term advisedly for I recognize it is only to be applied to those in other religious parties and should never be used with reference to “members of the Lord’s church.” However, at the risk of becoming decidedly unpopular, I would like to suggest that the organization currently denominated “The Church of Christ” is not actually a restoration of the first century church at all but is a twentieth century party growing out of the abuse of a nineteenth century restoration movement. The last thing that a majority of its members want to see is a real serious attempt to restore the primitive ekklesia. Nothing would surprise them more than to be transported back through the centuries and be taken to a meeting of the saints in Philippi or Rome. None of them would recognize it as a gathering of “the faithful church” and most of them would promise the Lord that if he would forgive them for attending this time they would never do it again.

The only thing I can think of which would equal their surprise would be the astonishment of the apostle Paul if he were to attend one of our meetings and hear his writings quoted as authority for some of the practices and performances. He would certainly be surprised at the “sermon” topic of “the minister” as announced, for several reasons. While Paul was on earth he did not “attend church.” The ekklesia (church) was composed of persons. One did not “go to church” but the church did the going! One did not “attend church” but the church did the attending.

However, the subject of the address would not sound any more strange to the apostle than the idea of “a sermon.” He never used the term nor did any of the other inspired writers. Origen was rightly designated “the father of the sermon” and he did not arrive on the scene until after Paul had been dead more than a hundred years. Origen was the third president of the first Christian College which was started in Alexandria, Egypt, about A.D. 180, and which the historian John Lawrence Mosheim said became “the grave of primitive Christianity.” Apparently the primitive order was put to sleep by sermonizing, a form of sedation which is still quite effective, but an overdose of which (like most other sleep-inducing drugs) may prove fatal to the body.

Of course, the general supposition is that the apostle would be induced to attend by virtue of the name “Church of Christ” over the door of the building. This might not be the case at all. When Paul was alive the saints did not put signs on their meeting places and for a very good reason. They were afraid people would find out where they met. It was difficult enough to keep out of the hands of the persecutors without telling them where to locate you.

In any event a sign reading “Church of Christ” might not mean a great deal to Paul. He did not use the expression in any of the letters he wrote to congregations. Once he mentioned “churches of Christ” to the Romans but in the same connection (he did not divide his letter into chapters and verses) he also mentioned “churches of the Gentiles” and one was no more a title than the other. It just could be that he might drop in on a meeting of the “Church of God” because he refers to “the church of God” and “the churches of God” frequently. Or, in a large city he could get side-tracked and go to a colored “Church of God in Christ” because he would likely find it in a slum area and that is probably where he would be looking. When he was on earth “not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble were called.” He might not know that God had changed since the world became more civilized. When he labored for God he said, “God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought the things that are.”

Even if he went to a “Church of Christ” it might not be “the loyal church.” There are now at least twenty-five different brands of “The Church of Christ” and while the members of each one think theirs is the “New Testament church” they also think all of the others are disloyal and apostate. They would feel obligated to warn the apostle to “have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness” such as breaking the loaf before passing it or using unfermented wine in the Lord’s Supper. He would be cautioned to stay away from congregations that had classes or those that didn’t have them (depending on which one he fell in with first) and he would be shown how to mark brethren and avoid them. It would be difficult for him to associate this with anything he wrote to the Romans, but he would be informed that what he said was the basis for all of the division. He would no doubt think this very strange since he thought he was writing to offset division and promote unity.

It is commonly held by most members of “The Church of Christ” that the apostle would have to attend with them because of “the pattern.” This phrase has been adopted to describe the method employed in carrying out their various functions and services. It is borrowed from the writer of the Hebrews who related how God told Moses when he was about to make the tabernacle, “See that thou make all things according to the pattern showed thee in the mount.” It is assumed that inasmuch as God gave Moses the most minute details about the earthly sanctuary he has done the same for us with regard to heavenly things. They seem to overlook the fact that the first tabernacle was to be constructed and pitched by man under divine direction, so nothing was left to judgment or conscience, whereas it is distinctly said that now Jesus is a high priest in “the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched and not man.”

Disregarding this, various groups from time to time, looking at the new covenant scriptures as merely another legalistic code, take them and attempt to “pitch the true tabernacle” themselves according to the pattern. However, in each instance “the pattern” is the interpretation which the group places upon the sacred writings and their opinions concerning what God means. All agree that the pattern is so plain that any person can understand it, but this is about as far as the agreement goes. Each group pitches its own “true tabernacle” and then they pitch into each other. When Moses built the first tabernacle all twelve tribes encamped around the one structure but now each tribe has constructed its own. There are more than two dozen “true tabernacles” called “The Church of Christ” with the priests in each going daily on the radio “accomplishing the service of God” by challenging the priests of the others to debate.

It is obvious that men can make “the pattern” mean just about what they want it to mean. Generally it is a reproduction of the group practices and procedures with which they became familiar in “the church down home.” If the congregation in which they grew up had three songs followed by prayer to open the service, they feel uncomfortable and out of place where the service is opened by reading from the sacred scripture followed by meditation and prayer. It isn’t “according to the pattern” to do it the other way.

If they have been accustomed to “an invitation song” at the close and they attend where the brethren conclude their public worship on a devotional plane without it they feel like they have “just not been to meeting.” They never stop to enquire on what ground a congregation suspends its praise directed to God and all begin to shout together in melodic strains to the sinners (if any) who are present: “Come, ye sinners, poor and needy, weak and wounded, sick and sore!” They may be wont to hear those who have just observed the feast in the Father’s house get to their feet a few minutes later and testify in unison and in four-four time, “I’ve wandered far away from God, now I’m coming home.” This must be taken with a grain of salt, of course, for if someone else would intimate that they are still a long way from home, he would be cast out of the synagogue. Such songs are projected toward others, for this too is a part of the pattern. One wonders what the apostle Paul would think if he “attended church” where a part of the worship was directed toward aliens and where a man stood up in front waving and pumping his arms while the rest sang in D flat, “There’s a Stranger at the door, let him in!”

No doubt it would startle the apostle to no end if he fell in with one of our contemporary factions whose members have deducted from his writings that the “scriptural form of worship” requires that all of their corporate worship be opened with prayer and that they cannot regard any as “faithful” who follow any other pattern. It probably never occurred to him as he wrote to Timotheus, “I exhort, therefore— that, first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men” that someone would come up with the idea that he was laying down a law governing the sequence of “the items of worship”— especially since he knew nothing about items of worship. The Holy Spirit neglected to use that phrase in his revelation, but that has not kept it from becoming a part of “the pattern.”

It would help us a great deal in these days in our approach to some of our problems if we would just admit that the pattern (or patterns) we follow is primarily a concoction of human judgment, sanctified in our sight by traditional observance and consecrated by partisan prejudice we have absorbed along the way. We know that it is difficult indeed to be so frank and honest in any appraisal of our own position. We have all been conditioned to believe that the way we do things is God’s will for this generation and for all people in all ages.

Because we tend to confuse our interpretation with God’s revelation, it appears that if we concede we may be wrong about some things it is the equivalent of accusing God of being in error. There is a difference. Revelation is what God actually said. Interpretation is what we think he meant by what he said.

The first is divine, it is the uncovering of the infinite mind. The second is human, it is the result of research and investigation by finite minds. The first is unalterable, there is no more to be said by God. The second is subject to amendment for there is much more to be learned by man. The sectarian spirit is always opposed to true research. It seeks to embalm what has been learned in the past and make this the body of truth by which all else is to be judged.

It is true that all of the factional leaders urge their adherents to study but they do not really mean it. Nothing is more dangerous or detrimental to any party than for its members to make an unbiased study and really search for truth. Study, as the word is used by partisan preachers, means to “search the scriptures” to work out additional arguments in defence of that for which the party contends. Since this is a purely prejudicial attitude no one who employs it can hope to arrive at real truth. He will have a slanted version which in his own warped mind will appear to be straight. The result of fear on our own conception of thought when we seek to drink at the fountain of knowledge can be seen in some of the ringstraked, speckled and spotted ideas so characteristic of our brothers.

No sect or faction can long retain within its number a truly honest and individual thinker. All history, without exception, demonstrates that every such person is eventually labeled a heretic and driven forth. To be a good member of a party one should abstain from study and content himself with mere repetition of the party line. To stifle freedom of thought and to provide a means of keeping the people in check every faction works out a pattern which is then bound upon the members as “the scriptural way.” Any deviation from this unwritten creed is looked upon as digression from the truth. This is punishable by banishment from the party. It is the thinkers who are excluded!

In order to enforce “the law” and to make it applicable to the body of believers, spiritual principles are reduced to a rigid formula. This enables the average person to have a sense of security and well-being for by going through with the regulations he convinces himself that he has done the will of God and is safe. Every faction, sooner or later, makes “safety” its rule of faith and practice instead of the revelation of God. By doing so it can enforce its unwritten creed as a substitute in areas where God has not legislated. “But it is safe to do it this way” becomes an iron clad and inflexible law and is expected to silence not only any objection to that method but any suggestion of another method. The truth is that there may be more than one “safe” way of doing many things. The one who on the basis of safety, rather than upon the authority of revelation, enshrines his way as the only one, creates a creed as certainly as that can be done. Unwritten creeds produce cleavages!

Certainly no one should object to any group desiring to be safe, but it is very unfortunate that such groups also frequently desire to be dogmatic. It is one thing to be safe, a wholly different thing to become legislators and judges. Nor must it be overlooked that Christianity is a great adventure and there are certain risks involved. One can make safety his “god” and stay so close to shore he will do nothing but fritter his life away dabbling in the shallows. Faith does not choose the easy way and not always what is labeled the “safe” way. It recognizes that there may be more than one way to do some things. Faith risks all. We must always stay within the limit of God’s will and purpose. We must never transgress. But that will is not bounded or limited by areas marked “Safe” simply to gratify partisan practices or traditional procedures.

One of the tragedies of creating a purely ritualistic or legalistic approach to God lies in the fact that it makes spirit expansion impossible. The most intimate and inspiring relationships are reduced to cold formal transactions. A good illustration of what we mean is found in what is referred to as “the plan of salvation.” That moment when a longing soul makes contact with God through the Spirit should be of all the experiences of which we are capable the most glorious and transcendent. "I sought the Lord, and he answered me, and delivered me from all my fears. Look to him, and be radiant." Unfortunately the glory of that encounter has been obscured by projecting a purely intellectual process which acts as a veil over the heart.

The approach to God is described by a rigidly prescribed set of stairs up which one may clamber in a hop, skip and jump procedure, the last step landing him safely in the kingdom. We have been treated to charts and diagrams with little kitchen step-ladders leading out of darkness into light, and with the steps labeled hearing, faith, repentance, confession and baptism. The inference certainly is left that we climb out simply by exercise of our own power and strength and all that the Father has done is to set a ladder up against the wall in the hope that we will stumble on to it while looking for Him. The legalistic attitude is seen when we remember that if a person takes two steps at once the final step does not land him in the kingdom at all but dumps him outside and he has to start over and make the climb under the guidance of one "of our preachers." If one does not fully comprehend what he is stepping into when he takes the last rung of the ladder, he merely steps off into space, and has to be put through the performance again or he will not be allowed with the rest of the people in "the Lord's church."

I suggest in all sincerity that if one wants to find a common, everyday illustration of how we have access by one Spirit to the Father, an escalator provides a much better figure than a ladder. In climbing a ladder one leaves the previous step each time in order to ascend to the next one. But one should never quit hearing God's word, nor should he ever stop believing what God has said. He ought always to repent of his sins when necessary. For those who have arbitrarily injected public confession as a formal step for an alien, without a shred of authority, it needs to be recalled that "profession" is a much better translation of the term.

In the case of an escalator one climbs on the first step and stands there in full confidence as an invisible power lifts him up to a higher plane. The unseen power in this case is the grace of God and the first step is faith. “By grace are you saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God. Not of works, lest any man should boast.” An escalator does not reach out and grab one and force him to go to a higher plane. A man will get nowhere on an escalator unless he exercises his will to take the first step. This places him in position where the power which is always there becomes operative in his personal behalf. By this means we do not climb and struggle up to the next shelf of repentance but we are led to it. “Do you not know that the goodness of God leadeth you to repentance?”

A man does not climb out of sin. If he could do so he would have just ground for pride. But the record says, “What room then is left for human pride? It is excluded” (Romans 3:27). We are liberated from sin, lifted out of it, and that by a person. The act of liberation is not ours, but his. “For all alike have sinned, and are deprived of the divine splendour, and all are justified by God’s free grace alone, through his act of liberation in the person of Christ Jesus. For God designed him to be the means of expiating sin by his sacrificial death, effective through faith” (Romans 3:23-25). We are not saved from wrath by a plan but through a man. “For if, when we were God’s enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son, much more, now that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life.” This is the conclusion of Paul immediately following the statement, “And so, since we have now been justified by Christ’s sacrificial death, we shall all the more certainly be saved through him from final retribution.”

We do not climb up under our own power, but through humility and self-denial we place ourselves in that state where we can be lifted up. “Humble yourselves before God and he will lift you high” (James 4:10). It may sound treasonable to many of my readers but on the basis of the scriptural meaning of faith, we are justified by faith alone, for everything else is merely a manifestation or perfecting of faith. It is distinctly stated that the only thing which avails in Christ Jesus is faith— faith which works by love! The purpose of works is to demonstrate or manifest faith. It is faith that must be shown. “And I by my works will show you my faith” (James 2:18).

Those who plot a legalistic course refer to the expression “who also walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham” (Romans 4:12). This is done to make it appear that these steps were works performed by Abraham for justification. But this is a positive contradiction of the very purpose of the apostle in introducing Abraham. His thesis is that “the promise was made on the ground of faith, in order that it might be a matter of sheer grace” (verse 16). For that reason he begins with the positive declaration “If Abraham was justified by anything he had done, then he has a ground for pride. But he has no such ground before God” (verse 2). The steps of Abraham did not consist of things which he did or of works he performed as deeds of righteousness. They were “steps of faith” and the RSV renders the clause correctly, “but also follow the example of the faith which our father Abraham had.”

We are not saved by works although we cannot be saved without them. We are not saved because we work, but we work because we are saved. We are not products of our own workmanship. We are not self-created. We do not enter God’s family by what we do for him but by what he does for us. “For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand, that we should walk in them.” The New English Bible renders this, “For we are God’s handiwork, created in Christ Jesus to devote ourselves to the good deeds for which God has designed us.”

In our attempts to simplify and systematize for sermon outlines, we have minimized and quenched the Spirit until the deep sense of personal encounter with God has been sacrificed for a written code. The result is that our factions are loaded with unhappy, discontented, frightened men and women, who live in constant dread of what they will find in their law book, which actually is a compilation and collection of love letters which God designed to stimulate spiritual growth and togetherness. We have ignored the statement of the apostle, “But now, having died to that which held us bound, we are discharged from the law, to serve God in a new way, the way of the spirit, in contrast to the old way, the way of a written code” (Romans 7:6). Certainly reformation of life and immersion into Christ Jesus are essential, but they are of no avail unless they are demonstrations of faith which is motivated by love! Conforming to them as legal requirements will achieve but little except to make us frustrated and disappointed with ourselves!

What has here been said of “the plan of salvation” may be said of the various other formulae and rituals which we have created and developed by taking a passage here and another there and out of these weaving our party design which we henceforth regard as “the pattern.” This writer looks askance at the attempts to formalize and standardize the Way by pouring certain ingredients into the matrix of human rationalization which then becomes the unwritten creed by which we judge all men. It is certainly doubtful if any of the apostles ever delivered what passes today for a “Church of Christ sermon.” Certainly none of them ever offered an outline on “The Law of Pardon” or “The Steps to Salvation.” These are our modern trappings, adaptations of the Good News to the superficial tastes of our decadent world. Paul would be amazed at some of the dissertations based on popular sermon outlines. He would feel a revulsion against the cheap diatribes and sensational appeals.

We are a long way yet from the primitive simplicity in which the Good News was the message of grace to the unsaved and the apostolic doctrine was the course of instruction for the training and discipline of the saved ones. If Paul came to one of our meetings he would have to be oriented for he would find but little resemblance between them and the meetings he knew in “the upper room.” He might conclude that we were a synagogue dedicated to the ignoble task of fostering ill-will among believers in the Messiah and of spreading division. He once gave instruction that the saints, the committed ones, were to endeavor to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. He would be saddened and distressed by how far we have departed from that ideal. The fact of the matter is I just wonder where he would attend if he came to town.

Orthodoxy and Reform

Mission Messenger (June 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

History is a stern, unbending mistress who keeps a universal school attended by all of us. Few of us sit under her firm gaze or eye her chastening rod with pleasure. We have to be dragged reluctantly and against our angry protests to the place where we will listen at all, and after having heard, we resent the lessons and bitterly deny their application to our own life and times. In no other field of human existence is this tendency more manifest than in the religious, and someone has cynically said that “the only thing we learn from history is that no one learns from history.”

For example there are certain facts connected with the history of reformatory movements which are unyielding and undeniable. These facts are so hard there is no way of softening their impact, and so cold there is no way of warming them up to make them more acceptable. They simply have to be admitted. Every reform began as an attempt to find relief from a situation regarded as intolerable and had as its aim a way of life more presentable unto God. But every such movement in spite of its noble ideals in the beginning, has terminated in the formation of another sect or faction, often more intolerant and exclusive than the original. It may prove profitable to analyze the reason behind this seemingly inexorable tendency.

All religion is motivated by a sense of dependency and all sectarianism by a sense of fear. While these are not necessarily related they are often confused. Under the impulse of the first, man seeks to come closer unto God; under the impulse of the second he constructs forms and fences as part of the truth, and often fights harder to preserve the forms than to defend the truth. Losing his sense of values and with his perspective clouded by partisan antagonism, he regards those who question the forms as enemies of religion and deniers of God.

The religion based upon faith in the claims of Jesus of Nazareth is ageless and timeless. It is obvious that it must be expressed, and it is just as apparent that such expression must be in a form adapted to the age, the culture and the place, but within the pale of God's revelation. It is a vain assumption and a myth that this revelation was intended to provide a meticulous and detailed method for meeting every need or expressing every passion for righteousness. Christianity is the relationship to a person, and through that person to God. The purpose of the divine revelation is to demonstrate how that person would react to the situations which confront us, and to develop within us that divine nature which will enable us to automatically and spontaneously respond as He would if present. Indeed He is present in every situation for He dwells in us.

It is inevitable that the forms through which faith is expressed must be flexible and expansive or they will become a straitjacket which confines and restrains. Under such circumstances repression is actually confused with expression. This chokes out all further reformation and those who arrived at their current position only because of daring changes made by their fathers, become complacent leaders of the status quo and brand all further change as compromise. They seem never to realize that the philosophy they espouse would have doomed them to continue in the same sectarianism from which their fathers extricated themselves.

The task of every true reformer is to breathe new life into a people who have stupefied themselves by inhaling over and over the fetid atmosphere created by their own confinement. Every sect or faction becomes inbred in its thinking and this tends toward sterility and impotence. Those who once were able to meet the challenge of another day are no longer capable of measuring up to the demands of a new era. But all of us resist change. We feel secure in the old worn ruts which our traditions have created. We are frightened by the untried and fearful of the unfamiliar. We cling to the old phrases and cleave to hoary clichés long after they cease to communicate anything to those about us. This is the spirit which results in sectarianism, and like so many other things in the spiritual realm it is hard to tell where good ends and evil begins. Certainly we should be careful, cautious and concerned, and yet faith is not certainty, but a bold adventure into the unknown.

Reformers tend by nature to become impatient. They see those whom they regard as brethren held captive behind walls which have grown upward with the passing decades. They behold those whom they love building the walls higher in the mistaken notion that this is the way toward freedom in Christ. All true reformers are radicals for this word means “root.” A radical is one who gets to the root of things. He is not concerned about superficial details or lopping off twigs. Reformers are also non-conformists and this is a second strike against them, making impossible the attainment to any measurable degree of success during their lifetime. No society can stand radicals and non-conformists for these call attention to their own sins and shortcomings. The world must get them out of its sight as witness what happened to Jesus of Nazareth, Paul of Tarsus, Jan Huss of Bohemia, Jerome Savonarola of Italy, and an innumerable company of others who were gadflies in their day as was Socrates in his day in Athens.

It is after the present generation which has stoned its prophets has died, and another generation, and a third has arisen, that men can look back and see that there was a prophet among their fathers. This does not argue that the approach of the reformer is always the best or that in prosecution of a justifiable purpose he always employs justifiable means. Reformers are human and while non-conformity is essential to their very nature, impatience should not necessarily be so. There is little to be gained by an intolerant attack upon intolerance. Reformers are also driven by fear. When they see their lifetime approaching the sunset and glance behind to see how lengthy the shadows have become, they occasionally become frantic and end up by destroying that which they set out to save. They would be helped by a realization of the truth that their responsibility is to plant or water and God will give the increase. Sometimes a man may die before he can harvest the crop from the seed he has planted, but those who remain after him can "enter into the fruit of his labors."

Reformation, in its initial stages, does not consist of tearing down walls from without. It is difficult to rescue those who do not regard themselves as being captives, and especially when they have been conditioned to believe that safety lies only inside the walls they have built. All reformation is from within and it consists not of chopping away at walls but of prying open rusty windows so that a fresh breeze may be wafted in to revive the fainthearted and weary. Men who have lived inside of walls for years are not qualified for sudden exodus to a world of greater freedom and may dash themselves to pieces in wild abandon.

It is enough if one can open up a window so that eyes long accustomed to gloom can adapt themselves to greater light. Man is not by nature an aquatic being, and water is not his natural habitat, so when one has been working in marine depths he must be brought back slowly to his normal environment lest he die from the effect of the sudden change. It serves little good to rescue a man from an abnormal condition only to have him die the moment he reaches his proper state. While it is true that all reformers are radicals, not all radicals are reformers. Many become both defamers and deformers!

Every generation is destined to see a struggle between the forces of reform and those of orthodoxy because reformation is a continuous process. It is not confined to one century or to one age. Orthodoxy seeks to maintain the form, reformation seeks to admit new and greater light. It is no wonder that reformers of the past have actually been designated “New Lights” on several occasions and within different movements. It is unfortunate that, in times of war, men often act intemperately upon both sides. While it is true that the orthodox confuse the truth of heaven with their partisan forms adopted to express it, it is just as true that reform forces often regard all such forms derived from past experience as evil and viciously attack them in an attempt to wipe them out.

There is a fallacy manifest on both sides of such a controversy. The orthodox defenders err in assuming that their forms for expressing the will of God, or the machinery created to enable them to implement the will of God, are part of the will of God. This drives them to seek for “a pattern” in the revealed will of God for the machinery they have already contrived, and as bad as some of that machinery is, it cannot be as absurd or ridiculous as some of the arguments made “from the scriptures” to justify it or find precedent for it. Actually, the forms of expression are an outgrowth in each generation of the anxious concerns of honest men for serving the needs of their generation, and whether they are the best or are inferior may be a matter of human judgment, but the binding of these upon men as part of the will of God, and demanding that they be supported as a test of faithfulness to the Almighty intrudes upon the divine prerogative and is an unwarranted usurpation of authority. It is astounding that those who search the scriptures for what they have developed in seeking divine authority for it, have no hesitancy in binding it upon the consciences of other saints contrary to all of the authority in God’s Word.

At the same time the forces of reform may err by assuming that because certain ones confuse the will of God with the forms devised to express it, that all forms should be abandoned and thrown to “the moles and the bats.” While the forces of orthodoxy regard their forms as the will of God, these others regard them as idols and the works of men’s hands. Both are wrong, and because of this division has resulted in almost every case of reform and a new party has been born. The truth is that religion is emotional and rational, philosophical and practical. While it is true that the prime essential is to sustain a proper relationship to God, this must manifest itself in a proper relationship to mankind in its various phases as they touch an individual life. Religion must seek expression to be valid and it will do so in those forms which commend themselves unto us as being in harmony with God’s program for us in our situation. Those forms may or may not be right, but they will not be wrong simply because they are forms of expression.

With the kind indulgence of our readers I should like to make a direct and positive application to our day of the principles I have been discussing. In order to do this I shall use as an example the one group of believers in our Lord Jesus Christ with which I am most familiar, the noninstrument churches of Christ. What I have to say will be generally applicable to most other groups for neither our problems or attitudes are at all unique or different. When I speak of “one group” in this connection, I am using a relative expression. Actually there are some two dozen divergent factions among us in spite of the fact that we are heirs of a movement, the avowed purpose of which was “to unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

The intensely partisan members of each faction regard their own party as “the faithful church,” but there is a growing recognition among many of the more sober and intelligent thinkers in all of them that this entire branch of the restoration movement has not only entirely lost its original purpose but has become sectarianized. It is a denomination in that it has selected a specific title by which to designate itself and to distinguish it from other parties and the Christians who may be in them. It has developed its own missionary, charitable, journalistic and educational organizations, and these vested interests exist to propagate and perpetuate the traditional interpretations and attitudes.

In reality the non-instrument brethren have at least three distinct major sets of vested interests. The more elaborate is maintained by what may be called the main line orthodox segment; another is supported by those who hold that the return of Jesus will be pre-millennial; a third, with the exception of missionary and charitable organizations, has the allegiance of a faction opposed to such institutions. All of these are rivals. Some of them carry on an almost continuous campaign of pressures against the others. In addition to these, practically all of the other factions have their own journals which serve to hold the members "in line" and to help discourage fraternization across the lines and prevent defections from the parties. All of these are bound in loose federation by mutual regard for immersion and mutual opposition to instrumental music, which is considered as giving them exclusive right to the title "Church of Christ." Most of them resent infringement of the title by those who use instrumental music. They regard this as an attempt of aliens to steal the name of "the Lord's church."

However, it is in the development of orthodoxy concocted from traditional slogans, opinions and interpretations, and mistaken for "the one faith," that the real sectarian spirit is manifested. Those who cannot, in good conscience, subscribe to all of the tests and shibboleths are rejected as being unworthy of Christ, while those who pay lipservice are accepted as "loyal." This means that conformity rather than character, becomes the criterion for measuring the validity of profession. Nothing is more deadening to the spirit than such lethal legalism.

At the risk of offence, which is wholly unintended, let me mention some of the forms which our orthodoxy has developed by which to express itself. Symptomatic of that oversimplification which frequently characterizes the more legalistic sects is the reduction of all religious experience to simple formulae. Examples of these are our “five steps to salvation” and “five items of worship.” Neither of these expressions is scriptural nor is the idea they are intended to convey expressed in any other scriptural language. What they do to the majestic concepts of “salvation” and “worship” is evidenced in the frightful dearth of understanding of these noble terms in the hearts of many who have taken the “steps” and engage in the “items.”

The “access to this grace wherein we stand,” the acceptance of atonement and effecting of reconciliation, the reception of sanctification and justification— this is hardly to be confined to a little “kitchen stepladder process” as commonly illustrated upon sermon charts. One does not do a hop, skip and jump into the communion of the saints nor enter the New Jerusalem by a system which requires him to leave “the step of faith” in order to repent of his sins, or cease to repent in order to confess. The fact is that the “public confession” as a specific step may have been inserted into this “five finger exercise” without any scriptural warrant as demonstrated by the warping and wresting of unrelated Biblical passages to sustain it.

The grave danger involved in this kind of orthodoxy is that persons possessed of profound faith in the Lord and who have been immersed in implementation of that faith may be rejected because they did not take the “steps” in order or approved sequence, or because they were mistaken as to the exact point in the process or program where the remission of their sins was granted by a gracious God. It is not enough that one enter the relationship with the Father and Son but he must express it in the very words which have become the traditional pattern of our particular segment of a particular restoration movement. Yet it is not necessarily the form which is to be deplored, for unquestionably thousands of humble and contrite souls have entered into “the fellowship of the Spirit” and expressed their trust in God’s Son by taking the five steps in “the plan of salvation.”

The wrong lies in the dogmatic spirit which binds this form of expression, even verbally, upon others as the will of God. This would un-Christianize the great army of those who were among the saved of all those centuries before members of a certain group “discovered” the “steps of salvation” and reduced the approach to the divine nature to a systematic sequence of actions taken by man. Not one of the twelve apostles would have understood what one was talking about if he had questioned them about “the five steps to salvation.” This is the language of crystallized orthodoxy in a certain age of the Christian era and among the heirs of a specific segment of a restoration attempt.

By the same token we have coined another expression of “Church-of-Christism” in our usage of the term “five items of worship.” It would amaze the average person among our various parties to learn how many debates have been held, how many divisions have resulted, and how many factions have been created by orthodoxy, rather than fidelity to the revelation of heaven. In each protest against orthodoxy a new party has been created and a new species of orthodoxy has been born to further confuse and confound, and to foster antagonism and rivalry. We become so attached to our forms that we cannot conceive of them as being other than the expressed will of God.

We are shocked when someone suggests that a congregation could “scripturally worship” on the Lord’s Day if the brethren merely met and observed the Lord’s Supper without any other religious exercise. Or, if it is suggested that “congregational singing” as we practice it cannot be shown by the scriptures to have been a part of the public “worship” in the days of the apostles. It would startle a great many of us to realize that such things as “the treasury” and “the budget,” and a lot of other things which are such sources of controversy in our day, were wholly unknown in the primitive community of the saints. The fact is that, of all the words translated “worship” in the new covenant scriptures, the term is never applied to what we do on Lord's Day, and the expression "the worship" is not in the Bible. The sacred oracles know nothing of "the five items of worship."

Confronted with such unscriptural jargon and such a conglomerate mass of orthodox opinion and dogma, a reformer among our brethren might be tempted to strike out in all directions. Such intemperate action would only aggravate the situation. Since our forms are an outgrowth of a sincere effort to please God we must grow out of them by a continued effort to please Him. Merely ridding ourselves of the forms will leave us helpless in our effort to express the will of God. Our task is to restore a proper sense of values which will enable us to distinguish between the will of God and the form of expressing it. This is part of a maturing process and such a process is always educative in nature. But all education is slow and methodical. One does not become educated over night. We must "grow in grace and knowledge of the truth."

When a person falls fully clothed into a stream and is dragged from it in an apparently drowning state, it is not necessary to divest him of all his clothing before efforts at reviving him can begin. It is only necessary to loosen the clothing in those areas where it would hinder breathing. So it is with a body of believers whose corporate life is threatened by inhalation of the smoke screen of traditionalism. Such believers need not be divested of all outward forms in order to breathe new life into them. It would avail but little to save one from drowning or asphyxiation only to have him die from exposure because of your hasty and ill-advised procedure.

All reformatory movements as they develop into exclusivist sects suffer from addiction to the drug of their own orthodoxy. They must have regular shots of it injected into their corporate veins or they lose their inability to function. No food, regardless of how palatable, can satisfy their need for "a fix" and they lose their power of locomotion until they have a "revival" and are exposed once more to the familiar opiate which for a brief period thrills and exhilarates until its effect wears off. Yet, the only effective cure for an “addict” is by slow and supervised withdrawal, with decreasing amounts of the drug being allowed until the unfortunate victim is free. Too sudden withdrawal results in a state of shock which may be as dangerous as the drug. Men must be led out of orthodoxy, not jerked out of it. Reformers need to be leaders, not drivers.

There are growing indications that those in all areas of our own restoration movements are starting to outgrow their particular brands of orthodoxy. Even those in the more extreme and exclusive factions are becoming aware that their forms and methods of containing and expressing the will of God are not adequate to the needs of our day. Much of this can be attributed to an increasing educational stature which enables us to see more clearly the truth revealed in the scriptures. We are coming to realize that expanding horizons do not necessarily betoken an increasing broad-mindedness, which is often a synonym for shallowness, but are rather the result of climbing higher on the mountains of faith. This enables us to give proper credit to all of our fathers in all of the factions who did their best in the age in which they walked. One is not expected to see as clearly in the grayness of approaching dawn as when the sun climbs to its meridian. One may appreciate what his father’s hand wrought without allowing the skeletal fingers to reach out from the grave to deter his own further progress.

The church of God must be adapted to meet the needs of those in all times and climes, for the simple reason that the church is composed of people, and those who compose it at any time in any part of the world, are those who are alive at that time and who live in that part of the earth. The church in the United States today is not made up of those who lived in the United States a century ago. Those who are the church now are exposed to different problems, tensions and fears. The revelation of God in Jesus Christ is adequate to fulfill our needs in all ages.

The principles enunciated by the Son of God are unvarying and unchanging. But those who come to Christ now out of a sense of dependency must find “strength to help in time of need,” and the need may be such as our ancestors did not experience at all. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever, but the times in which we live today are not the same as those of yesteryear.

The church in the United States is not composed of people in India or Africa, and we should be concerned that we do not think of Christianity as a white man’s religion taken to other people. When the gospel is proclaimed in Japan we are not sharing with the Japanese that which is ours but simply calling attention to that which is also theirs. And they do not need to conform to all of our occidental traditions and forms to be the people of God.

When we find indigenous groups who have discovered Christ we need not make them over into Texas-style or Tennessee-style “Churches of Christ” in order for God to accept them. They need not always be acceptable unto us to be acceptable unto Him. We are about as anxious to foist our interpretations upon others as we are to foster God’s revelation among them. That is why all of our factions send their own brand of missionaries. We must not only preach divine love but peddle our American divisions. Few of us would be willing to immerse believers into Christ and simply commend them unto God and the word of His grace in their own language. The sincere hearts of honest natives might not discover our factional slant.

Missionaries from among our brethren who use instrumental music can testify that they have planted congregations in numerous places where the instrument was not used and there was no indication it ever would be used in the corporate worship, but men whose partisan zeal exceeded their love for souls came into such areas and began propagandizing against instrumental music on the radio and by tracts circulated promiscuously. They simply had to be sure that the converts understood the grave “sin” of sitting at the Lord’s table with those who had immersed them into Christ Jesus but who were supported by congregations in the states where a piano was played when the brethren met for public praise of the one God. Such factional tactics in a partisan attempt to plant a “South African Vocal Music Church of Christ” where only vocal music was used anyway, make about as much sense as an “Outer Mongolian Southern Baptist Church.”

Our factional tendencies have become so apparent they are nauseating and our sickness has caused brethren in all of the parties to abandon their self-prescribed home remedies and again consult the Great Physician. There is a great deal of hope for the future. Orthodoxy has worked its own rebuke. We need not castigate ourselves with the thought that our own orthodoxy is any worse than that of others about us. It is of the same nature although manifesting itself in different forms. We need reformation but it must be rational while being revolutionary. Since no faction among us is the church of God, we need not switch from one faction to another as we learn new truths. Let us stay where we are for that is where we are needed. Let us leaven from within and not leave and attack from without. We are on the threshold of a twentieth century restoration movement that will be every bit as vital and important as the one launched in the nineteenth century by Barton Warren Stone and the Campbells. Just as their efforts did not alter the church of Christ but affected those of it who were in the sects, so this one will not affect the church of Christ but it will affect those in the “Churches of Christ”— all twenty-five of them!

Orthodoxy creates new criteria of “faithfulness” with the passage of years so that one received as “loyal” while believing a certain thing in one generation would be rejected for believing the same thing in another and later generation. It steals into the throne room of the mind and carries captive conscience which was given the divine prerogative of judging the propriety or impropriety of our personal thoughts and acts, under the supreme Sovereign of the universe. As a rude usurper it enthrones itself and appropriates the combined functions of judge, jury and hangman. It has been the bane of all reformatory movements.

With Simple Joy

Mission Messenger (June 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

The Mississippi River, as it flows past Saint Louis, is a muddy silt-laden body of water. Its “coffee color” which turns to amber or bronze in the dying rays of the setting sun is far removed from the pure clear depths near its origin in the distant north. On its meandering route through hundreds of miles it accumulates sediment and filth. Into its increasing volume other streams flow and deposit their own burden of muck and mud. At its source one may kneel and drink freely without qualm but farther along its route cities must spend millions to purify its waters from the corruption of other cities and the general terrain.

The stream of Christianity is like this. All religion, like a river, becomes tinged with the culture through which it wends its way. Religion changes men but men also change religion. Each tends to give to the other and draw from the other. If one wants to see Christianity at its best he cannot view it in the contemporary scene affected by almost twenty centuries of subjection to the debates and strife of human reasoning. He must return to the source and when he does he will find that like a mighty river it had a humble beginning. It was the very humility of this start which made it possible to be so pure and unaffected.

Who does not feel a sense of awe when he reads the statement, "All the believers shared everything in common. . . . Day after day they met by common consent in the Temple; they broke bread together in their homes, sharing meals with simple joy." How the heart palpitates when we read such expressions as "shared everything," "common consent," "broke bread together," etc.

Sometimes we are asked if this was "communism" among the primitive saints. That depends, I suppose, upon the meaning attached to "communism," but some things are immediately evident. The spirit which prompted the saints was not a political ideology. They were not united to create a new economic structure in society.

The sharing with their fellows was simply an outpouring expression of that bounty which God shared with them. Jesus had come to partake of the flesh and make the supreme sacrifice for those who were powerless and helpless. "Though he was rich, yet for our sakes, he became poor." Hearts that were hungry for salvation were filled to overflowing, personalities that were starved for recognition were satisfied. All of the pent-up longings and yearnings of the ages were fulfilled at the cross. Those who became one in him were in the very source of all goodness, righteousness and justification. Since they were all indebted to Him for spiritual life the sharing of their material blessings was but a natural outgrowth of such rich grace.

One of our problems today lies in the fact that it is easy to become a "Christian." It is also popular to do so. It carries a certain amount of social prestige. It is a mark of status. The temptation is to belong and live in mediocrity, sharing only in the superficial, scraping the surface and skimming the shallows. We need restoration but we mistake our real need when we think only in terms of ritual and "acts of worship." Our pattern is a person and we need to recapture the true sense of being in Him. Until we do we will be trying to get men to give money to a cause to which they have not given their hearts and to donate time to a work divorced from their thought.

Only simple people can share in “simple joy.” And we need to be a simple people, fashioned not according to the world, but refashioning the world. Our Master lived a simple life among simple folk. Our world has a confused sense of values. We are spending our money for “that which is not bread” and our substance for that which perishes. It is time that we think seriously about such terms as “believers” and “disciples.” These are the words used most often to designate the saints in their early days— and their purest and best ones. Perhaps there is something about the relationships expressed in these words that we have lost in the intervening centuries.

It is altogether possible that we are more concerned about “raising our standard of living” than we are about raising “the standard of life.” It is not the “high cost of living” which is our difficulty but “the cost of high living.” The church was never so united as when its members met with each other and ate together with simple joy! If we recapture the simplicity we may help restore the unity!

Full Speed Ahead!

Mission Messenger (June 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

“Captain of the Queens” is the title of the autobiography of Harry Grattidge who spent more than fifty years at sea. As a boy he became an apprentice on the four masted bark Osborne, and this laid the foundation for his later service as an officer aboard almost every Cunard liner. He was promoted to Captain of the Queen Mary and ended his sailing career on December 21, 1953, as Commodore of the Cunard Steamship Company, Limited, and Captain of the Queen Elizabeth. Of his labors on the former vessel he wrote “Regardless of circumstances I was always happy to be aboard the Queen Mary, working eighteen hours a day, seven days a week. There was never a moment when you could say, ‘My job is done.’”

It seems to me that what is here said could be just as applicable to those of us who have enlisted on the Ship of Zion and who have assumed the responsibility that goes with such a position. “Service” was the guiding star of the career of Harry Grattidge and it should be our aim in life. The master of a modern passenger ship must be engrossed in the welfare of others. He lives not for self but for sacrifice and sharing. That he can accept this with a degree of joy and happiness and be constantly grateful that he is aboard is the one way to assure satisfaction in his relationship.

There are no holidays for those at sea. They must think in terms of vocation rather than vacation. Just so, Christianity is not a one day per week proposition. We do not sail the sea of life only on Sundays. One of the most dangerous tendencies of our modern day is that of fragmenting and departmentalizing our lives. Instead of whole personalities we are human “pigeon holes” with this tucked away in one corner and that in another. Religious devotion is relegated to certain times or reserved only for ritualistic performance. We split our own personalities and lose the purpose and continuity of life. We become like ships without a rudder, running in circles on the high seas or at the mercy of every divergent wind that blows.

Even worse is our tendency to think in terms of retirement from the Lord’s service. We are imbued with the spirit of the labor union until we seek to apply its catchwords to our spiritual existence. We are obsessed with the idea of more leisure time and with social security. We look forward to the time when we can hang up our Christian uniform and don civilian clothes again, without recognizing that we fight in a war where there can be no cessation of hostilities to pick up the wounded and bury the dead. We either wear the armor or give up the fight to become defectors and turncoats. The civilian clothing we once wore was a product of Satan’s garment factory.

I like the thought expressed by Captain Grattidge that there was no moment in which you could conclude that your work was done. That is true of our life in Jesus. The need for constant alertness is acute, the time for service is ever present. We are engaged in a great crusade to bring peace to the harried and harassed sheep of God. This is not a task for the few but a responsibility of the many. There is no point at which we can rest on our oars and drift with the current. We need men who will pray unceasingly, practice unstintingly and proclaim unselfishly the hope that is in Christ Jesus. We need men who are alive and alert to the cry of our generation!

The religious world is looking for leadership. The barbed wire fences of partisanship are no longer valid for our day. The intolerance of hate and animosity, nurtured in the mistaken view that it represented loyalty to Christ, is being tried in the balances and found wanting. The creeds which men have compiled and composed are being recognized for what they are — the synthetic product of truth mingled with opinion and filtered through imperfect and fallible minds. In this emergency those who have a firm grip upon the unity of the Spirit can serve a great need. But they cannot do it while plagued with their own divisions and hampered by their own schisms.

We must arise and arouse. We must shake off the lethargy which has smothered us and overcome the stupor which has caused us to stumble. Never have we faced a greater challenge, never have we had a greater opportunity. The Holy Spirit has flung wide open “great doors and effectual.” We have not finished our task. The restoration of the ancient order and spirit is not completed. There remains much land yet to be conquered and possessed. Let us signal “Full speed ahead!”

Prophet and Priest

Mission Messenger (July 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Because of the nature of religion there are two roles which must be enacted by men within its ranks. Religion expresses itself in ritual and protects its devotional manifestation with certain forms. Its grave danger is ever that true worship will become confused with the forms of its expression and degenerate into empty performance carried out with punctilious precision while the heart of the worshiper is far removed. There must be those who call the minds of men back to their true status and urge constant reformation.

In days of yore these two functions were carried out by priest and prophet. The priest was concerned with the correct observance of the required ritual. He presided over the public phases of worship and was always alert to detect any deviation and to correct procedures which tended to vary from the norm. The prophet had a different message. He was not unconcerned with preservation of form, but he knew that even a corpse retains its form for awhile after the spirit is departed. He was primarily interested in inspiring men to serve God in a vital way, so his cry was always, "Turn ye, for why will ye die?"

The priest called for a constant examination of the service to see that no alien modification crept in. The prophet called for a constant examination of the heart to see that no alienating concept was retained. One called upon men to conform, the other called upon them to reform. It was not necessary that their tasks conflict because men must express their worship and such expression must be made by use of formal means. However, men are averse to change, and they frequently find it difficult to distinguish between worship, which is an attitude of the heart, and the forms which are the external means of expression of such worship.

The prophet often found himself under attack by both priest and people. It has become axiomatic that no people can endure their own prophets. It was to the chosen people of God that the question was addressed, “Was there ever a prophet whom your fathers did not persecute?” Nevertheless, without the prophet, or reformer, calling upon us to consider our beginnings and ponder our present ways, we generally adopt such attitudes as will eventually lead us into exile and render our witness a sterile and static thing.

The present writer is neither a prophet nor a student of the schools of the prophets. For that reason it may appear presumptuous indeed for him to humbly call for an examination of the motives and methods of his brethren in the Lord. We must confess, however, to being driven by a strong inner sense of urgency to write as we do in the hope that God may use our meager appeal to stimulate and raise up men possessed of far greater qualification and who can approximate more closely to “the prophetic vision” needed for such days as these. If the brethren can endure what may appear to them as our rashness and immodesty, we should like to write very pointedly about the current status of the disciple brotherhood.

Having been reared in a Danish Lutheran background, we deserted that sect at a rather early age, being immersed upon an acknowledgment that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God. In the mining region where we first lived there was but one faction of the restoration movement and we were firm in our conviction that it alone was “the kingdom of heaven” which had been spoken of by all of the prophets. There was little question but what we had restored the primitive church in its purity and constituted “the people of God” to the exclusion of all others in our humble community. Our attitude toward other sincere religionists in the neighborhood was that of native-born citizens toward foreigners who are poaching on their private preserve. They were either ignorant or dishonest in their claim to be Christians and we were called of God to “smite them hip and thigh” and drive them out of the land.

I am not sure when I first became aware that there were other factions which also claimed to be “The Church of Christ” but it was a great comfort to know that none of them constituted the “loyal church.” They were suffering under “strong delusions.” All of them were either hobbyists or sectarians, depending upon whether they opposed things we had, or had things we opposed. We were fully persuaded that those among them who were really honest would some day learn “the truth” and become identified with us, while the remainder would go farther and farther into the depths of stubbornness on the one hand, or of apostasy on the other, and we would judge them in the day when we also judged the angels. There was no question but what we would do the judging and we were constantly practicing up in anticipation of the last great day. We did not want to come to the task wholly inexperienced!

When we convinced someone in another faction that he was treading on dangerous ground and he “lined up with us,” we exultingly reported this as a conversion to the truth. But when someone left our party and aligned himself with another faction we quoted, “He went out from us because he was not of us; for if he had been of us, he would no doubt have continued with us.” He might have been preaching for us for years, but when he forsook the party we marked and avoided him as if he had the plague. We always rationalized as to what prompted such a person to defect, whether love of money, desire for prestige or pride of position. If none of these fit the case, we concluded that he was temporarily out of his mind. It was just unthinkable that a sane person would not see everything exactly as we did or that he could learn something we had not taught him.

I do recall the first time that I heard of a “Christian Church” putting up a sign “Church of Christ” on their building. I was incensed and indignant that such a group would seek to steal the name of “the Lord’s church.” The “Christian Church” was composed of apostates and they were worse than other sectarians for two reasons. In the first place they had known the truth, that is, had been identified with us, and had deliberately departed in an unmitigated and unquenchable desire to be like the denominations around them. In the second place, they were more like us in some respects than others were, and the counterfeit which is most like the original is always calculated to deceive the most people.

As factions began to increase and multiply due to introduction of other innovations, we regarded their rise as a fulfillment of prophecy. “In the latter days perilous times shall come. Men shall be lovers of their own selves.” “The Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times, some shall depart from the faith.” “Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived.” Our responsibility was fulfilled when we “marked and avoided” if we were in the majority, or heeded the admonition to “Come out from among them” if they happened to outnumber us. We attributed to “hardness of heart” such questions from sectarians as, “Which Church of Christ should I join?” One did not join the Lord’s church and if he could not tell the difference between the genuine church with sound doctrine and the spurious imitations he would probably be saved on the basis of his imbecility.

Now, in a more mature state of mind, I can see how inconsistent and sectarian was our whole approach to the majestic revelation of the kingdom of heaven. I am sure that we did not want to be arrogant, supercilious or intolerant. Certainly we always spoke disparagingly of the Pharisees in our lessons, although none of us ever equated their attitude with ours. We always thought of “the others” as being Pharisees. Others were contentious, but we were “contending for the faith;” they were stubborn while we were just steadfast; they were lax while we were loyal.

The party spirit plays strange tricks on one as do most of the other “works of the flesh.” It seeks always to hold you in as much of its grip as possible, knowing that so long as one is factional at all the tendency is to try and find security by building the wall higher. As one walls others out he walls himself in, and it is the one inside who is in prison. One must either break the hold of the party spirit completely or spend the rest of his life struggling for freedom while remaining in bondage. When I was a lad, before we had toxic poisons to spray for insects, we would place sheets of “Tanglefoot” in strategic places to ensnare flies. When a fly lighted on the sticky surface he immediately began to try and lift his feet. So long as one foot remained entangled his eventual death was certain, actually hastened by his efforts and activity.

It was difficult to ever arrive at that place where I could concede that the faction in which I had always been sheltered was not the body of Christ to the exclusion of all others. The mental struggle was intense, and heightened, as it always is, by the fear of being unfaithful to the memory of your dear ones whose struggle for righteousness led to the formation of the party, and to the instruction of godly men with whom you labored to promote and protect its interests. When I reached this stage of thought after long and bitter inner wrestling it was not so much the result of any prophetic foresight or insight, but more the result of projected hindsight. Many of us are like lightning-bugs. We have our headlights on the tail end and cannot see anything until we are already past it. A continued study led to the conviction that no party, splinter or segment of the restoration movement was the church of God in its fulness, and never has been.

This led to a re-evaluation of the restoration movement itself and finally I was led to the very basis upon which it was launched, and which caused me to see that the restoration movement was not the church. When I became convinced that the kingdom of heaven was greater than any one of our factions, greater than all of them put together, and more extensive than any “movement” in history since the one body was created, I was in a position to love brethren beyond our walls. It was a revelation to find that even while walls are still standing, love makes them transparent, and you can see right through them and behold your brother on the other side. It was even more startling to find that, while imbued with this spirit, you could walk right through walls which others still regarded as firm and opaque and associate freely with those in all of the segmented groups without fear of what might happen to you.

I think it is this attitude of not waiting for the walls to be torn down which troubles a lot of brethren. If I had simply forsaken those with whom I had always been aligned and moved over into another faction they would know exactly what to do about me. All partisans must “pigeonhole” others, and I just do not fit into any of the contemporary holes for I am no longer any group’s pigeon! This “pigeon-holing” is for the birds! It is not that I have renounced our faction but that I have renounced factionalism— the whole grimy, tainted, reeking mess, that presents a problem. We can tolerate a man who pays lipservice to being a Christian only but it is not easy to trust one who practices it.

I do not propose to leave the brethren I have always loved, and I do not ask any brother to leave where he is and come to me. I am not interested in forming an anti-party party or an anti-faction faction. I happen to know that all of our artificial walls existed in men’s hearts before they were constructed and they must be destroyed in our hearts before they will ever be removed otherwise. But nothing need serve as an impediment that is not in your own heart, and I have destroyed these walls in my heart. Having done this, I do not need to go anywhere else. I can stand where I am and see my brothers everywhere! And now, since I no longer see walls, but see only brethren, they are all in one body. It was our own jerry-built barriers which kept us from realizing this all of the time.

If it were not so serious it would be highly amusing to listen to brethren account for what has happened to me, even as we used to analyze and categorize others. Because I did not leave “our” faction and switch to “theirs” as practically everyone else in the past has done, it is difficult for them to see how I can be in the Lord’s church. The editors and philosophers among us always regard love for all of the saints of God as “liberalism” and it must be admitted that such love is much more liberal than a mere factional affection. They account for my willingness to regard all of God’s children as my brothers, not as an indication that the love of God is shed abroad in my heart by the Spirit, but rather as a sign that I have swung from one extreme to another.

Readers of periodicals are constantly reminded that I was once the champion of a narrow faction and that, in freeing myself, I have thrown all caution to the winds. The theory seems to be that if you grow up in a large orthodox faction you can probably always be trusted to remain somewhat factional, but if you grew up in a more restricted one you are liable to see farther when you get your eyes open. I doubt that it is any easier to get out of a small room than it is to get out of a big one if the house is on fire. I suspect that the gravest danger would be in losing your wits and running from one room to another in the mistaken idea that you had thus escaped danger. The thing that bothers my factional brothers is that when I jumped the fence I did not come down in their yard, but while up in the air and thus closer to heaven, I soared over all of the back fences.

But the party spirit is very subtle and I wonder if any of us will ever be completely purged from it. The “faithful church” fallacy constantly betrays us into trusting in our own righteousness and in appearing good in our own sight by contrast with others. No doubt at the end of the trail when we can stand on the heights and look back we will be amazed to see how winding and crooked is the path we have blazed and which we thought of as being so straight and direct. But we will have to await that time to prove it for none of us would be convinced of it now.

I can recall how we were always challenging the sects to debate and I rather think we felt less sting from our own shortcomings by revealing those of our neighbors. Perhaps we were not so much trying to prove to them that they were wrong as we were trying to convince ourselves that we were right. In other areas of the social realm one does not especially endear himself to thinking people nor demonstrate his own adjustment to life by going about with a chip always on his shoulder. Only a bully is expected to dare everyone for a fight and most bullies have been found to suffer from an acute inferiority complex. One who cannot meet people on their own level can always draw attention by picking a fight.

When propositions could not be signed on specific issues we could always drag one out which read, “The church with which I am identified is identical in origin, name, doctrine and practice, with the church of the New Testament.” There are several things wrong with such a proposition besides its manifestation of egotism, conceit and complacency. Of course the biggest factor is that it is just not true. Actually we were not defending the church at all but the party with which we were affiliated. Proof of this is found in the fact that representatives of two different factions of “The Church” would sign the same proposition and each labor arduously to prove that his faction was “it.”

The same spirit prompted such debates as motivated the brethren in one area where constant troubles arose and division resulted several times. A tourist driving down the highway saw a sign: "Church of Christ (Christian)." A mile or so further along the road he saw another building bearing the label: "Church of Christ (Vocal Music)." Still farther on he came upon one designated "Church of Christ (Old Paths)." But the fourth one simply read: "Church of Christ— This is it!"

In some cities as many as a dozen or fifteen different groups all calling themselves "Church of Christ" would affirm that they were identical with the church revealed in the new testament, but the members of one would not even call upon the members of any other to lead in prayer to God. One can imagine what distortions and contortions of the scriptures need to be indulged to "prove" all of them to be right, for no one has ever yet lost a debate. It is revealing indeed to read the reports of the same discussion in rival journals and to see how completely both opponents were swept from the forensic field and to note the solemn supposition of each that the other would never debate again while life lasts and the world stands.

As to our origin no one would want to question that the church of God began with the baptismal outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon Pentecost. However, "the Church of Christ" as we know it in the United States is the result of an early nineteenth century restoration movement launched by honest preachers of various sectarian groups, primarily the Presbyterian. They had no intention of starting "a church" and would probably not recognize what we now have as what they once envisioned. Those brethren who put "Established 33 A.D." on the cornerstone of their buildings, not only reveal a great deal of wishful thinking but also a considerable amount of confusion, since they cannot distinguish between the one body for which Jesus died and the restoration movement which ought to still be moving, seeing there are a lot of things which have not yet been restored.

Unprejudiced historians among us are fully aware that the distinctive title “Church of Christ” as used to designate that segment of the movement which does not employ instrumental music in corporate worship, does not date back beyond the 1906 religious census. Before that time it was used interchangeably with other designations. We do no harm by admitting that, as a separate group of people, we came into history as the result of a restoration effort. We do untold harm to ourselves and the cause we represent by perpetuating the myth that there is no difference between the church for which Christ died, and the particular “Church of Christ” in which we have always lived.

Only the ignorant and ill-informed think that we can trace an unbroken chain of “loyal disciples” back through the centuries to the apostles. There is no evidence that there was a congregation meeting anywhere behind a signboard reading “Church of Christ” when Thomas Campbell read the “Declaration and Address” in 1809. The purpose of Campbell and his associates was to inaugurate “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” It is a wee bit ridiculous to think that when this movement split the first time that all of God’s children in the sects flocked in from their varied parties to take their place with us and constitute that movement exclusively the one holy, catholic, and apostolic church of God upon earth.

It has been a chastening experience for some of us to learn that the primitive church had no name except a common noun. I once wrote a tract entitled, “Whose Name Shall the Bride Wear?” and circulated thousands of copies. I also used this as a theme in all of my meetings. You can imagine my chagrin when I suddenly realized that Christ is not the name of God’s Son. That is his office and “Jesus” is his name. Few of the brethren would be willing for the church to be designated as “Mrs. Jesus,” yet the expression “churches of Christ” simply indicates possession like the term “house of Simon” or “kingdom of God.”

The primitive saints were described in corporate fashion

by various terms indicating relationship. As to origin, they were the church of God; as to constituency, churches of the saints; and as to possession, churches of Christ. In relation to unity they were the body of Christ; as to government the kingdom of God; as to relationship the family of God; as to heirship the church of the firstborn ones whose names are inscribed in heaven. None of these were specific titles and to take any one of them and make it the exclusive designation is merely to sectarianize it. The term “church of Christ” does not once appear in the sacred scriptures. It is true that “churches of Christ” is found in Romans 16:16 as is “churches of the Gentiles” in 1 Corinthians 16:4, but one is no more the name of the church than the other.

Actually we have lifted the expression “church of Christ” and made of it a sectarian designation just as others have done with “church of God” and “church of the firstborn.” Such a sectarian usage is unscriptural and utterly unknown to the primitive community of the saints. We have done with this expression the very same thing we castigate others for doing with other expressions. The wresting of the scriptures essential to establishing the title “Church of Christ” as the name of the church ought to prove to every thinking person how shallow is such a contention.

To argue that we are identical in doctrine with the primitive saints also appears somewhat ridiculous in the light of our currently divided state and our sinful schisms. Among those who oppose instrumental music I personally know of divisions over centralized control, colleges, orphan homes, Herald of Truth, breaking the bread, individual cups, fermented wine, Bible classes, uninspired literature, the pastor system, present status of elders, marriage of divorced persons, foot washing, a head covering for women, the time when we should meet and interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy, to mention a few of the things. We are divided over everything from how to take the gospel to the heathen to how to pass the emblems to the saints.

Which group or segment is identical in doctrine with the scriptures? Each group will affirm that it alone is and will deny that all of the others are. In the absence of an infallible pope, who is going to identify the party with the exact identity? Obviously, thinking men will admit that all of us are imperfect and all have a lot to learn. When we become identical with the new covenant scriptures all study should cease at once. There will be no further scriptural research required for we will have arrived at an absolute knowledge of spiritual truth. All we will need to do is to parrot the discoveries already made and threaten those who propose to study beyond our creedal limitations.

Take for instance, the views related to the coming of our Lord. Which segment among us is identical in doctrine with the new covenant scriptures— the brethren who hold to the pre-millennial interpretation, or those who do not? That depends upon whom you ask, and the same is true of all of our other divisive elements. It would be far better to join with others in a mutual search for the truth, holding ourselves ready to accept all truth as it becomes clear to us, than to set ourselves up as the authorized dispensers of truth and the defenders of orthodoxy. We need to institute dialogue instead of encouraging debate.

So divergent are our practices that we make a spectacle of ourselves when we try to prove to the rest of the religious world that our procedures are all exactly like those of the primitive church. Who knows if Paul would speak over the “Herald of Truth” program and urge congregations to subscribe to it if he were living today? Who knows that he would sign a letter urging the congregations to raise a “Million for Manhattan” with which to build one big meetinghouse in New York City? Who knows if he would recommend the men we send to farflung mission fields to transport our divisions and schisms to pagan lands? Who knows if Paul would authorize a seminary for training “Ministers” or set up a charitable organization to care for the needy?

We are not now arguing the right or wrong of these actions and procedures. We are simply saying that our “practice” in many regards cannot be found in the account of the primitive church. Our authority for it lies not in the word of God but in our deductions from the word of God. It is not the revelation given by heaven but our interpretation of that revelation upon which we rely. We err in judgment when we devise means and then seek to find a parallel for them in the early church. It is not certain that some aspects about which we are most dogmatic have as clear a mandate in the written word as they do in our own minds. We are all victims of tradition and find it easier to think as we have been conditioned to think!

I am not at all averse to denying that the party with which I am identified is not identical in every particular with the church mentioned in the covenant scriptures. I doubt that it is identical in any particular. Because we are restoration-minded we are seeking to recapture and imitate the spirit which animated the holy apostles but we have not yet arrived. I do not think we will arrive during my lifetime. Once that would have worried and frightened me, but it no longer does. I do not rest my hope of eternal life on being a member of a perfect congregation or upon living a perfect life. I rest it upon my relationship to a perfect Savior. Praise His name! So while we have not attained to the ideal and will not do so in the flesh, we keep pressing toward it while we keep on trusting in Him for our salvation.

I can lay no claim to being a prophet, but I do venture to predict that we stand upon the verge of our greatest and most effective witness as a people. It will not come because of our attempt to prove that we are identical with the primitive church in origin, name, doctrine and practice. It will come because we are willing to recognize that this is not so, and that we also, like others, are only striving toward the goal. As we lose our party arrogance and come to feel a deep love for the scattered flock of God, we will find that the Holy Spirit can more effectively use us and we will be able to gather the grain into the granary!

Spiritual Insight

Mission Messenger (July 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

It becomes ever more apparent that there is a conflict between brethren as to the relationship of the Holy Spirit to the written word. The problem does not concern the Spirit as an agent of transmission, for all those of whom we speak are agreed that the scriptures contain the revelation of God's will to man, and that "holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." The question relates to the present relationship of the Spirit to the revelation appearing within the sacred canon.

On one side are those who feel that, once the scriptures were completed, the Holy Spirit withdrew into the background as an impartial observer whose task has been completed and whose only interest now is to see what others will do with what he has supplied. These regard the Spirit as in the same category with a truck driver who deposits a load of bricks on a building site and then parks under a shade tree across the street to see what kind of an edifice the builders will erect.

At the other extreme (and I do not like the word) are those who imply, or so it seems, that the Spirit will reveal new truths unto them if they earnestly pray to the Father and seek His will. These think of the Spirit as a kind of mystical Western Union messenger who conveys to their inner consciousness the decision of heaven regarding their immediate and pressing points and problems. In between these two schools of thought are thousands who know little of the revealed word and less about the Spirit, and who are milling about with no particular conviction on the subject. We do not think the matter should be ignored.

The danger in the two terminal concepts to which we have referred is the same— both of them oversimplify the situation. One makes the ascertainment of the divine will a mere human exercise in linguistics; the other makes it a divine involvement in every human enigma. Both seem to be derogatory of God, the first by elevation of man, the second by depreciation of divinity. I am not unaware that the gap may appear wider than it is and much of it may rest in the field of semantics. If we were able to communicate properly we might find that we had been shouting at each other across a chasm that we could jump over if it were not for the fact that we view each other through partisan telescopes held in reverse and which make others appear farther off than they really are.

With the kind indulgence of our readers I should like to share a few of my views with the understanding that I do not write dogmatically and will revere and respect as my brothers in Christ Jesus those who cannot concur in what I say.

1. God has revealed to us through the Spirit those things which could not be ascertained by sight, hearing, or rational processes (1 Cor. 2:9, 10). These things were “revealed by inspiration to his dedicated apostles and prophets” (Eph. 3:5). One of these declared, “We speak of these gifts of God in words found for us not by human wisdom but by the Spirit” (1 Cor. 2:13).

2. The Holy Spirit is as interested that we grasp the significance of the words of inspiration as that we have them. He has not “thrown the book at us” and retired from the scene, but He dwells in us for good. “Do you not know that your body is a shrine of the indwelling Holy Spirit and the Spirit is God’s gift to you?” (1 Cor. 6:19). “To prove that you are sons, God has sent into our hearts the Spirit of his Son” (Gal. 4:6).

3. It is essential that, as we mature, we develop “the gift of true discrimination.” This enables us to distinguish between things that differ. It provides us with a proper sense of values. It is a gift of love that has become enriched by knowledge and insight. “And this is my prayer, that your love may grow ever richer in knowledge and insight of every kind, and may thus bring you the gift of true discrimination” (Phil. 1:9, 10). “We ask God that you may receive from him all wisdom and spiritual understanding for full insight into his will” (Col. 1:9). There is a difference between the written word and insight into the will of God about which the apostle wrote in that word.

4. We hold that the will of God has been revealed for this age. The last apostle closed his testimony with the words, “Come, Lord Jesus,” and nothing will be added to it until Jesus comes. The next time the voice of the Lord is heard will be when “the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout.” But man has not yet learned all there is to know about the revelation of God. There are unplumbed depths and unscaled heights. It is as appropriate for us to pray for “insight of every kind” as it was for Paul to write the prayer. And the Holy Spirit who “strengthens the inner man” and is our “Helper” will aid us in arriving at such insight into the will of God.

5. It is our conviction that the Spirit of God will not provide us with additional revelation. Revelation is exposure. The mind of God has been exposed and His will disclosed. Revelation is the uncovering for man by God that which man could not discover for himself. While the revelation is for all men, it was not to all men. It was to his “dedicated apostles and prophets.” Our insight into His will must come through His revelation to them.

6. It is also our conviction that insight comes from application of the mental faculties to truth and not from the application of truth to the mental faculties. Insight is penetration and it is not achieved by dumping ideas on the mind independent of the will, but by digging into ideas as an act of the will. The Holy Spirit does not impose the divine will on the mind but infuses the mind into the divine will. If the first were the case, every person would have the same degree of knowledge regardless of aptitude or ability. It is obvious that no two persons have the same capabilities, but when men are completely and unreservedly surrendered to the Spirit they may be led to insights to the extent of their personal abilities to grasp and utilize divine truth. We can be led only as far as we are able to go.

7. God respects the sovereignty of the human will and does not violate its prerogative by arbitrary imposition of the divine will upon it. Our insight into His will is conditioned upon our own willingness. “Whoever has the will to do the will of God shall know whether my teaching comes from him or is merely my own” (John 7:17). The Holy Spirit will exercise power over our hearts but will not overpower them. He will not commit His power to those who are not committed unto Him.

8. The depth of penetration or insight to be achieved at a given time is always conditioned upon a willingness to use to the fullest that which has already been attained. “Let us then keep to this way of thinking, those of us who are mature. If there is any point on which you think differently, this also God will make plain to you. Only let our conduct be consistent with the level we have already reached” (Phil. 3:15, 16). When one becomes reluctant to gain greater insight because of fear of the party or because of external pressures his growth halts at that point. We cannot live today on the level of yesterday. One cannot mine precious ore by allowing his drill to spin ceaselessly at the same depth. He can never attain the summit of a mountain by pacing back and forth in his tracks at the same level.

9. We do not gain insight at the same rate of speed. Each individual is different. The Holy Spirit furnishes the power and drive but our mental perceptions are the machines and He must use us as we are. All of us have been conditioned by environment and previous training. Some are dull, others sharp; some are blunt, others keen; some are ignorant and others educated. We cannot measure others by ourselves nor compare ourselves among ourselves. Our hope of eternal life is not conditioned on keeping up with each other but upon keeping hold of Christ. We are not saved by knowledge but by faith. Still it remains that we are sharpened by contact with the Rock and the mental friction we endure makes the task easier day by day. We grow in grace as well as in knowledge of the truth.

10. It is apparent that many have been impoverished because they have never learned the meaning of the divine statement, "If the Spirit is the source of our life, let the Spirit also direct our course" (Gal. 5:25). Those who approach the new covenant scriptures as a legalistic code will soon become lawyers; those who approach them as love letters from a kind Father will soon become lovers. The Holy Spirit cannot aid those who are spiritual lawyers, for the record says, "But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under law." The fruits of the Spirit are borne in a realm which operates above law. "There is no law dealing with such things as these" (Gal. 5:23). Those who operate on the royal principle of love will be aided to insights which will transform their whole lives.

We realize that there are those who scoff at the idea of any aid rendered by the Holy Spirit. Smug and complacent as they wave their copy of the book in the air, they are content to believe that they have no further need of the Spirit. There are no depths beyond their human reasoning, no heights they have not scanned, no breadth beyond their reach. We would not deprecate the study of the sacred oracles for here the Father reveals His will. But many a man carries a Bible in his pocket who does not have Jesus in his heart. It would be a tragedy for a young man to become so enamored of the letters from his sweetheart that he transferred his love for her to what she wrote. Eternal life does not rest in knowing the scriptures but in knowing Jesus. He said, “You search the scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life . . . but you will not come to me that you might have life.”

In this age of crisis we need to penetrate deeper and deeper into the life of Jesus. Under the impetus of the indwelling Spirit we must allow our hearts and lives to be involved in the spiritual until previously undiscovered truths burst upon our hearts with enlightenment that will permit exploration into treasures of wisdom and glory we have never before realized. Passages we have read and explained will glow with new meaning. Answers for our own lives and those of others will be found in unexpected places. Passages which once appeared in a shadow will be revealed in brightness. We do not need a new revelation. We do need a revolution in our hearts and lives created by new insights into the will of God.

The Rim of the Wheel

Mission Messenger (July 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

It is in our nature, I think, to seek for simple illustrations with which to explain those things which we cannot really define. Perhaps the word “explain” is a poor choice. We generally use it in the sense of making something clear to others. Actually, we are striving to understand, and that which we understand we do not so much explain, as we share our understanding with others. Our feet are still fast in the clay even as our minds roam among the clouds, and while we are heaven bound, we are still “earthbound.” In this state of things the metaphors, similes, and parables, which we use to try and capture the signification of heavenly attributes are always inadequate. The nearer to heaven we approach, the more inadequate do they seem, and when at last we reach the goal, we will find that the things we here regarded as intangible are the only tangibles, and that which we could not define is the only reality.

For this reason, you will pardon my apparent childishness, when I tell you that in my meditation upon the relationship of persons and things in the divine plan and purpose, my mind always reverts to the figure of a wheel. I suspect this is because I realize that a wheel derives its strength from both its center and its circumference. The spokes are drawn together at a common focal point, the hub, and they are closer together there than at any other point. But they are held together by the rim, and this circumscribes the length to which they may extend. They are widely divergent at the rim, but this very divergency when properly confined is what gives strength to the whole.

The hub represents faith in Christ Jesus, that point at which we surrender self and become one in him. We are fastened together not by mutual attraction for each other but by our universal need for a Savior. At this juncture, “there is no difference, for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God” (Rom. 3:22, 23). It is only because the spokes are incorporated in the hub that they sustain any relationship whatsoever to one another. They may previously have come from a dozen trees in a dozen scattered forests. They are one only because they have been brought together by a power greater than their own. Without the exercise of this power upon them they would have continued in their natural state.

The rim is love, the only factor which makes it possible for us to work together as a unit without flying apart. A rim serves three purposes. It holds the spokes in, holds them together and holds them apart. Love fulfills the same functions. It holds us to Christ at the point of greatest stress and weakest power. It binds us all together and makes possible a working unity in which each contributes a part. It also holds us apart, preserving our individuality and diversity so that the full benefit can accrue to the body. “To crown all there must be love, to bind all together and complete the whole” (Col. 3:14). Let me apologize again for the poverty of such an illustration to portray the richness of faith and love. Forgive me, if like Ezekiel, “As I looked . . . I saw a wheel” (1:15).

The Inaugural Address

Mission Messenger (July 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

The term “kingdom of heaven” does not generally refer to a place or a people under the rule of a sovereign. This is demonstrated in the message of both John and Jesus who urged people to reform because the kingdom was then approaching. We may draw near to a place but it is not good form to speak of a place or territory coming to us. The kingdom of heaven is the rule of heaven. In the new covenant regime it is that rule exercised by the Son of God. Since it is the rule of God’s anointed, the kingdom in which it is our good fortune to be citizens is a Christocracy.

The inception of the kingdom was not the birth of the Prince of peace but his coronation. This event took place in heaven where the throne room is located. The first official act was to dispatch the Holy Spirit to waiting envoys in Jerusalem who had been previously called, qualified and commissioned. The arrival of the Spirit was a divine signal for them to begin their mission of summoning aliens to enroll as citizens under the banner of the newly-crowned King.

The annunciation of the coronation was made by a former fisherman, Simon Peter, who had been given the keys to the kingdom when he had previously properly identified the person and office of the King. In his inaugural address, with the guidance of the Spirit, Peter defined the nature of the kingdom by specifying those materials essential to its constitution. In doing this he gave notice that a new dispensation had begun, of which all previous ages and dispensations were but tributaries. This address, delivered as it was at the commencement of the Reign, must constitute the touchstone by which the Kingdom is to be measured in all ages.

It is noteworthy that the rule of heaven over its citizens is not exercised upon the basis of a speculative philosophy or ideology. It is not their understanding of, nor subscription to a compilation of opinions or a written code or creed, that makes them worthy. The materials of Christianity are simply seven facts. These were announced on the natal day of the Christocracy and the acceptance of these, and these alone, by assurance derived from the testimony and immersion of the believers, constituted as citizens those who submitted and committed their lives and fortunes to the King.

The seven pillars upon which the Christian economy rests are the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, glorification and coronation of Jesus as the Lord of all. These constitute the faith— the one faith— in which we must stand because upon them the Kingdom rests. In his opening speech Peter announced these astounding and earth-shaking facts. His demand growing out of them was that his hearers should know assuredly that God had Christed (anointed) as Lord the same Jesus whom they had crucified.

Those who accepted these facts, accepted the faith. They were immediately admitted as citizens when they submitted to the initiation ceremony of baptism. The seal of their acceptance was the indwelling Spirit who would act as a guarantee of their inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, i.e., the resurrection of the body from the grave.

Those who embraced the faith might become careless or indifferent about their citizenship responsibilities, they might require correction and chastisement, but such instruction and reproof would no more be a part of the one faith, than bread provided for our fleshly children or punishment administered to them are a part of the birth process. Until we can distinguish between that which begets us and that which sustains us we will confuse aliens and confound the saints.

Preaching the Word in Writing

Mission Messenger (August 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Address delivered at North American Christian Convention, July 10, 1964

Someone has offered the sage observation that by the time a writer discovers he has no talent for literature, he is too successful to give it up. It was Will Rogers, the homely humorist from Claremore, Oklahoma, who said, “In Hollywood the woods are full of people who learned to write but evidently can’t read. If they could read their stuff, they’d quit writing.”

In spite of the intellectual garbish which, in our day, is rescued from the trash can, and garnished with the recommendation of the huckster, to be served up as literature on the dining tables of the sophisticated, I still rejoice in the power of the pen. Not every typewriter is employed as a tripewriter!

It was a memorable day in the history of man when he began to use visible symbols of his ideas to augment those that were merely oral and audible. Eventually it would come to mean three things— that the ideas could be projected, perpetuated and perfected. The spoken word depended for its outreach upon two things, the number of hearers within the auditory range created by the volume of the speaker and the memory of those who heard. Both had their limitations. But the written message could be carried to the remotest part of the universe and affect the lives of those who never saw its creator.

Moreover, the ideas would survive on earth the intellect which conceived them and gave them birth. Long after the fingers which wrote them down had crumbled to dust in some forgotten sepulcher, the thoughts which fired a now slumbering brain would again burst into flame in the intellect of another reader, and resume their impact in halls of parliament, or perhaps in the homes of the lowly.

Each succeeding generation could build its aspiring structure upon the foundation of previously discovered truth. The deductions of a century ago, or of ten centuries past, could be scrutinized, analyzed and criticized. Fallacies could be detected, flaws could be eliminated, and facts could be re-asserted. The accumulative wisdom of the ages would not only fill libraries with books but would also fill lives with hope.

Those of us who are assembled in this great auditorium owe a special debt to the art of writing. We are the heirs in succession of a noble movement motivated by a salient ideal. Sired by a yearning for rest amidst the turmoil of religious confusion, born into a world grown weary with bickering over creeds, and rocked in the cradle of American liberty by the hand of freedom of speech, this movement gave promise of answering at least in the new world the plea of the Saviour for unity in the whole world. And it received its impetus from writing—unsurpassed and unparalleled in its day.

Alexander Campbell launched the Christian Baptist on August 3, 1823. The first paragraph read, "Christianity is the perfection of that divine philanthropy which was gradually developing itself for four thousand years. It is the bright effulgence of every divine attribute, mingling and harmonizing, as the different colors of the rainbow, in the bright shining after rain, into one complete system of perfections—the perfection of glory to God in the highest heaven, the perfection of peace on earth, and the perfection of good will among men.”

Dipping his trenchant quill in the inky fluid, he attacked the abuses of the religious Establishment of his era. He punctured the proud pretensions of a presumptuous priestcraft, indicted the insinuations of insolent institutionalism, and deflated the swollen corpse of creedal confessionalism which had long since deceased but which was still enshrined and thought to be alive because of the whispering and murmuring of those theological divines who sought refuge behind it.

In a short time this periodical had the greatest circulation of any religious journal on the American frontier. It was read by successive presidents of the United States. It was a part of the literary diet of many of the most eminent congressmen. But, even more important, it was read by shopkeepers and artisans in every village and hamlet and it became the topic of conversation in log cabins erected in remote clearings in the dense forests which covered the land. Soon other papers began to be published by advocates of the restoration principle and the citadel of sectarianism trembled upon its insecure and unscriptural foundation.

What has happened to this once virile movement to curb its creativity and to make it founder in the literary doldrums? That a transformation has taken place there can be no denial. Not only are we not producing the kind of writing which penetrates the hard crust of contemporary society, but many of those who pay lipservice to the prophets of restoration and garnish their tombs, refuse to be drawn from the crass, cruel and childish portrayals on their television screens to read anything which will make them think. One of the most common apologies we hear is, “Our brethren are just not readers.” One of our own psychologists has said, “We have produced very little worth reading for a good many decades and there is no indication we will do so for a long time to come.” It is not difficult for the world to keep down those who do not keep up!

I would like to face up frankly to our current dearth of challenging composition and to the manuscripts of mediocrity which attempt with such little success to fill the vacuum. What forces or factors have combined to stifle suggestions at their source and to inhibit imagination in its inception? Why is the pitcher of thought broken at the fountain, or the wheel of meditation broken at the cistern, so that we have nothing with which to draw from the depths and no container in which to retain even that which is skimmed from the surface?

My reply is simply that, as a people, we have lost our original reason for existence. We have ceased to be a movement in history and have become a monument to it. We praise pioneers whom we would not allow to preach from our pulpits if they were present. We parrot party slogans which we make little pretense of practicing. We give lip-homage to restoration when we really practice retroaction. Our literary status is a reflection of our spiritual stature. We write little because we think small. Only free men can write freely and we are no longer free. We are victims of a tragedy which struck a hundred years ago, and the fears and frights which it engendered linger to haunt and harass us to this very day!

When our fathers were faced with the problem of what they were pleased to call innovations they were forced to make a decision as to how to meet the problem. I need not remind you that they chose division. I shall not here assess the right or wrong of those things which created the problem, nor shall I attempt to fasten the blame for the result upon one side or the other. It is possible, and even probable, that the attitudes of all contributed to the ultimate disaster.

I am concerned, however, with the far-reaching effect of the division, and its relation to my subject of the hour. As I view it in retrospect, and in the light of our contemporary corporate life, it seems to me there are three tragic results which have accrued from our initial division.

1. We rendered our plea for the unity of all believers impotent and ineffective, and laid the foundation by which it would be regarded as a sham and pretence by the remainder of the religious world. If there is not a sufficient dynamic magnetism in a principle to hold together those who exist to promote unity, upon what ground can it be assumed that it contains the power to draw together those of other dissident groups? And to which of our parties will they have to be drawn to be united with Him who declared, "I will draw all men unto me."

2. We were betrayed into adoption of the fallacious philosophy that purity of doctrine can only be preserved by separation from brethren, and that differences among the children of the divine family can only be solved by breaking up the family relationship. We have proven far more faithful to that philosophy than we have to the prayer of our Saviour and our attempted implementation of it leaves us today one of the most estranged and divided movements in the whole American religious spectrum.

3. We became inoculated with the deadly virus of the party spirit and often devoted our energies and resources more to the promotion of parochial rivalry than to proclamation of the universal gospel. Our heroes became the forensic champions and debaters. We gloried in gladiators who could justify our position. Our unwritten creeds became the criteria by which faithfulness to God was measured. We set up our Procrustean beds of conformity on every highway and stretched or shrunk men to our own dimensions. And even at this very hour many are more interested in creating and projecting a party image than they are in conforming to the divine image.

The word "ought" is made up of the last five letters of "thought," and the word "ink" is composed of the last three letters of "think," and what one ought to reproduce in ink he must first produce in thought. No message will ever come from the typewriter which did not first come to the heart. The best writing fluid is not a bottle filled with ink but a heart bathed with tears. It was Longfellow who said in his Voices of the Night, "Look, then, into thy heart and write." The thing that makes so much modern writing hopeless is that it is heartless!

As the bed of a stream can become choked by the accumulating sediment and debris carried by its own waters so the current of religious thought can be dammed up by the traditions and partisan interpretations borne along from one generation to another. In both cases stagnation is the result and the green scum of neglect and decay gives little evidence of the torpid flow beneath, within the turgid and murky depths. When the lumberjacks of the north send their freight of timber down a swollen, frothing river, it is essential that a clear channel be maintained. If a jam results and the logs pile up like jackstraws so they cannot be unscrambled with pike poles, it is frequently necessary to resort to dynamite to free them for further unhampered journey to their destination. Perhaps all of us within the restoration movement framework need to be jolted from our complacency so we can get on with the task of helping "to unite the Christians in all of the sects."

When the restoration plea was first enunciated the religious world was hardly ready for it. But a great change has been wrought in a century and a half. Now, faced with fears within and foes without, in a rapidly shrinking universe, the consciousness of all who love Jesus has been impregnated with the conviction that we dare no longer advance partisanship at the expense of peace. The same sectarianism which was defended as harmless, and even helpful, diversity in the nineteenth century is indicted as the scandal of our own generation. The maturing vision of mankind has made possible for us a rendezvous with destiny.

If our plea was launched upon the sea of human thought in the days of sailing ships by writing, it can be placed in orbit in the space age by the same medium. But that writing must be relevant. It must command and hold the attention of those who live now. We do not live in the day when Alexander Campbell stood at the type case in the little printing shop on the banks of Buffalo Creek, laboriously setting type by hand. We have at our command great machines which can do in minutes what men once required hours, and even days, to accomplish. But machines cannot think, and what we think will determine what we write, what others read, and what they in turn, are inspired to think.

Centuries ago, the Roman poet Horace, said, “Knowledge is the foundation and source of good writing.” Let me suggest what I believe to be some essential component elements in that foundation of knowledge.

1. We must know the only true God and Jesus Christ whom He has sent. And we must know how to present them to a society distracted by the discord of alien voices and the clamor of strange tongues in the very temple dedicated to God. Ecclesiasticism and clericalism, like all closed-door professions, have developed their own exclusivistic vocabulary. Cleverly concealed behind innocent-appearing verbiage the hand of the assassin is perpetually poised with pen of poison to stab faith dead at our feet while appearing as a benefactor to an age of intellectualism.

For example, three times I have read “Honest to God,” by John A. T. Robinson, Bishop of Woolwich. Each time I have been more convinced it is incorrectly titled. He should have called it “Honest to John.” I have no right to question that it is a fair statement of the opinion of the bishop, but in my opinion there is a real question of whether the statement is fair to God. In his attempt to get rid of God “up there” he has also created a vacuum “down here” and “in here,” leaving a burning world and a yearning heart groping for a guide and grasping for a guardian.

Twice I have read, "The Depth of Existence," by Paul Tillich, in which he suggests you may need to forget "everything traditional that you have learned about God, perhaps even that word itself." I have studied his thesis that God is simply "the ground of our being" instead of the Being who brought us from the ground. And I cannot escape the dread feeling that we are being made unwilling spectators as the Son of God is crucified afresh and subjected to open shame. Our method of crucifixion may be more refined than that of crude barbarians but the linguistic thorns are just as sharp as the acanthus thorns, and the literary nails are just as cruel as the literal nails of yesterday. Remember that it is the same Christ who is under attack. And as I see the ragged rents and jagged wounds I want to banish my doubts as did Thomas of old and fall at his feet crying, "My Lord, and my God."

2. We must know the regal visitor from heaven who dwells with us as a constant source of strength to the inner man. Not a holy ghost, but the holy guest, the Spirit who abides with us during the absence of our King is moving us with relentless certainty toward the fruition of the eternal purpose and the fulfillment of the divine plan. When this royal tenant inhabits our frail tenement of clay we have at our command the rich resources of creative energy which formed the universe.

It might be startling for us to realize how many periods of dearth in our achievement come from quenching the Spirit. Perhaps we shall never know what a toll has been exacted of the movement of which we are heirs because our evasion of extremism and fear of fanaticism drove us to deny the presence of the Spirit or to confuse Him with His message. Legalism supplanted love as the basis of our relationship with the Father. Spirituality gave way to sterility and vitality to the invalidism of division and dissension.

It is the Holy Spirit who seals us unto the day of redemption. It is the Holy Spirit who is our guarantee of the inheritance at the redemption of the purchased possession. It is the Holy Spirit who enables us to call God our Father. It is the Holy Spirit who helps our infirmities. It is the Holy Spirit who crucifies the deeds of the flesh. It is the Holy Spirit who strengthens us with might inwardly. Can we ignore His influence or minimize His motivation and still produce those fruits in life or literature which will endure against the ravages of time? Can we expect help from any other source to be as powerful as that which can come from the Helper whom Jesus sent to abide with us in His stead?

The kingdom of heaven does not move by machinery and is not propelled by paraphernalia. Its ministers are not expected to be engineers nor its servants mechanics. We are so involved in the intricacies of our inventions, so wrapped up in ways and means, and so consecrated to our contrivances and appliances, that we exhaust our energy keeping all of the gears lubricated. Yet most of our strongest areas owe their existence to a few humble Spirit-filled men who went forth with meager means but with unfailing fidelity to the Cause and conquered because of their trust in God rather than in gimmicks. It is possible that we have been betrayed into deserting the world of the Spirit for the spirit of the world.

3. We must know the revelation of God for no one can preach the word of God in writing who does not know what is written in the word of God. For one who would disclose the will of God the supreme school for study is the sacred scriptures. He may be versed in all the subtle nuances of theology, be conversant with texts on comparative religions, and have a healthy familiarity with hermeneutics, but if he is ignorant of the Word, he will serve only to confuse and confound, rather than to conduct men in paths of righteousness.

It is essential that men read the Bible. We are being exposed to a generation of teachers who have read a library of books about the Bible but seldom read the Book of books. One can no more feed his soul by reading about the scriptures than he can feed his body by reading cookbooks. One does not become an expert in the use of weapons merely by reading magazine articles about them but by practice in their use. You cannot fight the devil by swatting him with magazine articles. Only the sword of the Spirit is effective to this end.

It is important that you receive the right word but it is just as important that you receive it in the right way. There is a statement made by Paul to the Thessalonians which needs to be repeated again and again in our modern society. “We thank God continually, because when we handed on God’s message, you received it, not as the word of men, but as what it truly is, the very word of God at work in you who hold the faith.”

There are two grave errors that men can commit. One is to accept the word of men as the word of God. This is the mistake of the followers of Joseph Smith, Mary Baker Eddy and Ellen G. White. The other is to accept the word of God as the word of men. This is the sin of miscalled “liberals” who regard the Bible as a mere product of the times.

The first of these open a gate to false roads, the others close the gate to the right road. The first enthrone human wisdom, the second dethrone divine wisdom. We do not object to unbelievers examining the Bible. We do object to them posing as believers when they write about it. We would not curtail the right of free speech for any unbeliever. We do affirm that all such are dishonest when they parade in the pulpits as gospel proclaimers. It is a poor surgeon whose only remedy for an ailing body is to cut the heart out of it. One should not be received as a good citizen who brands the ruling monarch as a deceiver and usurper. There is room for those who do not believe in the divinity of Christ to be tolerated in the world, but there is no place for them to be received or retained in a society that is founded upon faith in the confession that he is the Christ, the Son of God. Potatoes may be all right in the dirt but I shall object strenuously if anyone insists upon putting dirt in my potatoes.

We need men with the pen of a ready scribe to present the message of salvation to a neo-pagan world. There is need for historians who can record the unfolding drama of world events with due regard for the fact that our God is a history-making God. This means that there is no such thing as an unrelated event. The same power which spoke the universe into existence sustains and perpetuates it with providential guidance. The attempt to rule God out of the world He has made is a conspiracy of literary blackmail and blasphemy which should be revealed in its true light.

We need writers of prose with the dramatic touch, men and women who can make use of all of the facets of human emotionalism, and employ the fascination of suspense and mystery without degrading their characters or maligning religion. The best-sellers have wallowed in filth and slime and muck long enough. The nauseating portrayals of perversion and deviation need to be countered with the ennobling view of sex as an expression of love and not a gratification of lust. There is a crying need for those who can tell a story without crawling and groveling in the gutter, and who can do it without using language borrowed or stolen from dope dives or jive joints.

We need playwrights who can construct scenes of normal behavior which will touch the emotions. The strings of the heart need to vibrate once again with honest humor and sincere sorrow. We need to rejoice with those who rejoice and weep with those who weep. There is drama in the simple virtues of faith, hope and love. We need an antidote for the malignancies which eat at the heart of our civilization today. The soul must be turned back toward its Creator.

We need poets who can pluck a melody out of the air and set our inner beings to pulsating and throbbing with the pure rhythm that is unforgettable and which helps us by day and haunts our dreams by night. We live in a sordid world. Our spirits are constantly exposed to the friction with an alien clime. We are strangers and pilgrims on the earth. We need to feel that we are heaven bound even while we are “earthbound.”

We need commentators who can make the word come alive for our day. We need expositors and expounders who do not supplant the Spirit but supply an understanding of His language. When men can delve into the background, dig into forgotten treasure-troves, dip into the depths of history, and share with us those insights which make our own outlook brighter, they serve a great purpose in our generation. God’s word is perfect; there is nothing more to be said. Our knowledge of revelation is imperfect; there is much more to be learned by all of us. We should welcome any assistance that we can get.

We need men of courage and ability to storm and recapture the surrendered bastions of literature. We have abandoned as lost provinces such fields as science, higher education, and literature. We need to regain them all with well-planned strategy. Almost every major journal in our country was once slanted in the direction of faith and morality. Those which have abandoned their previous commitment to pander to the perverted tastes of a secularistic society are testimonies of the weakness of adulterated Christianity. It is good to write to our safe and sound “brotherhood periodicals” and exchange thoughts with each other, but these do not reach the masses and we keep pouring in prescriptions to the well, while the sick get sicker. Let us take advantage of forums, letter columns and every other means available to us, to bear witness of our faith that right makes might, and not the reverse.

In books and brochures, in tracts and treatises, in papers and pamphlets, in articles and apologies, let us send forth the Message. It has been said that the printing press is the modern gift of tongues. Through this medium we can cover the world of printed language with the word of life. We can sow the seed over the face of the whole earth and place in the hands of men that which will give them a new lease upon life today and a new hope for life tomorrow.

Let us employ the finest techniques available through scientific research to impress upon the minds of men the provisions of a gracious God for their salvation. Let us bring into useful subjection to our Lord every legitimate skill of those who love him, every discovery of our age which is also the age of the Spirit. We do not exhibit our faith by allowing Satan to capture the media of communication by our default, nor by concluding that the servants of God must ride in carriages while the emissaries of Satan travel by Jet-powered planes. We are not called to fight television, but sin! Our task is not to ignore the press, nor to destroy radio and television from the earth, but to make them tributaries of the King, so that “the whole earth shall be full of the glory of God.”

In these days of crises we need that prophetic vision which looks beyond the present with its strife and turmoil and sees the future with its eternal peace and tranquility. And, if it becomes our lot to share some lonely Patmos, free from the clamor of those who would stifle our message of hope to frustrated humanity, may we refuse to be silenced, but in the words of the banished seer of yesteryear, say, “And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write!”

The Ultimate Conquest

Mission Messenger (August 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Michael could see the geardee, for though he was invisible to mortal eyes, the celestial beings are not limited by time or space. As the prince assigned to direct the affairs of HIS people during their earth span, Michael was interested in every move of the geardee. He knew his diabolical cunning, intensified by a supernatural knowledge of those motivations which make intelligent beings act, whether in heaven or upon earth. And Michael knew, as the geardee knew, that pride was the most universal of all the forces which drive those beings who can choose.

The war was not over between Michael and the geardee. It had only been transferred from one site to another. The feeling was unabated. The wrath was not assuaged. And it never would be until the geardee was confined to his ultimate fate in the Lake. This was what the mortals called it because they had no real concept of it and thus no words to designate it or adequately describe it. There were a lot of things the mortals could not grasp. And not the least of these was the truth that they were the pawns, and therefore, the victims of the war which raged back and forth across Esoteris, that portion of the universe so well known to angels and demons, but hidden from the eyes of the dust-born.

It is true that the mortals were not always the stake in the conflict. The war began before HE made the first image. The initial battle was fought in Ouranos and at that time it was the Right Hand which was the goal of conquest. The strife was not wholly unexpected. For a long time (to speak after the manner of mortals) a subtle transformation was observable in one of the seraphs. Others of the Messengers were visibly affected. Then the Challenge was issued. The Prince demanded the privilege of occupying the Right Hand. He was informed that it was reserved for Logos. The Prince was enraged and declared a state of war.

With this pronouncement HE fixed his eyes upon him. In the full light of HIS eyes only Truth can prevail. All sham, all pretence, all unreality melts away because Truth is Reality—naked and open! Suddenly the Prince was seen to be what he had become— the geardee— hideous and horrifying. Michael and his Messengers fought against the geardee and his Messengers. All of the combatants fully understood that there could never be a truce. They knew, too, what the outcome must be. There was no Separation such as thanatos, which only the mortals can experience. The Separation for Messengers is banishment from Ouranos in full knowledge that this is irrevocable and aeonian. The geardee and his Messengers were finally driven to the very edge of Celestia and with one final thrust were thrown over the Precipice.

When the Pneuma brought order out of the Chaos, the geardee resolved to capture this domain for himself. When HE made the first image, and then made a counterpart for him from part of his own person, the geardee heard with interest that the image was given dominion over all the Order. He could gain control and wrest the power from HIM merely by seducing the two images. And he knew the proper appeal to achieve his end. Possessed of the power of morpheo, by which he could transform himself into any shape, he appeared upright, brilliant and scintillating, going first to the secondary image. The task was easier than he had anticipated. And the images were cast out of Paradisia as he had been thrown out of Celestia.

Thereupon, the geardee took possession of Atmos, the sphere surrounding the Earth. And he proclaimed his sovereignty as prince. From this region he proposed to govern the images and thus to defeat HIS purpose. But he reckoned without the principle of Agape, a force of which he knew nothing. When he became aware that HE was manifesting Agape toward the images, even in their degenerate condition, and that HE had promised them that it would culminate in Logos sharing their estate, to rescue them from the power of the geardee, he set about immediately to thwart the coming of Logos.

His chief weapon was thanatos. By this the pneuma (the conscious) could be separated from the soma (the substance) and the image be rendered incapable of performing any function, especially that which resulted in reproduction. To the delight of the geardee HE narrowed the field by limiting the coming of Logos to one family strain. This meant that the geardee could concentrate his efforts on disintegration of this one line while satisfied that the remainder of the images would be under his dominant control. He carried on the campaign to eliminate the succession smoothly and efficiently. Once by clever manipulation of thanatos he had reduced the possibility to one tiny infant, and another time to one man upon whom HE pronounced thanatos despite the fact there would be no descendants. But each time he was defeated by Agape. In the first case an aunt stole the infant away and he was preserved by some priests. In the second instance the subject humbled himself so abjectly that HE granted a fifteen year respite from thanatos. And during this period of reprieve a son was born.

When Gabriel passed through his realm, disdainful of his authority, the geardee knew that the battle to keep Logos from sharing with the images was a lost cause. He hated Gabriel because he had spurned him when he tried to enlist him in the Great Revolt. He hated him all the more for his deliberate invasion of the Order as though it still belonged to HIM and the Ouranian Messengers could come and go at will. Upon learning that Logos was to enter among the images as an infant, the geardee moved one of his obedient subjects, a half-Idumean usurper, to decree thanatos for every infant in the region. All were Separated except the Right One.

The geardee bitterly resented the name Jesus as applied to Logos. He knew what it meant. And he fully understood its implications. It was this knowledge which finally drove him to risk the Confrontation. The circumstances were all favorable. Forty days of fasting had taken their toll of Jesus. The geardee had whetted the keen dagger of temptation until it was well-nigh irresistible. The least penetration would enable its being thrust in to the hilt. He began with his potent "If"— half-statement, half-query, which cast doubt and called insistently for demonstration to prove or disprove. Three times he moved in for the kill and three times was driven back by the weapon drawn from the scabbard of Moses— that Moses whose body had occasioned such a violent dispute between Michael and himself. He had lost the argument with Michael. And he lost the present temptation. Moses had foiled him again.

There was but one thing left to do. The ultimate weapon must be called into use. The mortals called thanatos the King of terrors. They were frightened by the Separation more than by anything else. The effectiveness of Jesus would be destroyed by the Destroyer. The plot was laid well. There must appear to be a national rejection for nothing would insult HIM more than to realize that centuries of preparation were a total loss and worthless. The religious leaders must be the ones to cry out against Jesus. One of his own circle would betray him. He would be subjected to insult, ignominy, and finally exhibited as a spectacle of shame in the most cruel form by which the Separation could be affected. He who had stretched out his hands to create trees would now have his hands stretched out on one.

Everything proceeded according to the Plan. The sepulcher closed upon the soma. And then it happened! Two Messengers flashed through the realm of Atmos. The Order was in violent upheaval. The sepulcher was opened. Jesus emerged from the gloom. For the first time thanatos had met its master. The geardee was deprived of his most fearsome weapon. Jesus returned to Ouranos and took the Right Hand, the coveted position which had caused the original overthrow of the geardee. Logos had begun his reign of conquest.

And the geardee knew that he must work swiftly and furiously to salvage what he could and to satisfy the bitter hatred which gnawed at him continuously like a living flame. He had long been aware that HE had breathed HIS nature into the mortals who pledged their allegiance. He also knew that by HIS breath the first image made of dust became a living being. Taking a cue from this the geardee resolved to breathe his own nature, the poison breath of acrimony, into Atmos. When absorbed by mortals this produced alienation and estrangement among those who should have been filled with fondness for each other. The brain became bewitched. The mental faculties were deranged. The sense of balance was lost. The mortals became convinced they were doing HIS will when in reality they were working against the Purpose and in behalf of their own selfish ends.

Hidden from mortal eyes behind the Veil, the geardee took advantage of every opportunity. By breathing first upon one, then upon another in the Ekklesia, he kindled and enflamed the spirit of Party. The disciples of Logos turned the keen sword, which had been provided for defence, against each other. The Ekklesia developed rents which continued to widen until they created Parties with aversion and antipathy toward each other. The language became confused. The mortals lost the true sense of words they employed— such words as fellowship, tolerance and brotherly love.

In their bewilderment each Party came to believe that its adherents alone constituted the Chosen Ones and that the shibboleths and passwords which they employed were the keys to HIS favor. Some adopted titles drawn from the Oracles, thinking to sanctify the party by claiming exclusive right to interpretation. In the resultant confusion and strife the enmity was encouraged and the hostility heightened by partisan strictures and debates. It appeared that HIS purpose would be thwarted by those who claimed to love HIM most, but whose brains were addled by the noxious fumes of the breath of the geardee.

Then someone discovered that Agape was the effective antidote. Prejudice, partiality and pessimism could not withstand its purifying influence. It drove back the winds of bigotry. It cleared the air of suspicion and skepticism. Under its benign influence hearts yearned for one another. Broken ties were mended. With magnetic influence it drew mortals from selfish motivation to the person of Jesus. They ceased to regard the Party as the Ekklesia. Walls were broken down. Barriers were removed. Lives were filled with joy and with koinonia of the Pneuma. Happiness replaced discord and discontent.

Against Agape the geardee had no efficient counter-measure. He knew that every mortal who allowed this principle to reign in his heart was lost to him. But plotting and planning, while hidden in the Shadow, he resolved to pit his power and his Messengers against all who loved HIM until the lake opened to receive them. As Michael watched him he felt secure in the knowledge that ultimate victory— the triumph of Agape— would be final and complete.

(AUTHOR'S NOTE: The discerning reader will have already determined that the geardee is a designation we have coined from the initial letters of "the great red dragon"— Rev. 12:3).

Pentecost

Mission Messenger (August 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

When God drove the heathen out of Canaan he established His “chosen ones” in it as an agrarian society. Jerusalem was designated the capital and here the religious worship centered. To promote national unity and solidarity, as well as to preserve intact a proper reverence for Jehovah, it was decreed that the males must go up to Jerusalem thrice annually to appear before the Lord. They were not to go with empty hands. So the three festal occasions were made to coincide with harvest seasons in the land of “corn (grain) and wine.” It was providentially arranged that they would also celebrate great events in national history.

The first feast occurred at the outset of the barley harvest. It was called “the Passover.” It memorialized both the deliverance from Egypt and entrance into the land of promise. The people fled from Egypt on the night of the Passover and crossed Jordan on the same day that the passover lamb was selected, forty years later. The lamb was killed on the fourteenth of Nisan, the feast of unleavened bread began on the fifteenth day, and on the day following, the sixteenth, the first-fruits of the barley harvest were waved before the Lord in the form of a sheaf gathered from the field of ripening grain. This was the first day of the week.

The day of Pentecost occurred fifty days after the waving of the first sheaf. The Hebrews called it “The Feast of Weeks” because it occurred seven weeks after the Passover. It was determined by counting seven sabbaths from the sixteenth of Nisan, and designating the day following the seventh sabbath, as the holy day. On this day in the month of Sivan, the firstfruits of the wheat harvest were waved before the Lord in the form of two baked loaves containing leaven. This feast celebrated the giving of the law at Sinai, which occurred fifty days after the exodus from Egypt. It also memorialized the birth of the nation which began with the granting of the legal constitution.

The theocracy began on Pentecost at Mount Sinai. The Christocracy began on the same day at Mount Sion, a spiritual mount not subject to human touch. A theocracy is a rule of God. A Christocracy is a rule of God’s anointed. At the time of the slaying of the Jewish passover lamb, Christ, our passover, was slain to free us from the bondage of sin. Forty days afterward he returned to heaven to be Christed, that is anointed. There could be no Christian ekklesia and no Christian worship until the Christing of Jesus, in whose name every word and deed must be offered to God.

On Pentecost, announcement of his inauguration was made in Jerusalem by the Holy Spirit. This announcement was accompanied by visible and audible signs— cloven tongues like as of fire, and the speaking in other languages by the envoys of the King. One of the envoys explained the phenomena thus, “This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear.” He concluded his address with the assurance that Jesus had been coronated and anointed, i.e., made both Lord and Christ. Pentecost was the beginning of the Messianic Reign. It was the birthday of the church. And it was on the first day of the week.

From time to time, men who are disturbed by periods of apparent sterility in the history of the church, speak of recapturing the “Pentecostal experience.” These seek for a reproduction in their generation of the phenomena which graced the advent of the Spirit in conjunction with the Good News. But there will be no additional Pentecostal demonstration. This marked the gathering of the firstfruits and the first fruits come at the beginning of the harvest and are not scattered periodically through it.

Institutions, like the men who compose them, have but one birthday, although each succeeding year marks another anniversary. An anniversary is not a birthday, despite the faulty vernacular which so designates it. It is a celebration in memory of the date of birth, and memory is always related to past happenings and events. Our Lord is not coronated over and over. He was given his position but once and Pentecost provided the occasion for annunciation of it. “Christ offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, and took his seat at the right hand of God, where he waits henceforth until his enemies are made his footstool.”

I am reluctant to sit in judgment upon the motivations of any who are sincere and even more reluctant to appear in a role of limiting the Spirit by my interpretation of his own words. I am frank to confess that, while I think I may know how the Spirit will manifest his power in this age, he may do otherwise and exhibit phenomena wholly unexpected to me and beyond my present comprehension. But I am certain of one thing, and that is that in whatever dramatic manner he may choose to appear there will be no repetition of Pentecost. To have it otherwise would make the Holy Spirit inconsistent in his own testimony.

To those who tell me that if I believed the scriptures I would look for a Pentecostal experience, my reply is that it is precisely because I do believe the scriptures that I do not look for such an experience. The church can no more return and experience its birth into the world than I can return to be born from my mother's womb. In each instance there is something to be remembered and not to be experienced anew or afresh.

The Three Births

Mission Messenger (August 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Those responsible beings who would be heirs of eternal life must enter three domains to share in the salvation which will be revealed at “the end of time” (1 Peter 1:5). These may be designated the natural, spiritual and eternal kingdoms. Each one is entered by birth, and since birth requires a coming forth, the process by which we enter each in turn is called delivery. We are delivered from the body of the mother, from the body of sin, and from the body of earth. We come forth in turn from the womb, the baptistery and the tomb.

Birth does not produce life. One is begotten before he is born. The purpose of delivery is not to secure life but freedom for one who is living. It releases him from confinement and translates him into another state where he can enjoy the blessings and privileges and fulfill the responsibilities for which life was designed. The living organism in the womb must be set free at the proper time to develop its full potential. It cannot remain in the state in which it was conceived and fulfill the purpose of the life with which it has been endowed.

In the spiritual realm baptism does not produce life. Life begins at the point of trusting faith. Baptism is the end of the period of spiritual gestation and not the beginning. There is a difference between life through Christ and life with Christ. Life through Christ, as the source or means begins when we trust in him completely. This is the point of conception. Life with Christ is the state into which we enter at baptism. This is the point of birth. The first occurs when we acknowledge Jesus as our only Savior. This is the act of a sinner filled with a sense of guilt and remorse. The second occurs when we acknowledge Jesus as Lord of our lives. This is the act of a hopeful and penitent believer.

One passage in the new covenant scriptures makes this clear and points up for us the relation of our baptism to recognition of His Lordship. "Every power and authority in the universe is subject to him as Head. In him also you were circumcised, not in a physical sense, but by being divested of the lower nature; this is Christ's way of circumcision. For in baptism you were buried with him, in baptism also you were raised to life with him through your faith in the active power of God who raised him from the dead" (Col. 2:10-12).

It is while one is in the natural realm that he is begotten by faith. But one cannot remain in the state where he was begotten. He must be born into a new state and this involves delivery from the former. When one is baptized into Christ he puts on Christ. He is freed from the domain, or dominion, of sin. It no longer reigns over him. He is under the dominion of another and better sovereign. "But now, freed from the commands of sin, and bound to the service of God, your gains are such as make for holiness, and the end is eternal life" (Romans 6:22).

In conjunction with the preceding it may be said that eternal life does not begin with resurrection from the dead. This simply frees us from the confining elements of flesh and blood and makes possible the fullest enjoyment and expansion of the redeemed personality. Just as one is begotten in the natural realm for delivery into the spiritual, so one is begotten unto eternal life while in the spiritual. We are in possession of eternal life now. "God has given us eternal life, and this life is found in His Son. He who possesses the Son has life indeed; he who does not possess the Son of God has not that life. This letter is to assure you that you have eternal life” (1 John 5:11-13).

Ours is now eternal life in an embryonic state. It must continue thus so long as we are in our physical bodies, subjected to pain and sorrow, and limited by time and space. It is the design of the resurrection to free us from these confining elements because “flesh and blood can never possess the kingdom of God, and the perishable cannot possess immortality” (1 Cor. 15:50). Our spirits have been redeemed but our bodies have just been purchased for a possession of the Spirit. Their redemption will come at the resurrection when we are born into a new and eternal state. This will culminate our glorious adoption as sons of the Eternal One. At that time “the whole created universe is to be freed from the shackles of mortality and enter upon the liberty and splendor of the children of God.” These shackles force the created universe to writhe in pain and agony as if in the throes of travail at childbirth. It is not by mere chance that the apostle refers to travail in this connection, for travail leads to birth. He continues, “And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body” (Romans 8:23).

“What is sown in the earth as a perishable thing is raised imperishable. Sown in humiliation, it is raised in glory; sown in weakness, it is raised in power; sown as an animal body, it is raised as a spiritual body.” “This perishable being must be clothed with the imperishable, and what is mortal must be clothed with immortality. And when our mortality has been clothed with immortality, then the saying of the Scripture will come true, ‘Death is swallowed up; victory is won!’” (1 Cor. 15:53, 54).

The Father of us all has indicated His desire to have us share eternal life with Him. For that reason he sent eternal life in the person of His Son to share with us. The Son of God became the Son of man that the sons of men might become sons of God. That Son was delivered of an earthly mother that he might be partaker of our flesh and blood. We must be born again that we may be permitted to partake of his flesh and blood, that is, to share his life. “Except you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, you have no life in you.” This had no reference to partaking of the Lord’s Supper, but to participating in the Lord’s life, that is, eternal life. To share in that life, the Lord said, “Marvel not that I said unto you, ‘You must be born again.’”

The Two Great Foes

Mission Messenger (September 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

An address delivered to a State Convention of Christian Churches

“When the fulness of the times was come God sent forth His Son.”

The universal message of the crucified Christ burst upon the world of mankind at a time foreseen by God to be the most propitious in the whole history of the human race. That race, both by divine and human calculation, was divided into two great ethnic groups— Jew and Gentile. The apostle Paul uses the expression, “Every soul of man . . . the Jew first and also the Gentile” (Romans 2:9, 10). In the same context it is declared that “the gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth; to the Jew first and also to the Greek” (Romans 1:16).

It was neither expected nor ordained that the gospel should accomplish its purpose without opposition. The word of God is a sword and a weapon of conquest. It is mighty through God, to the pulling down of strongholds. When the simple message of the cross is brought to bear upon any alien concept or culture it must first battle for a beachhead and then continue to fight for survival. The arch-fiend against whom we struggle is clever beyond description. His is a policy of containment and compromise. He knows our weaknesses better than we know them ourselves and he can gain by attrition what he cannot secure in open combat.

The natural time limitations upon such an occasion as this make it imperative that I come directly to the point. It will be my thesis herein, that regardless of the generation in which the Good News is proclaimed, and regardless of the people to whom it is announced, the opposition to it always grows out of the background and experiences of those whom it encounters, and falls into one of two categories. These diverse facets of opposition sometime appear in one guise, and sometime in another; occasionally they may join forces in a confusing manner, but in the final analysis their true nature can be seen and it will again be revealed that what appeared to be a strange and new foe was but one of the two age-old enemies of the cross.

It is our personal conviction that the wisdom of God ordained that these two should be met in face-to-face combat in all of their power and strength during the very lifetime of the apostles of our Lord. This would provide for all succeeding generations an inspired example of the proper use of the divine manual of arms in gaining the victory. It is essential to remember that these opposing forces had to be exemplified in the ultimate of their might, else it might be reasoned that the success in their overthrow by the envoys of the Master was accomplished, not by the superiority of the weapon employed, but by reason of the weakness and inability of the opponents.

That we may be even more direct in laying our foundation, let us be specific. The two great foes to the preaching of the cross in all ages are Legalism and Liberalism. "When the fulness of the times had come" the stage was set for these to reach their zenith. In its encounter with the Jews the Message clashed head on with legalism in its most virulent form and propagated by the most ruthless and relentless proponents. All legalistic programs since that day have been but weak and watered-down versions of the one advanced by the Judaizers of the first century. In the same fashion, the confrontation with the Gentiles brought the Message into direct opposition to human philosophy in its most exalted, and therefore, most deadly and sinister form. It is no exaggeration to say that liberalism in every century has been but Gnosticism attired in a garb attractive to the time and place.

Since the Message has not changed, and since our real foes are the same, it would seem that the tactics used by the original messengers are the ones we must employ in every age to triumph. Unfortunately, the passing of the centuries has dulled our sensibilities and blunted our discernment until few are able either to correctly identify the enemy or properly direct their weapons against the foe. The result is that we frequently kill off those who are allies, or cripple ourselves by turning our weapons in the wrong direction. It is my purpose in this little talk to help us orient ourselves on the field of combat so we may be able to use all of the strength available to us in our present time of crisis.

The gospel was preached to the Jew first and it had to contend with legalism as its first opposition force. For fifteen hundred years the law of Moses had served as a fence around the vineyard of Judah and Jerusalem. It hemmed God's people in and hedged all others out. It was designed as an instrument of separation and segregation. Its sacred ordinances and festal occasions were reserved only for the circumcised. The inauguration of the Passover at the very threshold of national identity was accompanied by the divine fiat, "No uncircumcised person shall eat thereof," and by the divine instruction, "If any stranger will eat thereof, let him and his males first be circumcised, then let them come near and keep it." Circumcision of the flesh was the external mark of the covenant people.

The original concept of many of the Jewish converts to the gospel was that the called out ones were to constitute merely a synagogue of Messianic Jews. There was no thought of discarding Judaism. Those who accepted Jesus were expected first to come into covenant relationship with God through circumcision. In their favor was the fact that Jesus had declared that he had come, not to destroy but to fulfill the law. The law had been given by God. It was admittedly holy and just and good. They regarded any offer of justification upon any other basis than deeds of law as being an affront to God and inimical to all they had been taught in the past.

What they could not comprehend was that the law was a child-conductor to bring men to Christ. Having fulfilled its mission it had also fulfilled its destiny. When God broke through the flesh curtain, a new covenant was inaugurated which involved a person rather than a code of precepts. They failed to grasp the significance of the prophetic utterance, "I will give thee for a covenant of the people, for a light of the Gentiles." "The law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." The grace of God is not contrary to the law of God. It simply operates upon a higher plane, the level of the Spirit. Upon this level there is no law but that of love. "For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Gal. 5:14).

The advocates of legalism were fervent and untiring. They had firmly resolved not to surrender an inch of uncontested ground to those who offered eternal life as a gift instead of as a wage. Firm in their contention that man must earn the right to glory by works of righteousness which he performed, they bitterly resisted every attempt to exalt divine grace above human efforts. In this great emergency God raised up a man to spearhead His forces. A legal student in the great Hillel school, brilliant above all the contemporaries of his own age, Saul of Tarsus, who began as a persecutor of the saints, was called to the task. More than any other man, he deserves credit for preserving the primitive church from division into Jewish and Gentile segments. In personal confrontation, in oral discussion, and in written documentation, he met the Pharisaical party throughout the world. The record of his victory remains for all of us to read and share.

What method of reasoning was employed to offset the inroads of the legalistic spirit with its deadening influence and its cold intemperance? To reply in full would be to analyze in detail such letters as the ones written to the Romans, Galatians, and Philippians. Since we cannot do this, let us summarize in seven propositions, the points essential to our recapture of the will of the Spirit.

(1) All have sinned and come short of the glory of God. (2) By deeds of law there shall no flesh be justified in God's sight. (3) We are justified fully by God's grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. (4) Access into that grace wherein we stand is gained by faith. (5) In Christ Jesus nothing avails anything except faith which works by love. (6) There is now no condemnation to those who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. (7) You are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if the Spirit of God dwells in you.

Wherever legalism rears its ugly head, the most effective antidote to its toxic poison which paralyzes the body, is the re-affirmation of the basis of justification and the sign or seal of relationship with God. Justification by faith and the possession of the indwelling Spirit, not in a sectarian or creedal interpretation, but in the fulness of their meaning as found in the sacred oracles, these are the principles which strike deep at the very heart of all legalistic tendencies. And these great truths need to be again examined in all of their glorious possibilities by the heirs of the restoration movement, many of whom have been unconsciously betrayed into creating tests of fellowship where God has made none, and who have frequently driven out those whom God has called in. Every person in whom the Spirit of God dwells is a child of God and wherever God has a child I have a brother. And I have brethren who may never even have heard of the restoration movement.

The legalist constantly warns about the danger of the broad road and this is well. But we must not overlook the fact that to narrow and restrict the road of life to confines which God has not made is just as dangerous. Liberalism seeks to remove the bounds which God has placed and thus encourages men to walk where God has not ordained; legalism seeks to create undue restraints and thus discourages men from trying to walk where God has ordained. The first allows no place for the grace of God to function; the second provides no place for the mercy of God to function. All legalism overlooks the divine dictum, "The man who makes no allowances for others will find none made for him. 'It is still true that mercy smiles in the face of judgment'" (James 2:13— J. B. Phillips). We are not to destroy fences which God has constructed, but neither are we to erect fences of our own. The greatest weapon against legalism to be found in the divine arsenal is that of "justification by faith" as the Spirit uses the expression.

In A.D. 70 Jerusalem was destroyed after a lengthy and harrowing siege by the Roman army under Titus. Long before, Jesus had prepared his disciples for this fearful event by giving them instructions for evacuation of the city and the establishment of refugee camps in the mountains. Among those who probably abandoned the city when news came of the advancing invasion forces, was the apostle John. This aged saint transferred his residence to Ephesus. I choose to believe he was providentially directed to this site as the chosen vessel of God to meet the next great threat to the Message.

Before the aged John, only survivor of the twelve, was allowed to meet a merciful death, a boon which had long been withheld from him despite cruel persecution, an enemy had arisen within the bosom of the church, which threatened its existence, and was far more subtle than Judaism. The word Gnosticism has been used to designate that system of thought which acted like a cancer in the body of the Lord. It must not be thought by the historical researchist that the use of this single term implied a unified code of belief. The Gnostics were both divided and divisive, but they all held certain things in common. It is both impossible and foreign to our present purpose to discuss the philosophic deficiencies in the various schools of rationalists. We would like to mention some of the things common to most of them.

The forerunner of Gnosticism was probably Philo, a Jew who lived while Jesus was on the earth. He laid the foundation for the inroad of this synthetic philosophy into the Christian domain by his interpretation of the old covenant scriptures. Acknowledging the beauty of the language and the lofty imagery of the prophets, he substituted salvation by means of knowledge and the contemplative life, for the moral reconciliation with God to be accomplished through the Messiah. With the extension of the Message to the pagan world, those philosophers who had long sought after wisdom, wove a pattern of four strands of thought— Judaism, Hellenism, Orientalism and Christianity. They soon began to contend that pagan poets as well as Jewish prophets were mouthpieces of Deity, and in many cases, were superior to them in their contention for higher idealism.

Running like a recurrent note through their divergent views was the thought that all matter is evil, and that God could not have revealed himself in human flesh. Two things had to be rejected at the very outset— neither the incarnation nor crucifixion of the Son of God could be accepted as actual fact. These had to be explained away to sustain their theory, and the resurrection denied, except as a figment in the minds of the sorrowing disciples whose grief brought images to their minds which, because of poignant longing, came to be proclaimed as reality. The idea of the pre-existence of the Logos, who made an advent in the flesh, was repugnant to these aristocrats of the intellect.

Those who clung to the testimony of the chosen witnesses that Jesus was corporeal, were airily dismissed as being uninitiated into the real mystery of the faith. Since sin was not a reality there was no room for sacrifice. Illumination, or enlightenment, became the goal, instead of redemption. Man could think himself out of his predicament by sheer use of logic and the employment of his rational powers. The fall of man was simply an obscuration, produced by matter, so salvation is merely a return to the light. Matter was darkness, spirit was light, so to “walk in the light” was to attain unto superior knowledge, to be “in the know.”

Because there was an apparent conflict between the Messiah revealed in the old covenant scriptures and Jesus who came, one of the Gnostic leaders, Marcion, drew up a list of antitheses between the God of the old covenant scriptures, and the God of the new. The God of the old covenant was national and local, a sort of tribal deity, while Jesus was universal in his appeal. The old covenant promised only earthly rewards of accumulating wealth and victory over enemies, while the new covenant speaks of heavenly blessings for those who endure hardships and persecution on earth. The old covenant allowed the fleeing Israelites to carry away the treasures and jewels of Egypt, while Jesus told his disciples not to take an extra staff. The God of the old covenant sent bears to devour the children who mocked Elisha, and called down fire from heaven upon the enemies, whereas the Good News is a message of kindness and forgiveness.

The old covenant God was presented as an instrument of vengeful wrath, the new covenant God as one of great love. The modern theologian, taking a cue from Marcion, and who called the God of the old covenant “a bloody butcher” was neither modern nor a theologian. He was a twentieth century Gnostic and his invective against the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, was not, as some of the critics hailed it, “a fresh breath for this age.” It was but the expelling again of the fetid breath of the cynics and schismatics of yesteryear.

When John arrived in Ephesus, he was in the very center of the dissemination of Gnostic propaganda in Asia Minor. This was the home of Cerinthus, a Jew who had studied philosophy at Alexandria, and who had already gained a reputation as an advocate of the idea that Jesus was begotten by Joseph and born of Mary, and did not become the Messiah until the Holy Spirit descended upon him at baptism. So widespread was the acceptance of this and related ideas that many congregations were in an upheaval and turmoil. Religious strife was the order of the day.

It becomes our duty now to examine the means by which the aged apostle sought to save the church from disintegration under the impact of the synthetic wisdom of the pseudo-intellectuals. I hold that the gospel record of John, as well as his first and second epistles, were all written primarily to accomplish this task. There was a condition which had to be met and they were written to meet that condition. This will serve to explain the great difference in nature between the gospel record of John and those written by Matthew, Mark and Luke. This is the reason for the great assertion that "The Logos became flesh and dwelled among us, and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the father, full of grace and truth."

But it is in his epistles that John demonstrates the means by which the church in all ages, must rescue itself from the clutches of those who deny the foundation truths upon which we must be built if we are to survive. He identifies the real enemy. It is not those who are honestly mistaken as the result of earnest study of revelation. The enemy is composed of those who are antichrists and whose false philosophy, if adopted universally, would mean the end of all that belongs to faith. When the church confronts antichrists, it is facing its final hour if the wrong decision is made. "My children, this is the last hour! You were told that Antichrist was to come, and now many antichrists have appeared; which proves to us that this is indeed the last hour" (1 John 2:18).

The antichrists were first infiltrators and then schismatics. “They went out from our company, but never really belonged to us; if they had, they would have stayed with us. They went out, so that it might be clear that not all in our company truly belong to it.” They were liars. “Who is the liar? Who but he that denies that Jesus is the Christ? He is Antichrist for he denies both the Father and the Son: to deny the Son is to be without the Father; to acknowledge the Son is to have the Father also.” They were deceivers. “Many deceivers have gone out into the world, who do not acknowledge Jesus as coming in the flesh. These are the persons described as the Antichrist, the arch-deceiver.”

What is the remedy when the church is confronted with such a problem? There must be a re-affirmation of the testimony of the witnesses upon which faith is predicated and life is enjoyed. But even before this, the credibility of the witnesses must be established. John begins by showing how he knew Jesus was not a phantom. He demonstrates how ridiculous is the surmising of the Docetics. The apostles had visual, audible and manual proof of the reality of Jesus. They heard the Word of life, saw him with their eyes, scrutinized him intently, and handled him with their hands. They were as sure of Jesus as of their own existence. Note that it was eternal life which they saw, heard and handled, because it was manifested. Eternal life is not an extension of time. It is not a prolongation of existence. Eternal life is a person, the Son of God. “And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life.”

The purpose of this testimony is to produce fellowship. “That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that you also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.” A correct understanding of fellowship is the most important thing when the very foundations of the faith are threatened. When the liberalistic philosophy of his day threatened to sweep away the saints from their moorings, John addressed to them a letter urging fellowship, and literally filled with admonitions to practice brotherly love. So long as the people of God walk in the light of love as God is love, they have fellowship one with another. They share in the common life of the Spirit. They are joint heirs with God. The blood of Jesus goes on cleansing them from their sins.

In our days of present crisis nothing is more important than a recapture of that sense of fellowship which is ours because we are in Christ Jesus together. We have been raised up together and made to sit together, but we have allowed ourselves to become alienated because we have confused community with conformity, fellowship with endorsement, and have exalted opinions above the cross of Calvary. We have slugged it out toe-to-toe when we should have been fighting shoulder-to-shoulder. We have specialized in partisan debate when we ought to have engaged in precious dialogue. We have been more concerned about flinging challenges at one another than in flinging down the gauntlet to Satan!

Because we have forgotten that we have a common enemy we have forgotten that we have a common faith. That faith is to be our test of fellowship because it is the medium by which we come into the relationship with the Godhood which produces life. John has written, "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book, but these are written that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you might have life through his name." This is the divine foundation for all Christian unity. When the apostle Paul rebuked the sin of factionalism in Corinth, he declared, "For other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, even Jesus Christ." Our hope of peace lies not in a plan, a program or a precept, but in a person. "He is our peace who has made both one and broken down the middle wall of partition."

The Gospel is the Good News of what God has done for us in and through Jesus. The Message is one of victory in Jesus. Wherever the Message is announced and men believe in his name and are immersed in it, they become children of God. He who instructed the envoys to preach the gospel in all the world, said quite simply, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." I accept that statement without reservation just as he made it. In spite of the conflicting theories of systematic theology, the complexities of creeds and confessions, the confusion created by strife and schism, it is still true that every sincere believer who accepts the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus in faith and by obedience, is born again, and I am akin to him through the Spirit. He is my brother! We are in the fellowship. Both of us may be ignorant about many things and wrong about a lot of them, but we are one because of faith and not because of superior knowledge. If a man is right about Jesus he may be wrong about many other things and still be saved; if he is wrong about Jesus he may be right about everything else and still be lost.

Sometimes I think that in spite of the warning of Jesus we have majored in the science of gnat-straining and the fine art of camel-swallowing. I do not deny that we have had, and still have, serious problems of interpretation. I do not minimize our differences nor suggest that we ignore them. I do not affirm that our doctrinal discussions are unnecessary or unwarranted. I do assert that when we split and sever, when we fragment and fractionalize the body into splinters and segments, and thus weaken our mutual testimony, we are "disobedient unto the heavenly vision" and we do "despite unto the Spirit of grace." Nothing which is not of sufficient importance to sever us from God should ever separate us from each other.

In the darkest days of the American Revolution, when it appeared that the cause of freedom would be lost due to the selfish jealousy among the bickering colonies, the venerable Benjamin Franklin sounded the warning, "We must either hang together or we shall all hang separately." How much longer can we afford the luxury of factionalism while surrounded by a ruthless enemy which would rob us even of a recognition of God? I freely acknowledge that all truths are equally true but not all truths are equally important at a given time. And no problem which confronts us as humble seekers after truth is as important as the blood of Jesus which cleanses us from all sin and welds us together in the body of Christ.

Before we even approach many of our questions in the fellowship we must first settle the question of fellowship itself. That fellowship is not conditioned upon conformity of opinion, unanimity in every interpretation, or equality in knowledge. We are not brothers because we see everything alike but because we have the same Father. Fellowship is based upon sonship, brotherhood is based upon fatherhood, fraternity results from paternity. Unless we recognize this we will expend our energies and dissipate our strength upon things which, though they may be virile, are not vital, until “the overflowing scourge” sweeps over and destroys us all. It is no time to be critical of a haircut during an Indian raid in which we may all be scalped. It is no time to tack a stray shingle on the garage roof when the house is on fire. It is no time to clean a sparkplug when your automobile is stalled on the tracks and an express train is bearing down upon you.

Factionalism is not the answer to legalism and liberalism. Faith and fellowship constitute the only satisfactory refutation to both. The faith that brings us together in Christ and the fellowship which holds us together in him— these constitute our only real hope of victory. If we allow faith to erode under presumption and fellowship to explode under pressure, we have little left to do but to pick up the pieces and bemoan the wreck of a once glorious movement.

It will help us to realize that legalism and liberalism are more closely akin than most of us realize. They have the same father although they were conceived by different mothers. Both have been sired by pride, but legalism is the offspring of fear while liberalism is the child of fallacy. Their relationship is revealed by their nature. Both limit the efficacy of the blood of Jesus and both deny that they do. But legalism seeks to lift man up to the level of God by his own bootstraps, while liberalism seeks to pull Jesus down to the level of man by its own bookstraps. Neither one really respects the authority of Jesus. Liberalism denies that he has any authority, and legalism interposes its own as a substitute for it. In both instances man eventually becomes his own God.

We are the heirs of a noble movement, but we have inherited the feuds and divisions by which our fathers thought to preserve truth and perpetuate purity of doctrine. We now know that the methods they adopted will not accomplish the desired end. It is time for us to reverse the process before we divide ourselves out of existence as we have already divided ourselves out of influence in a great many places. We must avoid the extremes of legalism and liberalism, but we must also avoid the extreme of factionalism. It is an unscriptural and an anti-scriptural approach to our differences. Our first task is to restore a true sense of brotherhood as a framework in which to labor at lessening our differences. The restoration of fellowship will not remove our differences but it will make it possible for us to correctly evaluate them and to labor toward more harmonious relationship.

It is not necessary that we be in harmony upon every matter to be in the fellowship; it is necessary that we be in the fellowship if we are ever to achieve harmony. Not a single admonition to agree with one another, or to live in harmony, was ever given to bring brethren into fellowship. All such commands were given to those in the fellowship and because they were in it. We need not sacrifice or compromise a single truth that any of us has ever held to restore a proper sense of brotherhood, and this is the place for us to begin. The way to have unity is to unite and not have a debate. Our foes are mutual foes. We cannot overcome them by acting as mutual enemies. If we can ever attain to the crucified life so that our partisan pride with its snobbery and arrogance can be replaced by that genuine humility which loves a brother more than it loves the things we cling to, a brighter day will dawn for the restoration movement.

It is my firm conviction that we face such an era. Tomorrow will be better than today. We are beginning to face our problems with a greater sense of maturity. Lines of communication are being repaired. Your graciousness in inviting me to address you, your hospitality while I am among you, coming as I do from a divergent segment of the restoration brotherhood than that in which the majority of you were reared — these are signs of the times which betoken that the fierce fires of partisanship are burning themselves out. I am grateful to you for your generosity and magnanimity of spirit and “I commend you unto God and the word of his grace which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among those who are sanctified.” I am happy to be your brother in Him who died for the sins of us all.

The Moment of Truth

Mission Messenger (October 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

I must begin this presentation by asking you to excuse my language. Some of you will deem it inappropriate to mention bullfighting in connection with a serious spiritual dissertation, but you must bear with me this once for introducing a term related to the sport. I am not an afficionado, as an ardent enthusiast for bullfighting is designated. The truth is I have never seen a bullfight, and like the poem about the purple cow (since we are talking about bovines anyhow), “I never hope to see one!” But there is an expression characteristic of the contest between man and beast that I want to borrow.

When the specially bred bull trots into the arena, he encounters the matador who uses a large cape to execute a series of veronicas, provocative actions to induce the animal to charge. When a number of preliminary passes have been made, the picadores enter on horseback and prod the shoulders of the bull as he charges against their lances. When the president signals for them to retire, the banderilleros enter to thrust their gaily colored darts into the neck and shoulders of the infuriated animal. Again the matador returns and bracing himself with sword in hand summons the animal to him.

As the bull makes his final charge the matador waits until he is almost upon him, then leaps to the left, lunging over the right horn and driving his sword deep into the heart and lungs of the animal, seeking to produce instantaneous death. This climactic moment is called “the moment of truth.” It is the instant of peril when the bull by the slightest upward toss of his head can impale the body of the man and bring about his agonizing death. The “moment of truth” is that time when one man pits his all— his life, his fortune and his sacred honor— on the outcome of a single thrust.

I labor under the conviction that “the moment of truth” has come in the struggle to pry certain segments of the restoration movement out of the bog of partisan thinking to resume the trek toward the original goal of this great project. I know the personal risk involved in such a decision. I am aware of the price that will be exacted. I know what censorship and boycott, false accusation and misrepresentation, can do to one who dares to suggest reformation of the religious movement of which he is a part. Every reformer is eventually dubbed a “heretic” and hounded out. But the heroes whom we laud today are the heretics of yesterday. In the full confidence of vindication by future historians we press toward our objective in the present. We are strangely unafraid of what men may do unto us. With holy truth as our aim and the Holy Spirit as our guide we refuse to be frightened off our course or deterred from our purpose.

I have grown up in that segment of the restoration movement launched by Barton Warren Stone and Alexander Campbell, which rejects the use of instrumental music in the corporate worship. In spite of the denials of the better informed among us, the great majority of these brethren have adopted the title “Church of Christ,” and they use it in a purely sectarian sense. They employ it in exactly the same sense as do those who speak of “The Baptist Church” or “The Methodist Church.” It is of these brethren with whom I am allied that I specifically write in this article, but what I say will be appropriate to other segments and fragments of the restoration movement, for none of these are wholly purged from the spirit of factionalism.

Five Specific Indictments

I am going to file certain indictments against “The Church of Christ” as it exists in this nation. I do this without the slightest bit of animosity toward those who compose it. They are my brothers in the Lord. I love them with an abiding affection— all of them! I make these charges simply to show how serious is the problem we face. I do it as a prelude to a disclosure of what I intend to do to meet the problem head-on in the arena of contemporary existence.

Members of many congregations will be warned not to read what I write. They will be given veiled threats from the platform and will be suspect if they are seen with a copy of the paper upon their person. Already, at home and abroad, there are those who have sought by every devious means to kill the influence of Mission Messenger. We are honored to notice that in church bulletins and periodicals our plea for fellowship has been labeled “the most dangerous threat to the church in a hundred years.” I say we are honored because I know that those who thus write, confuse the faction in which they live with the church for which Jesus died. This paper is intended to wage war against factionalism and the party spirit and we are humbled before God that notice must be given to that war by those who sought so long to ignore it and act as if nothing was happening. I intend in this issue to offer to face the opposition openly and unafraid. I believe the Holy Spirit is at work in the hearts of men in our age. I face the future fearlessly, content to believe that my Father will work with his children who work for the unity of all of their brethren. Here are the indictments.

1. The “Church of Christ” has abandoned the very purpose of the restoration movement which was “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” A great majority of its members do not believe there are any Christians in the sects. They think that all Christians are in the “Church of Christ” and that the sincere believers in Christ in other organizations are “unbelievers.” Many of them are so sectarian in attitude that they insist that those in other segments of the restoration movement be re-baptized to be recognized as “true Christians.” Since exclusivism is the very essence of sectarianism it is obvious that “The Church of Christ” is more sectarian in attitude than those whom its preachers condemn.

2. “The Church of Christ” is wholly out of tune with the spiritually intellectual climate of this generation. In the midst of a world seeking and searching for the solution to schism, it has little to offer except worn-out cliches which have been proven by their purveyors to be impractical and unworkable. The non-instrument Churches of Christ are split into some two dozen separate warring factions of various sizes and intensity, each of which feels that the only approach to unity is for the whole world of mankind to come and abjectly conform to its partisan interpretations. There is absolutely no concept of an association of free men in Christ Jesus drawn together by their mutual love and regard for him and held together by their love for each other, and nothing else. The surrender to Jesus must be accompanied by a greater surrender and commitment to the party program. Men are not simply called into Christ but are also forced to be “like us” if they stay within the framework of the partisan “brotherhood.”

3. The “Church of Christ” is a victim of its own parochial and provincial philosophy and even its most prominent advocates dare not engage as equals in the ecumenical discussions of the day. They cannot accept invitations to share in dialogue with others for fear of being labeled “Liberals” and falling under the stigma of “guilt by association.” They are frightened at the thought of inviting anyone who does not parrot the party position to speak in their own lectureships. All of these are loaded with “sound men” who will project the party image.

This attitude breeds an unhealthful state of fear in which the feeling of inferiority must be compensated by blatant trumpeting of successes purchased by huge expenditures of money or by favorable comparison of attainments in promotional activities with other recognized sects. As a result, many are beginning to defect from an indefensible philosophy with its closed-door policy and its one-way streets which make talking with ourselves a virtue and talking with others a crime. It is a safe prediction that there will be an exodus of hundreds possessed of more scholarly bent within the next few years. The current status of orthodoxy is intolerable for men who have been taught to reason and think objectively. They will be forced to abandon their position to get out where they can breathe freely and recapture their own integrity.

4. Our brethren profess openly to deplore creeds but are among the most creed-ridden of religious movements in this age. The fact that their creeds are unwritten makes them all the more dangerous. Every test of fellowship is a creed. Whatever one must believe to be recognized and regarded as “loyal” is the creed of the faction that requires it. That we have at least twenty-four creeds is proven by our two dozen parties with their “loyalty tests.” We have forsaken the divinely ordained justification by faith in Christ Jesus and postulated a humanly devised system of justification by an attitude toward music, societies, cups, classes, colleges, charitable institutions, unfulfilled prophecy and a whole host of other things which are elevated to a place of greater importance than the blood of Jesus Christ our Lord. To this very day men are driven out of “The Church of Christ” for no other “sin” than association with brethren who do not pass the party test!

5. Every one of our more than a score of factions claims to “speak where the Bible speaks.” Every one of them denies that any of the others do so. The truth is that we have accumulated and compiled a mass of traditional explanations and interpretations which we have crystallized into a form of “unsystematic theology” and it is according to this, and not the word of God, that we speak! If the ideas distilled from the Bible and molded by the thinking of John Calvin constitute Presbyterianism; and those distilled and molded by the thinking of John Wesley constitute Methodism; by the same token those we have adopted and adapted constitute Church-of-Christ-ism. And just as all theological forms seek to make Christianity over after their own image and according to their own likeness, so we also do!

A New Reformation

Every religious movement must eventually be brought to face itself in the mirror of reality if it is to be saved from itself. This is the greatest salvation for any movement. The one who holds up the mirror may be assaulted and attacked, not because he held it up, but because of what it reveals. Most movements would prefer not to see their splotches and blemishes in true perspective. Certainly they do not want the mirror held at such an angle that their neighbors can also see the truth about them.

I am firmly convinced that “The Church of Christ” must reform if it is to return to basic Biblical principles and those of the restoration ideal and regain a sense of relevance for this age. I propose to devote my efforts and these columns to promoting such reform while I maintain contact with all segments of the restoration movement, and with men of good will in every other movement, throughout the whole earth. I shall be a Christian and a Christian only, free to go where I feel called of the Spirit to go, but also free to remain where I am without going anywhere else.

Our task will not be easy. Most members of “The Church of Christ” suffer from the illusion that this outgrowth of nineteenth century restoration attempts is the church for which Jesus shed his blood and that no one has been cleansed by that blood, or shares in its protection, except those who are within the membership of a non-instrument party. The problem is heightened by the childish notion that the work of restoration has been completed and that the “Church of Christ” has arrived while all others have departed. It is not made easier by the fact that the membership equates the mass of traditions and partisan interpretations to which they cling, with the will of God and the word of God. We challenge at the very outset all of these assumptions and the partisan structure which has grown out of them. Please consider the following.

1. Jesus came to break down walls of partition and weld into one body divergent elements which found their peace in him. He is our peace. The purpose of God was for living stones of various colors, conditions, cultures and circumstances, to grow together into a holy temple. Any interpretation of the scriptures which creates and erects barriers between believers and separates and divides them is contrary to the purpose of Jesus.

2. Jesus prayed for all those to be one who believe in him through the testimony of the apostles. Any use or application of apostolic doctrine which makes impossible the oneness to be achieved by the apostolic gospel is contrary to the prayer of Jesus.

3. Jesus came as the central figure in God’s “plan for the fulness of time, to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth” (Eph. 1:10). Any use of the new covenant scripture to create, cause, condone or continue schisms among the saints is in plain defiance of the plan of Jesus.

Our brethren are guilty of substituting orthodoxy for God’s revelation and of making their own views, versions and variances, tests of fellowship. Honest brethren in Christ, whose present knowledge will not allow their consciences to conform to current party norms, are driven forth or treated as stepbrothers and second-rate citizens of the kingdom of heaven. The course we have followed is divisive and not unitive. It fragments instead of cements. It splinters instead of splinting our breaches and breaks.

I do not charge that our brethren do not love the Bible. I unhesitatingly say they warp and wrest its sacred teaching to justify a partisan course. When any man employs the written word to defeat the plan, purpose and prayer of the Living Word, and to shatter what he came to unite, that person is acting in opposition to God in spite of all his claims of fidelity and protests of loyalty. When men cannot distinguish between their brethren in Christ and the enemies of Christ and seek to drive out and destroy the former it is time for a restudy of our whole profession.

Men are being branded as apostates who dearly love Jesus. They are being labeled as unbelievers even while pledging undying fealty unto him. They are being harassed as heretics for even expressing a dissident view. Any interpretation of scripture which results in such a distorted perspective and such an uncharitable position is contrary to the whole purpose and design of God.

Let me be specific. When men are assailed as preaching “another gospel” simply because they cannot concur in our conviction as to the use of instrumental music in corporate worship, their accusers reveal that they do not even know of what the original gospel consists. And regardless of the division caused over the controversy about instrumental music such a mistaken view of the gospel is a thousand fold more dangerous and divisive. When men are accused of departing from “the faith” simply because they disagree with us about cups, classes or colleges, their accusers reveal that they do not know what constitutes “the faith.” Such ignorance is fraught with much more danger to the cause of our King than any opinion about cups, classes or colleges, could ever be.

It is ridiculous for those who hold such twisted views to talk about uniting upon matters of faith while being tolerant on matters of opinion and charitable in all things. Matters of faith are simply the things the party emphasizes as necessary to be recognized as a party member. Matters of opinion are those things which they have decided are inconsequential in preserving the party image. Hand one of these partisans a list of a hundred issues which have troubled the heirs of the restoration movement and ask him to catalog them in two columns labeled “Faith” and “Opinion” and he will not dare do it. He cannot risk an opinion as to what constitutes matters of faith in every instance. How can men plead for unity upon matters of faith when they cannot submit a list of such matters?

The Ground of Conflict

It is obvious that the battle to save the restoration movement from itself must be fought upon the ground of scriptural interpretation. This is as it should be. If the scriptures justify division among God’s children as a solution to the problem of differences let us get on with division until every man constitutes his own private “brotherhood” and each is in fellowship with no one but himself. If division of the family of God is not the divinely authorized solution for differences among brethren let us quit seeking authority for it in the words of the Father who begot us all. Let us cease to bend and belabor the scriptures in our misguided attempts to give validity to our sorry, sordid and shameful state of scandal and schism.

Because we believe that “the moment of truth” for the forces of orthodoxy has arrived, we are completely revising our plans for the coming year. Many of the issues of the paper for 1965 had already been long prepared and would have constituted a revolutionary volume to be entitled “The Living Pattern.” These will now be held in reserve and we shall deal directly with those scriptures which are quoted and applied for the purpose of separating and segregating brethren from each other. We shall be writing from an expository standpoint. It will be our intent to prove conclusively that every scriptural passage used to sanctify our divisions is abused and misused. The MISSION MESSENGER for 1965 will be one great volume of exegetical material on disputed passages and controversial interpretations. All will be gathered in one valuable volume at the close of 1965 under the title "The Twisted Scriptures."

It will be our intention to write in love and with compassion, but to bring the truth to bear with such force and power that these articles cannot be ignored. We intend for them to become the theme of discussion in lectureships and forums, in seminaries and symposiums. We shall prepare an arsenal of ammunition for peace-makers and place the stigma of trouble-making where it belongs, upon those who wrest the revelation of God to justify partisan prejudice. We shall write carefully and considerately, knowing that what we say will be read after our voice is stilled and our pen is stopped by death, and realizing that we must face every word in the Great Confrontation with him "whom having not seen we love."

We invite those who disagree with what we say to discuss it openly in their own journals and to attack it in their meetings either in our presence or absence. To those who are of a disposition to place the quest for truth above partisan politics we make this proposal. We will appear at our own expense on the platform of the annual lectureship at George Pepperdine College, Abilene Christian College, Lubbock Christian College, Harding College, David Lipscomb College, and Florida College, and submit to open public questioning by members of the faculty, or if permitted, by the entire audience. We pledge that we will conduct ourselves with proper Christian decorum and love those who disagree as much as we do those who agree with our views.

This article constitutes our personal permission for any freedom-loving alumnus or group connected with any of the colleges mentioned, to petition the administrative heads of their alma mater for a fair hearing on our position. We have been the subject of discussion in absentia in every one of these schools in classes or on the public platform. We await with interest the outcome of this offer to see if a single one of them will dare to face up to the greatest challenge of the twentieth century— that of offering a real basis for Christian unity which transcends all partisan, sectarian and factional considerations.

Summary of Our Plea

For the benefit of those who may wish to petition for a just and open hearing of our contention for fellowship, and who may be new to MISSION MESSENGER, we offer the following ten-point program as a mere skeleton of our plea.

1. Fellowship in Christ Jesus is a state or condition into which we are called by the gospel. Every person on this earth who properly responds to the gospel by belief in Jesus and immersion in his name is in the fellowship.

2. Fellowship of those in Christ is not contingent upon agreement or conformity. We are not in the fellowship because we are in harmony, but we strive for harmony because we are in the fellowship. It is a sin to make anything a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation.

3. The flock of God is still a scattered flock rather than a gathered flock. There are children of God dispersed among the various sects. To deny that they are his children is to reflect against their paternity and insult the Father.

4. In our present divided state no sect, faction, or party among us, is the “loyal church” to the exclusion of all others. We must establish association and communication across all of these lines in order that our lives be leavened and leaven others. And we must associate as brothers in the same family.

5. Men and women in all of our parties must be granted and guaranteed their freedom in Christ Jesus. This means freedom to read what they wish without censure, freedom to attend any meeting or forum without attack, and freedom to participate in any conference or conclave without fear of partisan pressure or factional exclusion.

6. We must not expect to arrive at recognition of brotherhood by settling all of our problems and differences first, for brotherhood is not based upon seeing everything alike, but upon having the same father and mother. We must begin with brotherhood, which means love for all of our brethren, wherever they are. And we must demonstrate that love openly and unashamedly, recognizing their equal right to communicate with us and with our common Father.

7. To achieve unity we cannot wait until all of us reach maturity and usher in an ideal state. We must begin where we are and work together where we can. Unity is a command of God, not a matter of choice with us. Certainly we can work together up to the point where we disagree, and by ardently laboring together to that extent when and where we can, our area of disagreement may shrink and the time of our distinction be postponed.

8. We must reject partisan debate by professional “disputers of this world” as offering any hope for producing unity in our day. Such debate widens the chasm instead of reducing it. We must substitute dialogue for debate and meet as equals in our failure to keep the peace. In debate one is thinking what to say to the other man, in dialogue he is thinking of what the other man says to him. We must approach our problems looking for a solution and not seeking for vindication. Bridges must always be built from both ends!

9. We must purge our thinking of the basic fallacies adopted by our fathers when confronted with innovations. These fallacies have fragmented us into fighting factions. They are two in number. The first is that purity of doctrine can only be maintained by separating from brethren; the second is that division is the God-ordained way of dealing with differences in the family. These two vicious horns have been used by religious opportunists and politicians to gore the body into a shameful and bloody mess.

10. We must re-examine and scrutinize carefully and critically every passage of the written word which we have used to divide brethren from one another. Those who trust in Jesus were meant to be one. He died to make that unity possible. We need always to be reluctant to apply the scriptures in such a manner as to defeat the very purpose of their author.

Our Plan and Purpose

It is our intention as announced herein, to devote the whole of MISSION MESSENGER in 1965 to a study of "The Twisted Scriptures." We expect to make this a compendium of investigation which will place in the hands of every lover of truth such factual material as will enable him to withstand the disciples of division and salesmen of schism. This will not be a book for preachers alone but for every saint. We mention it in advance so you can be sure your own subscription is in order and can subscribe for others who need it. We trust that you will urge every elder of every congregation in this land to read all of the issues for 1965. New light upon old passages will surely flood your soul. The meaning of God will be made clear upon many points which have been obscured by the mists of tradition.

There will be some repetition from past issues but we feel this will be justified because it will make it possible for all of the exegetical and explanatory material to be contained in one volume which will be issued at the end of the year. It will be thoroughly indexed. It is our intention to strike at the very roots of the party spirit— the twisting of the word of God. Let the battle be fought upon the basis of what God said and what he obviously meant. The “moment of truth” has arrived in the encounter with orthodoxy. Let the truth be known!

In the meantime, our last two issues of this year will be the most challenging and interesting of any we have yet produced. They will be devoted wholly to answering questions we have received. Some of these questions deal with how we propose to work a reform without creating another division or sect; how we propose to implement our thinking practically in communities where division exists; how we hope to achieve a working unity as long as some use instrumental music; and what results, if any, are being seen as a result of our crusade. Other questions deal with our view of the nature of the church; with the problem of whether one who is in the one body can be a member of a denomination at the same time; whether baptism is to be made a test of fellowship; how those shall be regarded who have been sprinkled in all sincerity while thinking it constitutes baptism; how I regard the pious unimmersed; whether the validity of baptism depends upon one’s understanding at the time of immersion that it is for the remission of sins.

You need not concur with all I say about these things to be loved and revered as my brother. I can assure you that after reading the November and December issues there will be no question in your mind as to what I think about these matters. I intend to face up to them without evasion or equivocation. It is our honest opinion that if you miss the next two issues your loss will be tremendous, and if you miss the issues for 1965 it will be irreparable. Again we urge you to see that these issues are placed in the hands of every member of “the fellowship of the concerned ones.” Will you do your part to help share these vital messages in a world— and a religious movement— that so sadly needs them?

The Divine Provisions

Mission Messenger (October 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

As a functional being man operates in three realms— faith, knowledge and performance. The scope of the last will be determined by the other two. That which one believes and that which he knows will govern what he does. There is a difference between faith and knowledge. Knowledge is based upon personal experience, faith is based upon the experience of other persons. Both are based upon testimony, but knowledge is derived from the testimony of our own senses, while faith is based upon the testimony of other witnesses. If such witnesses meet the criteria of credibility demanded by our rational processes we proceed upon the basis of their testimony as confidently as we act upon the basis of our own experience. I know there is such a place as Saint Louis and I believe there is such a place as Beirut, but I would buy a plane ticket for either with the same degree of confidence.

God's design for man is to bring him into a fellowship perfected in love. He does not want a part of man but the whole man. In order to accomplish this he has provided all that is essential to a man's salvation and growth in grace. He has given him a perfect object of faith, a perfect source of knowledge and a perfect sphere of labor. This does not mean that man in his limitations of the fleshly nature will ever attain unto perfect faith, perfect knowledge or perfect performance. The provision is perfect, being divine; the apprehension of it is imperfect, being human. The supply will always be greater than the capacity. The wells of salvation will not be drawn dry by our human buckets. But we can quench our thirst and sustain life by what we daily assimilate.

1. The Person of Christ

The object of our faith is not a proposition, a dogma or doctrine. It is a person. All life, traced back to its source is personal. The ultimate of life is a person. It is not belief of a truth about Jesus, nor belief that a proposition related to Jesus is true, that produces life, but belief in Him as God's Son. It is not belief that he will show us the right way, but that he is the Way; not belief of a truth about him but that He is the Truth; not belief that He will give us life, but that He is the Life. When we give ourselves to Him we give ourselves to life. Life is not a thing given to us but a person to whom we give ourselves. "In him was life." When one of the apostles asked, "How can we know the way?" Jesus did not point to a book, an outline, chart or map. He simply said, "I am the way; I am the truth and I am the life; no one comes to the Father except by me."

It is a difficult thing for many to distinguish between the Savior and the scripture, since both are a divine revelation. The danger is that we will trust in the wrong one for salvation and this amounts to substituting knowledge for faith as the basis of our justification. The distinction lies in the fact that scripture is a revelation from God but Jesus is a revelation of God. There is a difference between a person and his thoughts. The scriptures reveal unto us what God thinks. Jesus reveals unto us God. It is the difference between what and Who! In the scriptures God communicates His thinking, in the person of Jesus He communicates His divine Self. He is Immanuel, that is, God with us!

The purpose of the scripture is not to give life but to point to Jesus as the Life. It is not through diligent study of the scriptures (although this is very important) that one has life, but by coming to Jesus. Jesus did not condemn study of the scriptures, but he placed the scriptures in proper perspective when he said, “You study the scriptures diligently, supposing that in them you have eternal life; yet, although their testimony points to me, you refuse to come to me for that life” (John 5:39, 40).

2. Perfection of Divine Communication

The scriptures contain a perfect revelation from the divine mind. I use the word “from” because I think the word “of” conveys a wrong impression. The perfection lies not in the idea that God has completely uncovered for us every thought in his mind. This would have served no purpose for the finite cannot comprehend the infinite, nor the limited embrace or encompass the unlimited. The perfection lies in the fact that every requirement essential to fulfillment of the divine purpose related to our salvation and spiritual growth has been met in the new covenant scriptures. All that man needs to know in his present state in order to please God he may learn from this revelation.

The new covenant scriptures set fourth a new way of serving God. The old way was by law. This was adapted to the state of men before faith came. Law exercises custodial care. It keeps men confined by prescribing limits. But grace holds us in by love for Christ. It keeps us together by drawing us to a common center. One acts as a police force, the other as a magnetic force. “But now having died to that which held us bound, we are discharged from the law, to serve God in a new way, the way of the spirit, in contrast to the old way, the way of a written code” (Romans 7:6). The greatest problem in every generation is with men who want to make the new covenant scriptures a written code. This is a sign of immaturity. There is a psychological basis for it.

Adolescents crave freedom and yet are frightened by it. Fearful of their inability to apply self-discipline, they crave inwardly for arbitrary discipline imposed by parents even as they appear outwardly to resent it. When God's people were minors he ruled them by law. "And so it was with us. During our minority we were slaves to the elemental spirits of the universe, but when the term was completed, God sent his own Son . . . to purchase freedom for the subjects of the law, in order that we might attain the stature of sons" (Gal. 4:3-6). Many apparently do not know that "the term was completed." They regard the old law as nailed to the cross and a new law as tacked on to Christ.

The new covenant scriptures are not a law of God imposed, but the will of God exposed. Our pattern is not a written code but a living Person. The scriptures tell me what God thinks and thus how Jesus would react if he were in my place. Their purpose is to help me develop that divine nature which will freely and automatically respond in every situation with the divine answer. God is not law but God is love. He has not given us a law but He has given us love for He has given Himself. His purpose is not to make of us great lawyers but great lovers. Law achieves its aim by crushing the spirit. Love fulfills its ideal by breaking the heart. The holy scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation by pointing us to Him who "became the source of eternal salvation for all who obey him" (Hebrews 5:9).

3. Purpose of Divine Community

God's called ones constitute a body. Every saved person is a member of this divine organism, a living, vital, functioning part of it. All that one needs to do to please God he can do as a member of this body. He need not create another organization, constitute another body, nor join a club, clique or clan, to further the purpose of God on earth. There is one body because there is one head. It is not the body which gives validity to the head, but the head which gives validity to the body in the service of God. “He is the head and on him the whole body depends” (Eph. 4:16). There is no spiritual validity in any body of which Jesus is not the sole head.

It is not as one works in conjunction with some of the members of the body in an exclusive organization that he fulfills God’s purpose, but as he works in harmony with all of them in the divine organism. The one body has parts, not parties. One need never join anything after God adds him to the church in order to function acceptably and walk well-pleasing before his God. All that God wants done in converting sinners and sanctifying the saved can be done by the one body. That which cannot be done by it is something God does want done in these areas. That which is not entered by baptism is not the one body and is not created by God to fulfill the divine purpose. “For indeed we were all brought into one body by baptism, in the one Spirit, whether we are Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free men, and that one Holy Spirit was poured out for all of us to drink” (2 Cor. 12:13).

The ekklesia is the brotherhood of all God’s children, the temple built of all the living stones, the flock containing all of the sheep, the priesthood embracing all of the priests, and the body containing all of the organs. “For Christ is like a single body with its many limbs and organs, which, many as they are, together make up one body” (1 Cor. 12:12). Ponder long upon that statement, “Christ is like a single body.”

The Peaceful Harvest

Mission Messenger (October 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

The writer of the letter to the Hebrews speaks of an honest life as a peaceful harvest. An honest life is one which does not recoil from nor tremble at the thought of scrutiny or examination from God or man. It is one in which the books are in balance and the accounts are in order. It appears the same color in the full glare of the sunlight as in the shadowy recesses of a room. Nothing is more conducive to peace and tranquillity than such a life. It enables one, like Longfellow's Village Blacksmith, to "look the whole world in the face, for he owes not any man."

That such a life is called a harvest presupposes at least two things— sowing and cultivation. An honest life must begin with the seeds of honesty, that is, with the aim to walk uprightly before God and man. But it is with the cultivation that we are primarily interested at this time. The entire passage reads, "Discipline, no doubt, is never pleasant; at the time it seems painful, but in the end it yields for those who have been trained by it the peaceful harvest of an honest life" (Hebrews 12:11). It is implied that the upright life is not a voluntary growth, it does not grow wild.

The process of cultivation is called discipline, and it is important that we note the expression "trained by it." It is unfortunate that the word "discipline" has come to have the connotation of punishment. We generally think of it as related to censure for some infraction of the law, or, at best, as a corrective measure applied in case of error. But the word means training. It is closely allied to disciple, a learner, and has to do with instruction given to develop a well-balanced life.

A soldier undergoes discipline as certainly when he is taught to stand erect, to go through the manual of arms, or to salute his superiors, as when he is assigned to kitchen police duty for a minor disobedience or oversight. The record declares that “discipline is never pleasant.” It is easier to slouch than to straighten up the back. “At the time it seems painful.” It would seem more pleasant to lie in bed than to be on a forced march or on the drill field, but soldiers can only be made through discipline. And the value of training is seen when men are under fire from the enemy. Many an army has been saved from defeat by respect for the word of an officer, or by fear of breaking rank. Heroism in a crisis is often but a natural reaction resulting from proper training.

There is a contrast between the expressions “at the time” and “in the end.” All true discipline looks toward the future. It is never the end but always the means to the end. Training, for training’s sake, becomes a hardship and a bore. One cultivates, not because he likes to work in the field but because of the crop which results from his labor. The inconvenience, the denial of self, the sacrifice of present preference for future good, all of these are justifiable only because of the coming reward.

All of this leads us to conclude that the approved life is “the disciplined life.” Jesus declared, “He that will come after me must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me.” Denial of self has to do with the negative phase of discipline, the daily resumption of the cross burden has to do with the positive side. Neither one is pleasant. Both seem painful at the time. But both are essential to the disciplined life. One should practice discipline to master his feelings and inclinations.

Paul said, “I run with a clear goal before me; I am a boxer who does not beat the air, I bruise my own body and make it know its master” (1 Cor. 9:26, 27).

If one is inclined to doze when he reads the scriptures in the evening he should fight sleep and resist the temptation to always lay the book down. A walk in the night air, a dash of cold water on the face— any justifiable measure to keep from giving in to self will be profitable. One who has formed the practice of sleeping late on the Lord’s Day should set the alarm and rise early for study and meditation. Discipline is practical in the regulation of diet, in the overcoming of habits, in resistance to the appeals of desire and appetite. One who always gives in will find it easy to give up. He who does not stand for anything will soon fall for everything. One cannot be a soldier for Christ and keep his civilian status. “Come, then, stiffen your drooping arms and shaking knees and keep your steps from wavering” (Hebrews 12:13).

Queries to the Editor

Mission Messenger (November 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

Experience has taught us that a great many people in the disciple brotherhood have questions about our plea for unity among the members of the various and dissident factions which have grown out of the restoration movement. Generally these questions follow a certain pattern and thus betoken a kindred concern. We think that brethren should be encouraged to question and even to doubt until they have seen convincing proof of the rightness of that for which we contend. We need to recapture the right to think without fear of reprisal and the right to differ without threat of derision. Here are a few of the questions we receive and our replies to them. Be certain that these replies are not delivered in a dogmatic spirit. You must feel no compulsion to agree contrary to conscience.

1. Why are you so concerned about the unity of believers in Christ?

Primarily because I consider myself to be incorporate with Christ so that which affects the extension of his kingdom on earth directly affects my life and thinking. In his prayer offered just before “he was delivered to death for our misdeeds,” he besought the Father that all who believe on him through the testimony of his chosen envoys might be one. He conditioned his acceptance by the world of mankind upon the unity of the believers. The world will be won to believe in Jesus when those who believe are one in Jesus.

It is unthinkable that those who love the Lord will not be actively engaged in promoting peace among all of God's children. This means the repairing of past breaches, elimination of present tensions, and provision against future schisms. It is the peacemakers who will be called the children of God. The apostle says, "Let Christ's peace be arbiter in your hearts: to this peace you were called as members of a single body" (Col. 3:15). Until we learn the secret of oneness in Christ most of our efforts on the far-flung mission fields of the earth will be wasted. The misguided world will not accept the message of the one Lord from a divided church.

2. Do you think the prayer of Jesus can be answered by restoring the restoration movement?

No, I do not. The restoration movement launched by the great heroes of the faith in the early part of the nineteenth century was simply a means to an end. It was never intended to be an end in itself. Alexander Campbell wrote, "We only profess to work and walk by the rules which will inevitably issue in a pure speech, and in right conceptions of that pure and holy, and celestial thing called Christianity—in faith, in sentiment, and in practice." It is too much to expect of these noble pioneers that they would be able to either discover or translate into practice all that was essential to the accomplishment of their aims. The restoration movement was vital precisely because it was a movement. To return to it at any given point and assert we had "arrived" would be folly. When a movement ceases to move it becomes a monument to past accomplishments and dead hopes.

Alexander Campbell did not believe he had all of the answers. He freely admitted that to enter some areas of consideration "we should have to launch upon a wide and tempestuous ocean, for which our slender bark is not at this time sufficiently equipped. This may yet deserve the construction of a larger vessel in a more propitious season.” Our task, as I conceive it, is not to restore a movement inaugurated by men but to recapture the ideal of God. We believe that in this we may be aided by restoring to our generation the spirit of the restoration movement. Even this must be regarded as a means to an end.

3. Is it correct to say that you are leading a movement to recapture the spirit of restoration?

No, that is not correct. I am not fitted, either by knowledge or native ability, to lead any type of movement among the disciples of our Lord. I have no ambitions in that respect and suffer from no illusions about the matter. I realize my personal shortcomings in education, talent and expression. Being sick of my previous factional attitude and experience, and realizing that the wranglings and bickerings of the party spirit as exhibited among the heirs of the restoration movement constitute a reversal of the purpose of that movement as well as a rejection of the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, I have resolved to oppose all factionalism as a work of the flesh.

I no longer represent or defend any faction, fragment, splinter or segment of the disciple brotherhood as “the faithful church” to the exclusion of others. I recognize that the brotherhood includes all who belong to the Father, wherever they may be. I accept as my brothers all whom he accepts as his children. I accept them upon exactly the same basis as he does. I simply state my views about these things as an individual. I do not seek to bind them upon anyone else. I love those who disagree with me as I do those who concur. So I’m not leading a movement, I’m simply walking with those who believe that the church of God is greater than any faction, segment or sect, and that we should recognize God’s sheep even when they are caught in strange thickets. I’m a sharer and not a leader.

4. Why do you feel so strongly that the spirit of restoration is essential in our present condition?

It seems only just and proper that we should apply to ourselves under the same circumstances the remedy which was recommended for others. In his Declaration and Address Thomas Campbell said, “We would desire to be at rest, and were it possible, would also desire to adopt and recommend such measures as would give rest to our brothers throughout all the churches— as would restore unity, peace and purity to the whole church of God. This desirable rest, however, we utterly despair to find for ourselves or to be able to recommend to our brethren, by continuing amid the diversity and rancor of party contentions, the veering uncertainty and clashings of human opinions; nor, indeed, can we reasonably expect to find it anywhere but in Christ and his simple word, which is the same yesterday, today and forever.”

The restoration spirit was born of a firm desire to unite God’s children who were scattered among the sects. Alexander Campbell wrote, “A deep and abiding impression that the power, the consolation and joys, the holiness and happiness, of Christ’s religion were lost in the forms and ceremonies, in the speculation and conjectures, in the feuds and bickerings of sects and schisms, originated a project many years ago for uniting the sects, or rather the Christians in all the sects, upon a clear and scriptural bond of union— upon having a ‘thus saith the Lord,’ either in express terms or approved precedent, ‘for every article of faith, and item of religious practice.’”

Today the heirs of the restoration movement constitute the most divided religious movement on the current American scene. If the restoration was the answer to the schismatic condition in 1809 it must also be in 1964. Unless we regain the spirit that motivated those who labored for the unity of all Christians we will divide ourselves out of existence as we have already divided ourselves out of influence in many places.

5. How do you account for the disintegration of the restoration movement?

We are exactly where our thinking has brought us. Those of us who live in this generation are victims of a philosophy adopted by our fathers which has now become traditional, sanctified by both time and practice. When confronted with certain innovations they devised a strategy of opposition which consisted of attempting to maintain purity of doctrine by separation from brethren. This was written in documentary form and read in 1889 under the title, "An Address and Declaration." It stated that those who did not renounce certain things would no longer be "regarded as brethren." This rejected paternity as the basis of fraternity and enthroned conformity in its stead. From this time forward one who differed with the party norm either had to be brought into subjection or be driven forth as a "heretic."

Eventually it came to pass that there was only one ultimate solution when differences of opinion arose and that was division. After division occurred there was but one approach to the problem and that was partisan debate. This created a vicious cycle. When brethren inside the movement began to debate with each other, their divisions increased the debates and the debates increased and deepened the divisions. In many localities so much bitterness and animosity was created that those on both sides could not treat others with common courtesy or civility.

6. You have engaged in a good many debates in the past. Why do you no longer regard debating as a proper method of approach to our problems?

It is true that I was once recognized as a sort of "champion" for that segment of the disciple brotherhood in which I was reared. Some of my good brethren insist that my debates accomplished a great deal of value to the cause. I think, however, that such public clashes between brethren have a great deal more potential for harm than otherwise. As a student of various reform movements I note that all of them seem to pass through this phase of rather violent encounter. It seems to be part of the “growing up” process until men can arrive at a degree of maturity where they can discuss differences in a calmer and more relaxed atmosphere. There are at least five reasons why I believe the type of confrontation generally referred to as “public debate” is inimical to our spiritual growth.

a. Such debates where two party champions are selected and thrown into the forensic arena serve to intensify party feelings instead of destroying them.

b. They tend to be divisive in their very nature as exhibited by the common question, “Which one are you for?” Those who have attended such debates are aware of how the adherents of each party even sit together, holding themselves physically aloof from their brethren who disagree.

c. They tend to make real, objective search for truth difficult, if not impossible. Each party expects its man to emerge a winner and no one ever loses a debate according to reports in partisan journals. This means that the word of God has been made a repository of controversial texts with which skilled men belabor each other to the applause of their partisan followers.

d. All such debates proceed on the fallacy that each faction is “the loyal church” which is a ridiculous assumption in the light of our many sections and cross-sections today. Actually, all debates engaged in by various splinter groups are simply skirmishes between factions and not wars between the church of God and armies of the aliens.

e. They demonstrate their futility to achieve the purpose of God by their fruits. Do not forget that this is the method we have employed for almost a century. Instead of promoting oneness it has made us one of the most divided movements in existence. If you would see the fruit of debates look at the divided state of brethren in the areas where they have been held. I have never known a difference to be settled by partisan debate. Shall we continue to prescribe a medicine which always makes the condition grow worse?

7. Do many of the brethren share your views about the inefficacy of debates?

More of them are beginning to do so. They are sickened and shocked by some of the spectacles to which they are subjected by partisan controversialists. They have seen reports in the papers filled with ridicule and half-truths and have witnessed communities of the saints blasted apart by men called in to “discuss” propositions. They are growing weary and ashamed of the whole sordid mess.

However, a great many think we cannot be “in fellowship” until we argue out every angle of every wrangle. They contend there can be no fraternity until we have first debated every action of every faction. This warped view results from the mistaken concept that one party is “the loyal church” and must “convert” all others to its every view and opinion before they can be regarded as “the Lord’s people.” This is a very childish idea but it is still held by some prominent men. It stems from a legalistic approach to God’s grace and as long as it is retained men will regard brethren who differ with them honestly as being pagans and unbelievers.

I do not want anyone else to represent me and I do not want to represent anyone else. No one else can answer for my views before the judgment seat of human opinion any more than before the judgment throne of God. I’m just not allied with any party or faction as a front man. No one is responsible for my convictions except myself, and I’m not seeking to get anyone else to “line up.” I shall not allow myself to be thrown into the arena as a party gladiator. I believe that thinking people in all factions are growing disgusted and sickened with the tactics of those who pose as debaters and are actually defenders of partisan orthodoxy!

8. How do you feel about the success of your efforts to promote peace among members of the various factions?

I rather suspect that I am inclined toward optimism but it seems to me that we are standing on the threshold of a brighter day in many areas. Several congregations which were divided have repaired the breach which existed and are now presenting a united witness in their respective communities. In a good many places brethren of various segments are meeting regularly for calm and measured discussion of differences on a local level. We have renounced the attitude that we have “arrived” while others have not. We now know that none of us has done so. This makes it possible for us to sit down as equals in our failure to maintain the peace. We are no longer concerned so much about “who split the log” as we are with how we can get it back together. We have shifted from the accusing “Who?” to the enquiring “How?”

One cannot measure the success of any effort by looking at a given area which is affected by it. He must survey the field as a whole. The factional spirit is much more entrenched in some places than in others. But brethren everywhere are being stimulated and challenged to think. We need not fear so long as men think. We should only fear when they quit thinking. Perhaps there has never been so much discussion of “fellowship” as there is right now. This is good for it is much better to discuss such a vital theme than some of the trivialities which have engaged our attention in the past. Out of the ferment of thought will come a better day for all of us. It is not possible that the progeny of peace be produced without the pangs of labor, but it is worth all that it costs.

I do not work for “success” at all. I simply plant or water and leave the matter of growth and increase to God. Peace is a fruit of the Spirit from seed sown by peacemakers. There is a difference between a pacemaker and a peacemaker. I’ve no inclination to set the pace. I’m content simply to sow the peace. If brethren concur with me I am grateful to them; if they do not they are still my brethren and I love them as such and am grateful to God for brotherhood which includes all that are in him. My whole philosophy is summed up in the remark about David, "After he had served God's purpose in his own generation he fell asleep." I cannot serve God's purpose in preceding generations. Our fathers did that the best they could. I cannot serve God's purpose in succeeding generations. That must be left to our children. I can serve that purpose in this generation and am content to leave it to future generations to profit by my failures and mistakes. I'm sure they will find many things to justly criticize. I think I can best serve by plucking up the thorns of dissension which have been sown and planting flowers in their stead.

9. What is the attitude of those with whom you have personally labored in the past?

We should remember that the reaction toward any revolutionary thinking is always the same in every faction or religious group. A study of history will reveal that no reform has ever been won easily. All of us are resistant to change. Most of us prefer the security of partisan walls and dogmatism to the freedom of the Spirit. We have been conditioned to life within the boundaries of orthodoxy. Those good brethren with whom I have always labored are no better and no worse than those in any other segment. For that reason their attitude toward me is what you'd generally find elsewhere.

All revolutionary thought— social, political, economical, or spiritual— produces both action and reaction. The latter develops as the first becomes evident and generally in proportion to it. Frequently the reactionary is more vocal as he wants it known that he is a "defender of the faith," i.e., of the partisan program of orthodoxy. All factions equate their partisan interpretations with the will of God. Very often those who amend their lives and thought as the result of the impact of new concepts say very little. In not a few cases it would be dangerous for them to make an open avowal and it would not avail a great deal under local conditions. But no external force can stifle thought.

The reaction of the brethren with whom I have always labored depends upon their attitude to the party with which we are affiliated. Those who regard that party as the one body to the exclusion of all others regard me as a dangerous heretic. They are frightened at the thought that the church may lose its identity. Of course they regard our faction as the church. It never occurs to them that there can be no possible means by which the church of God can lose its identity. Those who have caught a vision of the majesty and power and glory of the kingdom of heaven regard my own feeble efforts to explore the greater fellowship of the Spirit with a considerable degree of real joy. Many write that we are simply giving expression to the thoughts which have been welling up in their hearts for years.

I am not disturbed by opposition and I pray that I shall not be distracted by those who concur. I did research for six years after I became convinced that we had made another sect out of the restoration movement, before I ever wrote an article on fellowship. During that time I sought to steel my heart against the bitter attacks I knew would follow from many with whom I had labored. But one cannot always suppress truth in his heart and finally I began to write.

The reaction is not nearly so great as I anticipated although in some areas there is bitterness. I have been publicly assailed as a Judas Iscariot, a Benedict Arnold, and a messenger of Satan. These are extreme statements made by men who proceed from prejudicial motives. Most brethren are very kind and considerate even when they cannot agree. They realize that one must state his honest conviction and they would not want me to be a hypocrite just to stay in good with the party.

10. Are there not many who are reluctant to promote reform for fear that another division will result?

I think there are many such brethren and one cannot blame them a great deal. Every attempted reform in the past has produced another division and those reforms were urged by men who were much better and brighter than ourselves. It is a strange phenomenon that we seem to be grateful for reformatory cleavages of the past which paved the way for our existence but all of us want the reformation to stop with us. "This far and no farther shalt thou come!" We regard the severance created by Martin Luther as a noble and heroic step. Those whom he was trying to reform did not share that view at the time. We do not deplore the gulf created by Stone and the Campbells when driven from the Presbyterian and Baptist communions, but rather seem grateful for the result.

The real question, of course, is whether we shall maintain the status quo at all costs, even at that of suppressing truth, or whether we can really develop a sense of freedom and assume the responsibilities which go with it. Most people would prefer to be in bondage just a little. We like to be in green pastures but we want to be tethered in them so we can be brought up with a jerk when we reach the end of the partisan rope. We fear what lies beyond so we merely tread water close to shore so we can rush back to the factional beach if we are threatened. This kind of life does not appeal to me. It depresses the real spirit of adventure inherent in the Christ way. I am not afraid of the fellowship of the Spirit or where it will lead. I ask only for strength to follow for we need "fellowship" as well as fellowship. However, I do not envision another division over a plea for unity in Christ.

11. What is there about your proposal which you think will avoid division?

For one thing we are presenting our appeal for restoration of brotherhood in an age conditioned to laboring toward unity. The whole pattern of religious division has been reversed. The news media which once reported cleavages and splits as news are now giving great space to describing attempts to unify divergent sects. I grew up in a Lutheran background and when I was sprinkled by the Rev. Mr. Petersen in that communion, there were seventy different Lutheran groups in the United States with little fraternization between them. Today this has been reduced to eleven. There is a feeling of peace and unity in the air. None of us are wholly unaffected by circumstances surrounding us regardless of the attempted insulation of our life and thought.

The thinking world is sick and tired of religious squabbling and wrangling upon the part of those who claim to follow the Prince of peace. The littleness and bigotry which characterized the past cannot be tolerated in a world threatened by holocaust. It is in such a frame of reference we are granted the privilege of presenting the hope of genuine fellowship in the Spirit with all of God's children and our brethren. Never has there been a more propitious season for sharing with mankind the fundamental message of the Spirit. It is to be regretted that so much time must be spent in calling back together the divergent forces of restoration but we cannot well proclaim peace effectively while we practice division. I am sure that most of us would be happy to see our brethren united.

However, there is one vital factor about our proposal that can avoid formation of another party and preclude division within the ranks of the heirs of the restoration movement. We are urging everyone to stay where he is. When one learns a new truth let him not desert those brethren with whom he has grown up and go join a party which holds his view. Let him stay and act as leaven in that area where he is best known and where he has influence. Let him remain with his brethren and not become arrayed against them.

Previous attempts at restoration of fellowship have been based on the fallacy that one of our factions is "the loyal church." This is a myth. It has no foundation in fact. So long as men hold that fallacious view they will move from party to party seeking “the faithful group.” Generally, when they become disillusioned they will create another faction of their own in the vain hope that they are “restoring the true church.” They only add to the confusion.

So long as we are divided no faction is the faithful church. When one is in schism all are in schism. One can be in a faction without being factional. He can be in a sect without being sectarian. We urge no one to leave where he is except those who are out of Christ Jesus. We invite no one to come into anything except those who are not in the one body. Let us stay where God has called us in that body and be a part of “the fellowship of the concerned ones.” If our brethren are wrong about some things they need us most. It is a poor doctor who deserts the hospital to spend all of his time with the healthy members at the country club. No one can start another party in the restoration movement framework if everyone just stays put. In time the parties now existing will melt away. An iceberg can be removed much more easily by the sun than by men with ice picks!

12. If every person remains where he is will we not always have our present quota of factions?

Indeed not. When we reverse our past procedure and cease to divide in the vain attempt to protect doctrinal purity by such means, not only will there be no new factions formed but the old ones will gradually cease to have relevance for our time. We have been victims of “the will to divide” and when we crucify this attitude we will find a tremendous change taking place. The very recognition that we can remain together in spite of differences will act as a tremendous catalyst in our lives.

All reformation is effected from within. When we withdraw from a party with which we have been affiliated we lose our influence for good in that party. After that any attack against their partisan spirit by ourselves will be from without and regarded as on a partisan basis. This will create a spontaneous resistance. Our task should not be to win men to “our side” but to take them by the hand and move with them closer to the side of Christ. No man can take another by the hand while his own is a clenched fist. If the fellowship of the concerned ones will retain their concern for unity and remain where they are and let their influence radiate forth they will be much more effective than if they all withdrew and formed a new “radiation party.” We need to learn how to differ without devising parties to promote our differences. If we do this the factional spirit will die out and our factions will dissolve and disappear. When men learn how not to be factional there will be no more factions.

13. Does this mean that divergent congregations in a locality will all drop their differences and come together to form one large congregation?

I am not sure what pattern will be followed in every place. I doubt that it will be universally uniform. It will depend a great deal upon temperamental and psychological factors as well as traditional attitudes. We should not seek to bind a procedure upon every locality regardless of its circumstances. I am of the opinion that in most places it would be better for the congregations to continue meeting where they are and to carry on the corporate worship in the manner to which they are accustomed or which commends itself to their consciences in the sight of God. Let the congregations respect each other as brethren and not regard themselves as bitter rivals. A proper appreciation of the autonomy of the congregations will enable us to do this without sense of compromise.

If a congregation prefers to use one cup under the conviction that this best enables them to implement the Master’s design for the Supper, let them continue to do so without discrediting those whose sincere convictions lead them to do otherwise. If a congregation prefers to carry on their teaching program without Bible classes let them do so but abstain from harsh judgment of their brethren who feel it is no violation of the spirit of Christianity. Above all else let the peace of God rule in our hearts until we will not carry on partisan attacks against each other publicly by radio or otherwise. We have a common enemy to fight which threatens us all. We ought not to waste our energies and expend our resources in fighting each other. It is noticeable that many of our points of difference have to do with matters pertaining to the Lord's Day service. There are many other meetings in which all could participate and present a united witness to the world and we ought not to cut ourselves off from mutual sharing in these. All of our current factions have something of value to contribute to the others. We need to cultivate occasions in which such mutual sharing may take place. At such times we might well avoid controversial issues and "follow after the things which make for peace and wherewith one may build up another." Certainly this is a scriptural injunction!

14. Do you apply this same reasoning to congregations which use instrumental music?

Indeed I do. I would not know how to be consistent and do otherwise. Those who use the instrument in their corporate worship are my brethren in Christ. We are all children of the same Father. From my study I have become convinced that I cannot conscientiously make the plea I do and condone the use of the instrument. Their study leads them to an opposite conclusion. If a congregation of disciples chooses to use the instrument as an aid I must respect their right to make a choice based upon their study, although I may not personally endorse the choice they make. But they are not answerable to me nor to the congregation with which I am affiliated and they enjoy the same autonomy as we do.

Brotherhood in Christ is not based upon instrumental music, classes, cups, or upon an attitude toward any of these things. I am obligated to love all of my brethren. I am not obligated to love the things they adopt. The Bible does not say, "For this is the message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another, unless one believes in instrumental music." I hold myself free to join with any of my brethren in those areas of service where I am not required to violate my personal convictions. I shall not allow brotherhood to be negated or destroyed by something to which it is not related. I shall not refuse to aid my brethren in Christ Jesus in any respect simply because we differ in some respects. I have no half-brothers or step-brothers in the Lord. We have paid lip-service to local autonomy while rejecting it in practice. Our motto seems to be, "Each congregation has a right to make its own decisions provided they are identical with the ones we make."

15. Are there any indications that members of the various factions are actually re-thinking their positions?

Yes, there are. Our mail indicates that many thinking people in every segment of the disciple brotherhood are intensely interested in what is being written. Many of these have been conscience-ridden for a long time over the substitution of orthodoxy for the freedom of the sacred scriptures. They have chafed under the narrow restraints of the party and looked upon the "holier-than-thou" attitude as being repugnant to their own Christian idealism.

It is obvious that a transformation of a cultural and intellectual nature is taking place in the more extreme segments. There was a time when the visiting preacher who held the annual meeting, defective as he was in scholarship, was still better educated than any others within the congregations. Now, with our change from an agrarian to an urban society and with a migration from rural to metropolitan areas, children are receiving a better education. College training is now available to most all of those who desire it. As a result, the preacher who holds "the meeting" is often one of the least educated in some congregations. Minds trained to reason by logical formal process can no longer accept without question the dogmatic wresting of scriptures to fit partisan sermon outlines. Things which seemed of such vital importance in a simpler day lose their relevance in a complex society threatened with destruction. Splitting hairs is hardly a rewarding occupation for one who is about to lose his hair by being scalped. Losing one's head over a fine point of theological discrimination does not appeal to one who may literally lose it by nuclear explosion.

I think it is not unjust or unfair to state that in many instances the "professional" preachers will be the last to alter their views. The congregations will generally seek to "hold the line" against any tendency to enjoy a wider fellowship. Such a participation in the Spirit will be termed "liberalism" and "compromise" and those who derive their livelihood from the party treasury will be afraid to give voice to any real charitable feeling for others. But in every congregation there will arise noble and generous souls who will quietly and effectively work as leaven to usher in a more benevolent spirit. These are the real heroes and heroines for Jesus in our day for they must endure the maligning of their motives by those whom they love in the Lord.

There is no question but what "the fellowship of the concerned" now has adherents in every faction. Many of these, because of local circumstances, are doomed to silence temporarily. The day is coming when they can be heard. What we are experiencing is the first thaw after a long winter of icy partisanship. The first drops from a glacier warmed by the sun seem inconsequential until one sees tiny rivulets from every direction worming their way around obstacles and flowing toward each other. When enough of these meet they form a mighty river refusing to be held in check by artificial barriers. We are fortunate enough to be able to see the initial gathering of those forces which will some day become a broad river of fellowship flowing toward the distant sea of destiny. This I believe!

16. If there is merit in your proposals for fellowship why do not the educational leaders and teachers in the colleges endorse it?

I think that a goodly number of these brethren are in sympathy with much that we are saying and doing. There are several reasons why they do not openly commit themselves. Some of them are skeptical about me and my motives. They find it difficult to believe that I am sincere. They have known of my previous factional disposition and they are still fearful that I have “something up my sleeve.” They are afraid that we are simply employing a ruse or stratagem to eventually divide and disrupt the brethren over other issues. The fact that I refuse to align myself with any party as a factional tool creates a problem. It is hard to deal with one who loves all of his brethren and simply refuses to recognize any of the lines they have drawn or the barriers they have erected against each other.

Another thing that may have some bearing on the question is that I do not employ the specialized terms with which textbooks in philosophy and advanced education are filled. I write in simple language because I would find it difficult to do otherwise. This type of writing is also best adapted to achieve our purpose which is to stimulate the thinking of all of our brothers and sisters and not that of a specific caste. I suspect that those who are accustomed to a more profound and erudite approach consider what we are doing as rather naive and unpretentious. Perhaps they regard it as relatively harmless and insignificant. But all reforms and revolutions begin at “the grass root level.” They can never be effected merely by an appeal to a higher echelon. Jesus said, “Feed my sheep.” He did not say, “Feed my giraffes.”

Too, we must remember that religious seminaries and parochial schools are not created primarily for education but for indoctrination. They are supported by a certain segment to defend a partisan concept or position. Even among the noninstrument brethren there are three distinct kinds of schools. Those who have adopted the pre-millennial interpretation, those who make a test of fellowship out of opposition to charitable organizations and brotherhood propaganda devices, and those who represent the orthodox “Church of Christ” viewpoint— all of these have their own brand of colleges. Not only does this make for rivalry but it also limits the academic freedom of the teachers in all of them. A great many brilliant and consecrated men and women must sublimate their own scholarship and personal convictions to conform to the party norm or be subjected to dismissal.

The schools are ever in a precarious position as are all party organs. They are subject to whispering campaigns and veiled attacks. They are faced with “foes without and fears within.” The teacher who will not be content with enforced mediocrity but who dares to rise above the partisan confines and restraints in his teaching will eventually be hounded down and out by “heretic detectors”— generally preachers or editors, the self-appointed censors of the faith. In such a state of affairs the administration must tread carefully. The men who form the administration have been hired to do a job and it consists of keeping the school “safely in line.”

It is obvious that many of the original thinkers on the faculties of all of these schools have long since banished from their minds the idea that “The Church of Christ” is the one body to the exclusion of all other persons on earth. They realize that the kingdom of heaven is more majestic and mighty than our strife-torn factions. However, they are dealing with students who are often immature. Their classes are drawn from every type of home and community and the teachers dare not disturb the status quo which the parents demand and for which they pay. In spite of this, principles can often be enunciated which will enable the students to reason themselves out of narrow orthodoxy as they mature. I suspect it is only upon this basis that some instructors can gain the consent of troubled conscience to remain within the partisan framework.

Although I am personally skeptical about seminaries and parochial schools, seeing they must inevitably contribute to the parochial and provincial viewpoint by their very nature and purpose, I must acknowledge a debt of gratitude to a great many fine and wonderful brethren who have been in administrative and faculty posts within them. It was, for instance, from Bro. J. N. Armstrong, former president of Harding College, that I borrowed the trenchant statement: "I am resolved to make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation."

I am indebted to M. C. Kurfees for the following concept which he enunciated in the Abilene Christian College Lectures: "In the present divided state of the church and under the influence of parlance growing out of a denominational environment, it is difficult to avoid being sectarian or denominational in our speech; and hence there is a growing tendency today to sectarianize even the term 'church of Christ.' This is invariably the case when it is used, as it frequently is nowadays, to mean merely those people of God who do not work through missionary societies and do not use instrumental music in the worship, and to exclude other children of God who make the mistake of working and worshiping in the said ways. The church of Christ in any city today, using the term in accordance with Bible usage, includes all the children of God in the said city; and until these principles are observed, the primitive church, in its constitution, its doctrine, its faith, and its practice will never be restored."

No doubt there are brethren in all of the schools who share the views expressed so forcibly and well by Bro. Armstrong and Bro. Kurfees. I'm certain that all such rejoice in the tenor of the plea we are making although they are not in a position to publicly declare it. It is not necessary that they do so. We are not seeking to build up a personal following. We are content when men shall believe the truth and implement it in their lives according to their own dispositions and determinations. We cannot all work the same way and God does not intend for us to do so.

I am confident that many of the educators are often embarrassed by the narrow and provincial image of the church projected by self-appointed “guardians of orthodoxy” who rush into print or burst into vocal declamation with all of the old cliches, outworn slogans and misapplication of scriptures, which they have inherited from partisan fathers. But a better day is dawning. Hundreds of younger men and women are thinking for themselves. There will be a revival of the spirit of free investigation. We welcome it and it is long overdue. Truth has nothing to fear from research. Let the truth be known! Let it be followed regardless of where it leads, for one cannot go wrong who follows the pathway of truth.

17. Do you anticipate any increased active opposition to your plea for unity and fellowship?

Yes, I think we may expect such opposition. There are indications of a growing antagonism to the suggestions we have made. In the final analysis this will prove to be good. There should be a careful scrutiny of all that is said or written on such a vital and important theme. We are not unaware of the implications of what we have been saying. These things either contain one of the brightest rays of hope for the distressed and divided church today, or they pose one of the greatest threats to its survival.

If the church of God includes all of the people of God; and if it is composed of all the sincere immersed believers in Christ Jesus on the earth; and if all of these should recognize each other as being in the fellowship; what we are writing will make it possible for us to recapture the glory of the kingdom as it affects our lives in this generation.

But if the church for which Jesus died is to be equated solely and exclusively with an outgrowth of the American restoration movement operating under the title “The Church of Christ;” and if fellowship with God is to be conditioned upon a certain attitude toward instrumental music, cups, colleges, or classes, what we say will destroy the church. It is our intention to lift fellowship out of the realm of opinion about things and place it on the plane of sharing in the life of the Spirit.

We refuse to regard the one body as a modern faction or complex of factions. We esteem the kingdom of God over which Jesus rules as being greater than any sect, denomination, faction, fragment, splinter or segment, currently in existence. It is greater than all of them taken together.

Because we believe that the purpose of God will be fulfilled and the prayer of Jesus will be answered, we are content to labor and to wait. The impact of what is now being said will not be fully felt in this generation alone. We are willing to allow the history, as yet unwritten, to bring in the verdict as to its validity. That is why it is possible to love those who disagree with us and regard without rancor those who oppose what we suggest and recommend. In God’s tomorrow, the hope of all of us for unity will be realized and the prayer of all of us for increased knowledge of fellowship will be answered. Then all of us will be able to see more clearly what He knew from the very beginning.

Editor’s Note. We have received a number of questions recently asking for a clarification of our position as to who may be considered a child of God. Although we have considered this matter frequently and at length in the past, we recognize that there are many new readers who have not seen our position in print, and many older ones who have difficulty in understanding. Accordingly, we shall continue to answer questions in our next issue, and especially questions relating to how we should regard baptism, and how we should treat sincere believers who have never as yet been immersed into our Lord Jesus Christ. We trust that you will share this issue and the next with friends and brethren who are in “the fellowship of the concerned ones.”

Questions to the Editor

Mission Messenger (December 1964)

Volume 26

[Abstract]

In our previous issue we attempted an answer to a number of questions related to the plea which we have been making for the unity of the believers in our Lord Jesus Christ. We have deemed it appropriate to continue this form of writing that we may publicly reply to other questions which we frequently hear. Our purpose in doing so is simply to clarify our own viewpoint. We have no intention of being arbitrary or dogmatic. We do not seek to bind these ideas upon others. They represent our individual approach to some of the problems of our day based upon our feeble knowledge of the inspired word. That we will give an account for what we write we do not doubt and so we speak in reverence for God and with utmost respect for those who differ with us.

1. What do you believe about the constituency of the church?

The word “church” is a translation of ekklesia, a combined form which means “called out.” The church consists of all who are called out of a life of sin and into Christ. Anyone who has heard the call and responded to it is in the church. The call is issued in the form of Good News or Glad Tidings. The term generally used to designate it is “the gospel.” Paul declares that “God chose you from the beginning to be saved through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth. To this he called you through our gospel, so that you may obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Thess. 2:13, 14).

Everyone who is called is a member of the one body. “And let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts, to which indeed you were called in the one body” (Col. 3:15). Because the one body consists of the called ones it is the ekklesia, the called out, the church. The church is composed of all the “holy brethren, who share in a heavenly call” (Hebrews 3:1). Every saved person on earth is in the church, being added to it in response to the call of God. The church is not an organization but a divine organism created by God. It is the corporate existence of God’s own people who have been called out of darkness. “But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (1 Pet. 2:9). Every person who has forsaken the realm of darkness and crossed the frontier into the domain of light in response to the divine call is in the church. All such persons are God’s own people.

2. Do you make a distinction between the church and “The Church of Christ”?

It is regrettable that such a distinction is necessary but in this age of sectarianism it must be made. The term “Church of Christ” in many localities is applied only to those of God’s people who do not use instrumental music. It is an exclusive title adopted to distinguish its adherents from other members of God’s family. The word “church” as used by the Holy Spirit was never so employed. In a universal sense it was used to include every sincere immersed believer on earth. In a local sense it was used to include every such person in the city or district. These might be divided and fall short of God’s ideal but they still constituted the church of God. As defective in principle and practice as were the members at Corinth they were still “the church of God which is at Corinth” (1 Cor. 1:2).

“The Church of Christ” is a twentieth century outgrowth of a nineteenth century restoration movement. Originally, the members engaged in the movement were known simply as Christians, reformers, or disciples. They were designated by those around them as the Christian Church. When division occurred among these as a result of the introduction of the missionary society and instrumental music, those who opposed these things began to use the term “Church of Christ” to distinguish themselves from the others. This was given official recognition for the first time in the government census of 1906. It is evident that not all of those called by God are in “The Church of Christ” but they are all, without exception, in the church of Christ. When I speak about the church in Saint Louis I include in my concept every sincere immersed believer in the Lord regardless of the unfortunate circumstances which have divided us. The church of God is the kingdom of heaven on the earth and it is much larger than any segment, splinter or portion of our tragically divided world.

3. Do you consider that there may be Christians in the various sects?

Indeed I do. God’s sheep still constitute a scattered flock insofar as physical unity is concerned. They have not all been gathered into one corral. A Christian is one who is “in Christ” and those who have been immersed into Christ are in him. Unfortunately, not all of them are Christians only. Some are “special brands” of Christians. God no more wants us to be “Church of Christ Christians” than any other kind. It is because of our sectarian and exclusivist attitude that we have not been more successful in uniting all of God’s people in a working relationship.

David Lipscomb said, “There are some in sectarian churches who will obey God and follow him in spite of the churches in which they find themselves. As examples, there are persons in the Baptist, Methodist, and Presbyterian churches who are baptized to obey God rather than to please the sects. In this they rise above the sectarian spirit, despite the parties in which they find themselves. They ought to get out of the sectarian churches, but they see so much sectarianism in the nonsectarian churches that they think they are all alike.”

None of the early leaders of the restoration movement doubted that there were Christians in the sects. Alexander Campbell called it “a project to unite the Christians in all the sects.” Benjamin Franklin wrote, “That there are Christians among the sects, a people of God in Babylon, we have believed and admitted, and committed to print many years ago, and we believe the same now. That these have a right to commune and enjoy in common with all Christians, all the blessings of the house of the Lord, we presume is not doubted by any brother.”

Jesse P. Sewell, in a speech entitled “Our Plea Stated” made at the Abilene Christian College Lectures said, in reply to the accusation that we claim to be the only Christians in the world, “We do not; we claim to be Christians only, and our plea is that all believers should be Christians only, and not denominational Christians.” We quote from these men, not because we recognize them as authorities in religion, but for two very good reasons. In the first place, they were qualified to state the purpose and attitude governing our brethren in the inception of the restoration movement; in the second place, they prove that the modern, novel and unique view that there are no Christians in the sects is a development of late twentieth century Church-of-Christ-ism. Incidentally, it is proof of how far we have come in the acceptance of a sectarian attitude.

4. Does the new testament ever imply that anyone who was a member of the church of Christ belonged to a denomination at the same time?

Yes, indeed it does. Nothing is more clearly taught. Of course such action was condemned as it ought always to be but it shows that one can be in the one body while in a denomination. We ought to distinguish between “a denomination” and “a sect.” Our English word sect is probably from the Latin secta, which is derived from sequi. This is the root word from which we get “sequence” which means “to follow.” In our Bibles the word “sect” is a translation of the Greek hairesis, a party. The word “denomination” is from the Latin denominare, to name, to give a title to, to denominate. Any religious group which adopts a specific name or title as a means of distinction is a denomination.

There were four denominations among the saints in Corinth. There were parties of Apollosites, Cephasites, Paulites and Christ-ites. That these called themselves after the names of men, and were therefore denominations, is evident from the question, “Were you baptized in the name of Paul?” The Christ-ites formed an exclusive party to separate themselves from the other saints but it is just as sinful to create a sect under the name of Christ as any other name. It was to the members of this party that Paul wrote, “Look facts in the face. Someone is convinced, is he, that he belongs to Christ? Let him think again, and reflect that we belong to Christ as much as he does” (2 Cor. 10:7).

Now all of the members of these denominations were in the church of God (1 Cor. 1:2) and constituted the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:27). They were saints of God (1:2); brethren (1:10, 11); beloved children (4:14); and Paul’s “workmanship in the Lord” (9:1). They were babes in Christ (3:1); God’s field and building (3:9); the temple of God (3:17); and they were Christ’s (3:23). They had received the gospel (15:1); they had been called into the fellowship (1:9); and they were inside the church (5:12). The apostle commended them for remembering him in everything and keeping the traditions he had delivered to them (11:2), and at the same time condemned them for their schismatic state and sectism (11:17).

It should be noted that in 11:18 the apostle says, “I hear there are divisions (schisms) among you,” while in the next verse he says, “For there must be factions (sects) among you in order that those who are genuine among you may be recognized.” The members of the church of God in Corinth were in denominations of their own creation and these denominations were sects. They were trying to divide Christ up and parcel him out among themselves. The apostle asks, “Is Christ divided?” The word “divided” is from meros which means, “to apportion out, to distribute, to share with.” It is used in Hebrews 7:2, “And to him Abraham apportioned a tenth part of everything.” Since Jesus is the head of the one body he cannot be made a tribal chieftain or party prince. The denominational attitude of the saints in Corinth reflected their immaturity and sensuality (3:1-4).

There is one good accruing from sects in the church of God — those who are genuine among you may be recognized. Who are the genuine ones in the midst of a sectarian condition? I take it that Paul would be one of these and from him we learn that to be genuine is simply to ignore the party walls and barriers and to recognize all of the members of the church of God as beloved children and brethren. Paul did not ally himself with any of the denominations among the saints at Corinth. He remained free of all of them. He did not allow one party to pit him against another. That is exactly my position and I intend to adhere to it by the help of God. I will commend what I can among all the brethren. What I cannot commend I will not. But I will not allow myself to be separated from any of God’s children and my brethren, regardless of what sect or denomination they may be in.

5. What must one do to become a child of God?

He must be born again. We have already said that the ekklesia is composed of the “called out ones.” The call is issued through the gospel and when one hears the gospel and responds to it, he becomes one of God’s people, a child of God. The proper response to the gospel is the same as it has always been to any divine message— faith and obedience. The fact which one must believe is that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. Belief of this fact enables one to enter into that state where he has life through the name of Jesus (John 20:30, 31). The one act of obedience required to validate that faith and transfer one into that state is immersion in water. Thus when Jesus commissioned his envoys to take the Good News to the world he declared, "He who believes and is baptized will be saved."

It seems to me that Galatians 3:26, 27, is very explicit as to what is required to be a son of God. "For in Christ Jesus you are all sons of God, through faith. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ." I accept this at its face value and must conclude that as many as have not been baptized into Christ have not put him on. To think otherwise would be to deny the very force of the language employed by the Holy Spirit. On the other hand, I am obligated to accept as a son of God every person who by faith in Jesus is led to be immersed into him. I dare not deny either the necessity or the validity of baptism conditioned on faith in Jesus. To do the first is to become broader than God's word; to do the second is to become narrower than his word. I accept the fact that "by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body" (1 Cor. 12:12) and I regard as a member of that body every sincere immersed believer who has been baptized because of his faith in Christ, regardless of who baptizes him. Such a person has "obeyed the gospel."

6. Do you regard as in the fellowship those who have been sprinkled under the sincere conviction that this is scriptural baptism?

No, I do not. This problem never occurred in the primitive ekklesia. It is post-apostolic and is the result of substituting the authority of man for the revelation of God. I have a very deep love and respect for all those who are earnestly seeking to do the will of God and have mistaken views about the implementation of that will. I do not say that all of these will be lost for I do not know how God will judge those who are walking in the light that is presently available to them. I hold some opinions relative to the matter. If God sees fit by extension of mercy to grant unto all of them an eternal abode with him I shall rejoice with joy exceeding and full of gladness.

However, all that I say and do must be under the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ (Col. 3:17). He has conditioned discipleship in him upon belief and baptism. It is one thing for God to receive a person into heaven, a wholly different thing for us to receive him into the fellowship on earth. Baptism was not announced as a condition of entrance into heaven but as a means of access to the one body. The record says, "So those who received his word were baptized . . . and they continued devotedly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship . . ." (Acts 2:41, 42). I shall recognize as in the fellowship all who have been baptized upon reception of the Message. Since these all continued in "the breaking of the bread and in the prayers" I will break bread with the baptized believers and pray with them and call upon them to pray.

Now when I speak of baptism I mean identically what Jesus meant when he enjoined faith and baptism. I mean exactly what Peter meant when he told those who heard to repent and be baptized. I mean precisely what Paul meant when he said we were buried with Christ in baptism. If I mean something else then it is not baptism at all, but something else. Sprinkling is not baptism. Baptism is from baptizo; sprinkling from rantizo. One who is sprinkled is not baptized at all. He is rantized, and nowhere are we instructed to receive those who believe and are rantized as being in the fellowship.

I do not wish to be harsh and uncharitable. I love every sincere soul who is seeking to do the Master's will but I do not believe that we can do his will by doing something else. I do not believe that time sanctifies error nor that confusion transmutes wrong into right. The will of God is precious to me and I would gladly recognize as his children all who have not been baptized if I became convinced that he did so. I know his will by his word. It seems to teach plainly that only those who are baptized into Christ are sons of God. I accept that humbly and sincerely.

7. Is it possible that a sincere person who is sprinkled in the belief that it is baptism is a Christian in essence?

Obviously the answer would have to depend upon the meanings attached to the words “Christian” and “essence.” One of the tragic things about our age is that we have taken the vocabulary of the Spirit, and modified, amended and extended it until we have attached ideas that are utterly foreign to the words used by the Spirit. It is not enough to recapture the language but we must also restore the meaning conveyed in such language by the Spirit. A good example is the word “Christian” which we use so freely as a modifier. We talk glibly about a Christian nation, Christian schools, Christian baptism and Christian commitment. To imply, therefore, that a sincerely religious person may not be a Christian is an insult and an affront. We equate the term with a certain kind of character or life. God forbid that I should be discourteous or uncivil to any person who seeks to follow my Master.

But the word “Christian” in a scriptural sense refers to one who is in Christ. It designates a citizen of the kingdom, one who has been naturalized and adopted into that relationship which is called “the fellowship.” No one was ever regarded as a Christian in the new covenant frame of reference except an immersed penitent believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. If we are to apply the term to any others in any fashion we must do so without scriptural sanction. It is a grave question with me whether we can be true to our commitment to the Master if we “water down” the language of His word in order not to appear tactless or illiberal. We should follow “the pattern of sound words.”

The word “essence” as used in this question is a term of scholastic philosophy derived from the Latin essentia. I must confess to a natural suspicion of such words because they are generally “plausible words of wisdom.” Paul declared that his speech and message were devoid of these. “Essence is employed to denote the constituent qualities which go to make up an object or class of objects without which they would not be what they are. Hence it denotes the character which belongs to the class or common nature as distinguished from the accidents or individual varieties in the members of that class.” Since fellowship in Christ is a definite state or condition into which we are called one does not enter it by exhibiting a certain quality of character, but by obedience to a positive command. This in no sense undervalues such character but simply places it in its proper position. We should rejoice at every manifestation of the ethical and moral values announced and exemplified by our Lord. The fact that these are exhibited by those who are not in him only serves to show the universal recognition of the value of the life of the Son of God.

An alien who resides in America may pattern his conduct after “the American way of life” and some may refer to him as “an American in essence.” However, he is not entitled to the right of franchise nor to any other right or privilege accruing from citizenship. If, in his eagerness to become a citizen, and as a result of mistaken advice, he does something other than that required to attain unto citizenship, he still is not a citizen. He will never become one until he follows the procedure prescribed by the sovereign authority. It is not Christians in essence but Christians in fact who form the one body. It is a point worth considering whether one is a Christian at all who is not one in fact.

8. Are you not inconsistent in drawing a line of fellowship at baptism?

I am not drawing a line at all. I simply recognize the line which God has drawn. There must be a point at which one crosses the frontier from the domain of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son. It is my conviction that only God can specify that juncture at which sins are remitted and one is raised to walk in a new life. I have no right whatsoever to dictate or suggest where the crossing is located. It is the divine prerogative to do this and when it has been done all I can do is to point men to the place and conditions authorized by God. Jesus said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Peter said, "Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins."

I have never said there was no line at which fellowship begins. That would be ridiculous. I have only said that I would make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. I believe that God has made baptism a condition of salvation from our past life of sin, otherwise the words of Jesus in the apostolic commission would be meaningless. I do not think there was a single unimmersed person in any congregation of the saints referred to in the new covenant scriptures. God has drawn a line between his children and the world. We need to recognize it and respect it. But he has forbidden his children to divide and draw lines against each other in Christ. For that reason I refuse to recognize or respect the validity of those lines which have been drawn by their various opinions and human interpretations. It is one thing to be separated from those who are not in Christ Jesus and a wholly different thing to be separated from those who are.

9. How do you regard those who believe in Jesus as the Son of God but who do not as yet understand the necessity of being immersed?

I regard them as having been begotten but not yet born. They are still "in the womb" but they have not yet been delivered. The gospel is the seed by which we are begotten and under the law of principal and agent one may be regarded as a father who first implants this seed (1 Cor. 4:14, 15). The offspring of God exist in embryonic and foetal form before they are children unless we conclude that belief of the gospel and baptism are one and the same act, or that they occur simultaneously in every case. All who believe the Message but have not yet been delivered through baptism, are God's children in prospect and my brethren in prospect. My work, as regards them, is to act as a spiritual midwife or obstetrician. I should stimulate and encourage their foetal growth until they reach the proper time for birth, and then aid in their delivery, through immersion, into the family relationship.

I will gain nothing by assaulting them or abusing them because they have not yet been born. This might tend to an injury resulting in an abortion or miscarriage. I should admit their paternity and create a proper atmosphere of respect and love in which they may be gently led to fulfillment of God's program for our lives. They can no more participate in family activities, deliberations and decisions, than any other foetus, but they should be nourished and nurtured in kindness and tenderness. "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God and he that loves the one who begets loves those who are begotten of him" (1 John 5:1).

10. Does not the word for "begotten" in this verse embrace the whole process of birth?

Not at all. Some superficial scholars of our day may so interpret it but the idea that one is "born of God" is not in the original Greek scriptures at all. In 1 John 2:29, the King James Version reads, "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that everyone that doeth righteousness is born of him." Dr. James Macknight renders the passage, "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that everyone who worketh righteousness hath been begotten of him." In explanation he says, "This is the literal significance of gegennetai from gennao, I beget. Accordingly our translators have so rendered the word, chap. 5:18. Besides, born of God is an idea nowhere else found in scripture."

Consistent with this statement and proper Greek usage, he translates 1 John 5:1, “Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, hath been begotten of God; and every one who loveth the begetter, loveth also the begotten of him.” One is begotten by his father but not born of him and the begetting precedes the birth, else he is born dead. Birth does not confer life, it simply changes the state of the subject.

The whole problem of exegesis stems from the fact that we have separate English words for two phases— beget and bear. The Greeks had only one word, gennao. But they did not use the word indiscriminately nor did they confound the distinctions as do a lot of casual readers today. The Holy Spirit used gennao 97 times and it is translated begat or begotten 49 times, and born 39 times. In Matthew 1:1-16 it is found 39 times and is translated begat in every instance. To substitute the word born in either of these would be to make the rendering absurd and ridiculous.

The first place in the new covenant scriptures where it is translated born is Matthew 1:16, and the change is obviously necessary. In this verse gennao appears twice. Once it is rendered begat and once born and neither rendering can be substituted for the other. “And Jacob begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ.” It would be incongruous to read this, “And Jacob born Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was begat Jesus who is called Christ” One is not born of the person who begets him, nor is he begotten of the one who bears him. We should not confuse language in our zeal to uphold a partisan and traditional position.

Since this matter seems of such interest in certain sections where men are laboring ardently to refute our position we ask your kind indulgence as we pursue it a little further. Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea (Matt. 2:1) but he was begotten in Nazareth a city of Galilee (Luke 1:26). In Luke 1:57 we read, “Now Elizabeth’s full time came that she should be delivered; and she brought forth a son.” The italicized words are a rendering of gennao and it is evident that “beget” would no more apply than it would in Matthew 19:12, “For there are some eunuchs, which were so born from their mother’s womb.” There is a difference in the time as well as in the act of begetting and birth, and the former always precedes the latter. One who is begotten and not yet delivered is a prospective child of the one who begets him and a prospective brother of all others who have been sired by the same father.

A careful study of the implications of gennao in every occurrence of the term will enable us to enunciate proper rules of interpretation. These will be found to be three in number.

a. When the word refers to the action of the Father, or to the inception of life, it cannot be rendered born and must be uniformly rendered by some form of beget.

b. When the word refers to the induction into a state, condition or relationship, or when it has to do with bringing forth into a visible existence, it cannot be rendered begat or begotten and must be uniformly translated born, delivered, or brought forth.

c. When the entire process, including both the phases of begetting and birth, is described by one word, the final or consummating act may be put for the whole, as in John 3:5.

The means employed in our salvation are defined in Titus 3:5, “He saved us, not because of deeds done by us in righteousness, but in virtue of his own mercy, by the washing of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Spirit.” I take it that the washing referred to is baptism, but this does not change the nature of the gospel subject. This is effected by the renewal of the Holy Spirit. When the Holy Spirit operates upon and quickens the heart of the alien through the good news and leads him to repentance by testimony of the goodness of God through the Word, he is begotten of God. In order to change his state he must be led to the washing of regeneration which completes the birth process and makes him a child of God. Many who have been begotten will never be born into the fellowship because of our complacency and cruel disregard of their innermost feelings. I love every person who has been begotten of my Father. I long to see them all in the visible fellowship of the family. God help me to help them all to this end.

11. Do you think that every person who has not been immersed into Christ will be lost?

That is not for me to determine. God has revealed to us what we should proclaim to the world of mankind and the response we should make to those who enquire of us what they must do. He has not revealed what he will do in every case with reference to those who do not hear, or whose hearing may be impaired. He has forbidden me to judge those who are without. The apostle says, "For what have I to do with judging outsiders? God judges those who are on the outside" (1 Cor. 5:12). Since judging has to do with rendering a decision or passing sentence, I would usurp the prerogatives of God if I were to pronounce a sentence upon others. It is one thing to instruct men what to do in order to enter the fellowship of the saints, a wholly different thing to decide the eternal destiny of those who do not enter. It is one thing to be assured of your own salvation and a wholly different matter to be just as sure of the damnation of all others.

We operate under the authority of Christ Jesus but God is not under that authority (1 Cor. 15:27). We dare not bind him with the rules he gave to bind us. We cannot subject to authority one who is the source of, and superior to, all authority (Romans 13:1). God's grace existed prior to and is greater than the church. He is "slow to anger and full of mercy." He will judge each individual on his own merits, taking into account every longing, weakness, and yearning, as well as every motivation. He declares that "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." How he will regard those who do not know or whose perception is faulty, I cannot say. I do know that love for God will make up for deficiencies in knowledge and judgment. “If anyone fancies that he knows, he knows nothing as yet, in the true sense of knowing. But if a man loves, he is acknowledged by God” (1 Cor. 8:2, 3).

I also know that it will be “more tolerable in the day of judgment” for some than for others, based upon opportunities afforded to acquire a knowledge of God and his will. One can only walk in the light available to him and defective vision may limit his scope and his ability to discern. We have no right to assume that all of God’s children have 20/20 spiritual vision. There are some who are quite nearsighted. God will take all of this into consideration and will render a verdict of justice tempered with mercy, and mercy triumphs over judgment. The only man who cannot claim mercy is the one who has shown none. “In that judgment there will be no mercy for the man who has shown no mercy” (James 2:13).

12. Is this not the same as implying that God may save some in their disobedience?

Of course not. A lot of people cannot make the distinction between failure to obey from lack of knowledge of what is required and wilful rebellion against God. There is a difference between one who wants to see but is blind and one who deliberately closes his eyes to keep from seeing. Not all lack of knowledge stems from deliberate or malicious resolution not to know. Voluntary ignorance is a sin but involuntary ignorance is merely a misfortune. If it were a sin we would all be lost because none of us know all there is to know. One is not saved in disobedience who is obeying all he knows to do. He is saved by obedience based upon present knowledge and that is the only way any of us can demonstrate faithfulness unto God. It is evident that a lot of people are about as much concerned with damning others as with saving them and take about as much delight in one as the other. It seems to me to be a dangerous tendency for us to search the scriptures in an attempt to find something by which we may condemn men. All of us will be saved by God's mercy and grace and not by our own perfection. We will fulfill our purpose on earth by proclaiming the Good News and offering salvation on the basis of the promises. If God wants to do more than he promised he has a perfect right to do it. Let His will be done!

13. Do you think one must know at the time of baptism that it is for the remission of sins in order for it to be valid?

I do not. When one believes that Jesus is the Christ and God's Son and is immersed because of that faith it is for the remission of sins, whether he knows it or not. Baptism is an act of transition in which one is transferred from one state to another. A proper subject complying with such an act is not only transferred to the new state but is made a recipient of all the blessings and privileges of that new state even though he may be ignorant of what they may all be. Remission of sins is a judicial act of divine clemency which takes place in heaven in the mind of God. A proper subject is a penitent believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. When such a person validates his faith by obedience to the command of baptism God awards him remission of sins. "For the remission of sins" is not a part of the command. It is a statement of the result accruing from obedience. The command is to "repent and be baptized." It is not faith in baptism but faith in Christ that saves. Our forgiveness depends not upon our knowledge of the blessings we will receive but upon our trust in Jesus as our Saviour.

14. Is not "remission of sins" the design of baptism?

It is God's design, not man's. It is man's design to obey God which prompts him to be baptized; it is God's design to forgive the sins of those who thus obey. David Lipscomb wrote: "I do not think anyone was ever baptized because his sins were remitted. They may have believed their sins were remitted before they were baptized, but the remission of sins was not the moving cause. There is nothing in remission of sins as a motive to prompt one to be baptized. They may have thought, inasmuch as God had forgiven their sins, they ought to obey his command to be baptized; but in that case the desire to obey God was the moving cause. When a man is baptized to obey God, he is led by a proper motive; and I believe when he does this to obey him, God will forgive his sins, whether he knows the act in which God forgives or not. Man cannot be led by a holier or more acceptable motive than the desire to obey God and so ‘fulfill all righteousness.’”

The truth is that there are at least nine designs of baptism. We are baptized to fulfill all righteousness (Matt. 3:15); to enter into relationship with the Godhood (Matt. 28:19); to secure remission of sins (Acts 2:38); to obtain the gift of the indwelling Spirit (Acts 2:38; 5:32); to share in the likeness of the death of Christ (Rom. 6:3); to enter the one body (1 Cor. 12:13); to have the answer of a good conscience (1 Peter 3:21); to be saved (Mark 16:16); and to put on Christ as a garment (Gal. 3:27). On what ground do we select one of these and make it the criterion of validity? No man can baptize another for the remission of sins because he cannot read his heart and does not know his motives. It is absurd for one to raise his hand in priestly fashion and intone, “I baptize you for the remission of sins.” He does not know whether the sins of the person will be remitted or not. All any of us can do is to immerse one upon his profession to us of his faith in the Lord Jesus. Only God knows whether he really believes or not. Too many preachers act as if they believe in baptismal regeneration and can personally perform an act which in and of itself secures remission of sins. This is clericalism and sectarianism gone to seed. It is time for us to grow up!

When “The Church of Christ” began to exhibit symptoms of its growing sectarianism its members started to emphasize the doctrine of “knowledge of the design” instead of faith in the Lord Jesus as the ground of acceptability for baptism. This caused the preachers to hold a “coroner’s inquest” over every case of baptism not performed by one of their number. Men were actually rejected who would not submit to re-immersion in order to please the party. This was not the attitude of the early reformers. Tolbert Fanning wrote, “If a Baptist were to present himself to me stating that he was satisfied with his baptism, but still would be baptized again to please the church, if required, I should be certain that man was a hypocrite, or lacked the gospel knowledge and faith.”

Those men saw the proper relationship of baptism to Christ Jesus and thus to salvation. A. T. Anderson, an eminent student, wrote in Christian Review as follows: “I can never believe that God will withhold the act of pardon because I may not have understood that my sins were forgiven in the act of baptism; knowing that my whole confidence was placed in his Son, and his death for my sins, at the time of my immersion. Christ is greater than immersion. Though I believe with all my heart in Christ, and have the disposition to do whatever he bids me; yet I cannot be saved from my sins, because I have not been taught that he will forgive me just at that time. If this doctrine be carried out, it would make baptism a savior, or I know nothing of reason. This makes immersion the greater and Christ the less. This makes our salvation to depend not on our faith and obedience, nor on the faithfulness of him who has promised.”

When a man is motivated by any of the “designs” of baptism to obey God, then Jesus is the “author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him.” There would be no more efficacy in “Church of Christ baptism” than in “Baptist baptism.” Both would be for the purpose of pleasing a party. When a man is baptized to please God, or to obey a command of God, that is not party baptism at all. He has done what God requires and “he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.” A misunderstanding about God’s part in the procedure will not negate the promise to one who has done his part as commanded.

15. Can one become a child of God who does not believe God's word about baptism for remission of sins?

The problem with those of whom we have been speaking is not rejecting of God's word. They love the Bible as much as any of us. It is not arrogant disbelief but misunderstanding as to when God grants forgiveness. The Bible does not teach that we receive life by believing that baptism is for the remission of sins but by belief that Jesus is the Son of God. If the opposite were true we would need to question each candidate, "Do you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that baptism is for the remission of sins?" It is not faith in the design but faith in the designer that makes our obedience effective. Every person on this earth who is immersed has many mistaken ideas but these do not invalidate baptism.

God joins remission of sins and the gift of the Holy Spirit as blessings conferred upon the obedient believer. Many have a false conception of the Holy Spirit and some even deny his personality. If they needed to be re-immersed every time they learned something new about this divine gift "the waters would be troubled" regularly. But mistaken views about the gift of the Holy Spirit do not render baptism useless. It is a dangerous tendency when people cease to trust in the living God and begin to trust to their own degree of knowledge and legalistic goodness. We need to quit accusing honest believers of being guilty of disbelief when they simply do not understand some things. This spirit of unjust criticism and censoriousness is not becoming in those who would lead men to a closer walk with God.

16. What do you recommend we should do to restore a proper feeling of unity among the believers?

We should confess to one another that we have been partisan and sectarian in attitude and pray one for another that we may be healed of the ravages upon our hearts of this work of the flesh. We should be brought to our knees in tears over our growing sectarianism. We should set the table of the Lord for every sincere immersed believer and invite all such to sit down around it as our brethren. We should call upon all of them, recognize and regard them as children of our Father.

It is time for us to throw off the childish attitude which has characterized the brotherhood and start acting like men. The idea of categorizing those who differ with us as “brethren in error,” with the implication that we are wholly free from error and know all there is to know, is a little silly when you think about it seriously. The truth is that we are all brethren in error. Not one of us is perfect in knowledge and we all have a great deal to learn. We do not accept one another because we are free from error but because we are free in Christ— free to receive one another even while we try to work out our problems together and seek to arrive at a greater understanding. The brethren who accept me will have to overlook a lot of things just as God had to make allowances in order to receive me. I am willing to receive others on the same basis as he received me.

17. Is it possible to retain one’s spiritual integrity and participate in meetings sponsored by various factions?

It is if you do not equate any faction as the church of God and keep your conscience pure by abstaining from that which violates your personal conviction. So far as I am concerned, none of our factions is “the loyal church.” All of them have brethren within them who are as devoted to Jesus as they know how to be; all have some who are a disgrace to the Christian profession. I do not endorse any faction for I am opposed to factionalism as such, but I do recognize and regard as my brothers those who compose the various parties among us.

I want to share with all of my brothers, not alone because of what little I may teach them, but because of the great deal which they can teach me. It has been a very ennobling experience to find that I can learn from all of my brethren. I am a Christian only. I bear no man's brand upon me. I belong to Jesus who bought me with His blood. I do not intend to sell out to any group or clique. This makes it possible for me to move freely among all of the brethren without having to look back over my shoulder to see how the party reacts to my freedom.

I do not see how I could retain my spiritual integrity without regarding all of my brethren as brothers. If I began to measure our relationship to each other by an attitude toward various items and things I would become inconsistent. I do not regard brotherhood as a matter for political jockeying or pettifogging hanky-panky. I have resolved to never again allow any faction to entice me into a partisan corral where I will be loved by them only if I hate others. Wherever I go it will be as a disciple of Jesus and not as a dissembling partisan.

18. Is this an indication that you have become "soft" and chosen the easy way out?

Indeed not! This is the most difficult thing I have ever attempted in my life. It is not easy to love all of your brothers. The "soft" person should stay in the nice secluded shelter of a narrow faction. The high walls of exclusivism will protect him from contact with any alien element. He can hide in the shadows of his monastic structure and peer through little slits to watch the rest of the world go by.

If he does sally forth he can challenge for debate and load the propositions, or make them so ambiguous that he can inwardly congratulate himself that he has won a battle when neither his opponent nor himself ever got within striking distance. He can draw himself up to the full height of his midget stature and declare that he is "just going to preach the gospel" and not become involved with the problems of a sick, sorrowful and saddened brotherhood. This is the easy way out and the easy way to stay in— with the faction!

Have you ever tried to go wherever the Spirit opened up a door— to go by yourself into a strange environment where you stood alone and where your personal convictions were regarded as queer quirks or stubborn scruples? Have you ever submitted your views and opinions to open question in an audience where some had come merely to destroy your influence and assault your philosophy to protect their partisan programs? I hardly think this is an assignment for the timid soul, or for one who “holds with the hare and runs with the hounds.” The strategy of love is the hardest of all to execute. It took the life of Jesus. It meant death to thousands of his saints. The easy way is the way of the contracted creed, the compressed compassion and the condensed concern.

The Christian life was never intended to be staid, static or stagnant. It is an adventure of faith. It is a conscious risk of all that one has or is, in the firm trust that love is an unconquerable force against which no weapon can prosper and no power can stand. It is a firm commitment to the concept that love is imperishable and abiding. To invest one’s whole hope of survival upon this principle in a world conditioned to strife and schism as the gateway to God’s grace is not easy. It is no task for one who is soft and weak, or fragile and feeble.

19. What do you consider to be our most serious problem today?

I have no hesitancy in saying it is the traditional misapplication of the scriptures to justify division in the family of God. When we interpret the written word to deny and defeat the prayer and purpose of the Living Word there is something wrong with our interpretation. Brethren are taking passages intended to enjoin separation from pagans and heathen and applying them to believers in the Lord Jesus Christ. They are quoting statements written to debar Gnostics who denied that Jesus had come in the flesh or affirmed he was a mere phantom, in such a manner as to proscribe honest saints who differ with them about instrumental music and the millennium.

Such imperfection in scholarship and inadequacy of thought earns for us the disdain of thinkers who rise above the level of mediocrity. We need to restore the spirit of real research which delves for deeper truth and does not concern itself with parroting partisan phraseology. The age of crisis in which we exist demands that we offer more to the world which asks for the bread of life than the polished stones of factional controversy. It is because of this crying need for restudy that we propose to devote the next twelve issues of this paper to an examination of “the twisted scriptures.”

Ours will be a critical investigation of those loaded phrases which are glibly handed out to the unsuspecting masses as the answer to problems to which they are wholly unrelated. We will not be satisfied with the scriptures extracted from their setting, wrenched and wrested from their context, then bent and battered into place to sustain Church-of-Christism or any other “ism.” We invite every honest soul who is concerned about truth to go on a scriptural exploration with us during the coming year. Invite your friends to accompany us on this reverent walk through the corridors of revelation. At the end of 1965 we shall gather our findings together in a book of explanation and exposition of “The Twisted Scriptures” which will be made available to you at moderate cost. In the meantime this concludes our theme for 1964, and all of the issues for this year will be issued in a book called “The Brotherhood of Faith.”

MISSION MESSENGER ESSAYS (1965)

Volume 27

The Twisted Scriptures

Index to Volumes

- Another Gospel (1965)
- Gospel and Doctrine (1965)
- Peace or Sword?
- Contrary to the Doctrine
- Not of Faith
- Are You a Liberal?
- Analysis of Apostasy
- The Unrecognized Unity
- The Pervading Silence
- Walking in the Light
- Ecumenical Encounter
- Receive Him Not
- Conformity or Diversity
- The Baptism of John
- Our Abiding Heritage
- Withdraw Yourselves
- Statement of Aims
- End of an Era
- The One Faith
- Except They Be Agreed
- Playing It Safe
- Keep the Door Open
- The Works of Darkness

Another Gospel

Mission Messenger (January 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

I marvel that you are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel.

Which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ.

But though we or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. (Galatians 1:6-8).

This has become one of the “twisted scriptures.” It was written to summon back to trust in the grace of God those who were being bewitched into placing their confidence in works of the law. It was intended to be unitive in a context which condemns “strife, jealousy, anger, selfishness, dissension, party spirit,” as works of the flesh. It is now employed to promote and defend schism and division among the children of God. It has been captured by the partisan proponents of orthodoxy and re-forged into a weapon to carve the one body to bits.

Perhaps we should not be surprised that men would thus treat the writings of the apostle Paul. We have the testimony of another apostle indicating we should expect it. “As indeed our beloved brother Paul has written to you, out of the wisdom vouchsafed to him, speaking of this as he has done in all his letters— letters containing some knotty points, which ignorant and unsteady souls twist (as they do the rest of the scriptures) to their own destruction” (2 Peter 3: 1— Moffatt). “There are some things in them hard to understand, which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction, as they do the other scriptures” (RSV).

I do not think this implies that everyone who wrests a scripture from its context is wilfully ignorant and unsteady. No doubt men can do this innocent of any evil motive and in a firm belief that their application is the will of God. If they are ignorant, it is involuntary and not deliberate. Such men, when shown the more excellent way, will at once amend their thinking. It is because of my firm conviction that the good and honest heart will receive the seed of the word and not reject it, that I address myself to those brethren who are shivering the kingdom of heaven to fragments under the delusion that by so doing they best serve the interests of the King.

Those who mistake unity with conformity and who predicate fellowship upon endorsement, brand as “another gospel” every view, opinion and interpretation, which is divergent from their own. Under the fallacious notion that every religious concept which they enunciate is “gospel” they pronounce an anathema upon every person who dares to question their orthodox procedures in any respect. Thus they splinter the family into fragments unless all are willing to make them the inviolable and inerrant interpreters of the sacred oracles. Every party within the spectrum of orthodoxy thinks it alone has an infallible interpretation and men must stifle their thinking and bow in humble subservience to the unwritten creed, or else be hounded out as having “perverted the gospel of Christ.”

One faction accuses those who defend the use of individual cups as preaching another gospel; a second accuses those who employ Bible classes as preaching another gospel; a third labels those who support “Herald of Truth” as preaching another gospel; while those who support this international propaganda medium denounce those who believe in the premillennial coming of Jesus as preaching another gospel. The non-instrument segment of the restoration movement has disintegrated into a group of clamoring camps and clashing clans, slashing at each other over radio and from behind paper curtains, all blasting away at the others as having “perverted the gospel.”

Within the past year I have personally read that advocacy of missionary societies, instrumental music, centralized control, Bible colleges, institutional orphan homes, sponsored radio programs, unfermented wine in the Lord’s Supper, individual cups, classes, Sunday school literature, the pastor system, and a host of other things constitute “preaching another gospel.” In all kindness I say that those who thus write may not be unstable but they reveal their ignorance of what constitutes the gospel, in no uncertain fashion. In the same spirit of kindness I say that, regardless of whether all of these items are right or wrong, they are not related to “the gospel of Christ” and one does not pervert that gospel if, in all sincerity, he advocates any of them, or, in the same spirit, opposes all of them.

That you may not think we are falsely accusing our brethren in the Lord, let me cite you a documented case of what I mean. In April, 1964, I received an appeal for funds for Herald of Truth Radio and Television Program, from one of the elders of the “Fifth and Highland Church of Christ” at Abilene, Texas. The letter containing the appeal boldly asserted that there was “no church of the Lord” in some areas, and since I had but recently visited some of those places and found a lot of God’s children (although they did not share my views about instrumental music and some other things) I concluded that my good brother in Abilene was equating “the church of our Lord” with the particular faction supporting his program and conforming to the policies of the congregation of which he was one of the bishops.

I addressed a letter to him asking him to define “the church of our Lord.” I received a very gracious and ecumenical reply to which no one who loved Jesus could take exception. In closing, our brother wrote, “We urge men and women to join us in accepting these immortal truths as the basis and only basis of Christian unity, and we plead, Brother Ketcherside, that you will join hands with us in standing for and preaching only that which will unite the brotherhood as mentioned above.”

Perhaps I am too suspicious, but I know how the factional spirit works. I learned it from experience, a fact of which I am properly ashamed. So when my brethren use such terms as “the only basis of Christian unity” and “that which will unite the brotherhood” I want to know what they mean by Christian unity and who all is included in the brotherhood. I certainly want to join all in accepting immortal truths but I’ve seen very mortal restrictions placed upon them. For that reason, I addressed another letter to my brother who made the plea to me, in which I wrote among other things, the following:

I am deadly in earnest about what I am writing because I feel that a false image of the one body is being projected from many sources these days. In your printed literature you speak of the places where there is no “church of the Lord” and somehow I get the impression that you equate “the church of our Lord” with that segment of the restoration brotherhood which conforms to the “Church of Christ” of which Highland is a congregation, and you imply that the New Testament church is limited only to those who thus conform to the exclusion of all others.

1. Do you consider that those humble and sincere saints who have been immersed into our Lord Jesus Christ, and who cannot conscientiously see that the use of instrumental music is a sin, are members of the one body and, thus, are in the Lord’s church?

2. Do you consider that those sincere and consecrated saints who have been immersed into our Lord Jesus Christ and who conclude from their study of the new covenant scriptures that Jesus is going to return to this earth and do so before the millennium are members of the one body, and thus of the Lord's church?

3. If you do consider that they are, then it is quite apparent that the "Lord's church" is in some sectors which you have said are devoid of it; if not, it is apparent that you must inform us of what such persons must do to come into the Lord's church.

This matter is of interest to me because I have recently met several brethren in the Independent segment of the instrumental branch of the restoration movement who are helping to support your program. One such brother and his good wife drove all the way from _____ to _____, to attend the fellowship forum in which we discussed our mutual problems of brotherhood. He informed me that he had been to Abilene and had conversed with you personally. He feels that you certainly regard him as being in "the Lord's church" even though he attends with the brethren who use instrumental music at _____. Is he mistaken in his impression of what you believe? Certainly this man is my brother and I consider him a member of the one body, although I am opposed to the use of instrumental music in the corporate worship, as I am to the pre-millennial view. Will you kindly address yourself to these questions?

As I had anticipated, our brother, when confronted with these pointed queries, revealed the true spirit of orthodoxy, which makes use of "loaded passages" and "twisted scriptures" in the hope that the unwary will not see that they have no connection with the subject at hand. He said he would give "a Bible answer for everything for which we stand and teach." This has become another "loaded term." Our brother used only two scriptural passages, neither of which was remotely connected to the question at hand. Here is what he said:

I want to first notice the closing paragraph of your letter of May 2 in which you say, “I am opposed to the use of instrumental music in the corporate worship, as I am to the premillennial view.” I am glad to hear you make that statement for I, too, agree with you and oppose the mechanical instrument in worship as well as the pre-millennial view. I believe that we both can prove on the same grounds that they are both contrary to the teaching of the Bible— that’s my basis for opposing them and I feel it is yours. Now in view of that fact, I think we have a quotation from the apostle Paul in the Galatian letter— chapter one beginning with verse six— “I marvel that you are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel which is not another, but there be some that trouble you and would pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than ye have received, let him be accursed. For do I now persuade men or God, or do I seek to please men? For if I yet please men, I should not be the servant of Christ.”

Brother Carl, there is not a doubt in my mind but what these brethren who use instrumental music and the pre-millennialists are both preaching a perverted gospel, and if that be true and your statement quoted from the May 2 letter would lead me to believe that you believe it is true, then they are to be “. . . accursed . . .” according to the passage from the Galatian letter.

Of course there was nothing in my letter to lead our brother to think that I believed that “the humble and sincere saints” were preaching a perverted gospel. This conclusion was reached because he did not know of what the gospel consisted, and because he was unable to distinguish between honest differences of understanding and a perverted gospel. The tragedy of this resides in the fact that brethren are being asked for millions of dollars to preach the gospel to the world and those who propose to do it do not know of what the gospel consists. They use the money to promote Church-of-Christism. They can never secure unity on this basis. They will but serve to divide the saints in the future as they have in the past. Even now there is a pro-Herald of Truth party and an anti-Herald of Truth party, each accusing the other of preaching a perverted gospel. The scholarly world looks with disdain upon such childish antics. I wrote our brother as follows:

My reason for writing you again in replication to your letter of June 4, is to be certain that I make it clear that I do not share in your application of Galatians 1:6 to the problem of association with brethren who do not concur with our views relative to the coming of our Lord and the use of instruments in the corporate worship of the body. You will pardon me for speaking thus plainly, and I certainly do not mean to be unkind, but I think your application of the scripture to which allusion has just been made is more divisive and will be productive of more strife than instrumental music or the pre-millennial question could ever be.

These brethren with whom we are concerned are not preaching a perverted gospel. They are announcing the same Good News as we are and that news is about the same Christ. They are affirming the facts concerning him that the apostles affirmed and in the same way as did the apostles—actually quoting the apostolic texts as effectively as you or I could ever do.

And those whom I know are telling men to implement their faith in the Lord Jesus exactly as you tell them to do, and thus men are obeying the gospel exactly as you insist that they should. Undoubtedly you have their misunderstanding of certain aspects of the apostolic doctrine mixed up with the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

If these brethren who are mistaken about the coming of our Lord are preaching a perverted gospel then every man who is honestly mistaken after being born again is accursed of God. Can you state positively that you are correct in every understanding and every interpretation of the book of Revelation? If not, you damn yourself with the same passage with which you pronounce them accursed.

Certainly I am opposed to the theory of pre-millennialism and to the use of instrumental music in the corporate worship, but I do not charge my brethren who honestly have arrived at their conclusions with perverting the gospel as you do. I am sure that, holding your view, you will only augment division and strife instead of lessening it.

I have not cited this case at length because I think it is unique, but because it is typical of the thought pattern which cripples "The Church of Christ" today. The brother to whom I wrote is no better and no worse in his reasoning than thousands of others. He is a victim of that sectarian attitude which eats like a cancer at the heart of a great movement and fetters it with the chains of bondage in what could be its finest hour. Unless there is a re-examination made of the implication contained in scriptures parroted to prove partisan righteousness our brethren are doomed to perpetuation of puerile mediocrity and the thinking world will pass us by as we wallow in the mire of our misguided zeal and legalistic attitudes.

Any interpretation of the written word which defeats and makes impossible the fulfillment of the plan, purpose and prayer of the Living Word is wrong. Any use of the revelation of God to fracture the family of God is abuse and misuse. The purpose of the scripture is to point to Jesus and not to prod us into hatred of our brethren. It is sinful to falsely accuse brethren. It is sinful to "set at nought a brother" for whom Christ died. But brethren are falsely accused when their honest mistakes in understanding are transmuted into "another gospel" and they are set at nought by those who think they please God. No one can be more mistaken than that!

What is the gospel? Before one can designate a thing as “another gospel” he must be able to identify the original gospel. The gospel, by etymology, is good news. It is not a system of doctrine, a philosophy of life or a code of ethics. It is good news about a person and what that person has done for us in our helpless, hapless and hopeless condition. It is not a message for the saved but for the lost. It is never addressed to the church but to the world. It is designed to make believers instead of providing food for them. The word gospel is a translation of euangelion. It is an evangel and you cannot evangelize saved persons. It is sadly amiss to talk about preaching the gospel to the church unless the church is composed of those who have never come to Christ, that is, have never obeyed the gospel.

The gospel which Paul proclaimed in Galatia did not originate with man (1:11). It was not the presentation of borrowed “sermon outlines.” It was the “gospel of Christ” (1:7). It consisted of “preaching Christ among the Gentiles” (1:16). It was “preaching the faith he once tried to destroy” (1:23). And what was that faith? “And I said, ‘Lord, they themselves know that in every synagogue I imprisoned and beat those who believed in thee’” (Acts 22:19). It was belief in Jesus which Paul sought to destroy. It was faith in Jesus which he later proclaimed.

The careful student of the Galatian letter will at once see that the good news was a proclamation that we are justified by faith in Christ and not by works of law (2:16). There was no good news in a reign of law. Those who rely on works of law are under a curse (3:10); no man can be justified before God by law (3:11); if justification were through law, Christ died to no purpose (2:21); if inheritance were by law, it was not by promise (3:18). The utter futility of law lies in the fact that it must leave man dead. “For if a law had been given which could make alive, then righteousness would indeed be by law” (3:21). There is no such law, either divine or human.

Law confines and keeps under restraint. It binds but cannot free (3:23). It makes a person under it “no better than a slave” (4:1). Men had to be redeemed from it before they could even receive adoption as sons (4:5). It is impossible to be justified by faith in Jesus and to try and be justified by law at the same time, because one binds while the other frees. One cannot be both a slave and a son, because the adoption as sons frees from the bondage of law. One who thus seeks to be justified by law, or by legal conformity, severs himself from Jesus. “You are severed from Christ, you who would be justified by the law; you have fallen away from grace” (5:4). Nothing is plainer than the statement, “You are not under law, but under grace.” You cannot be under both at once. The attempt to be will make of us schizophrenists in the spiritual realm.

Salvation is a state of right relationship with God. Jesus did not come merely to keep us out of hell but to keep hell out of us. He came to reconcile us unto God. “God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.” We do not enter this relationship by bargaining with God. We cannot earn it, purchase it or deserve it. We cannot bid on it or for it. If we did all we could we would still be unprofitable. It is not what we do for God that brings us into this relationship but what he has done for us. We are saved by grace through faith. It is not of ourselves. It is not by works. Study Galatians 4:1-7. “We were slaves . . . but . . . God sent forth his Son . . . God has sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts.” We could not adopt ourselves into his family. We had nothing by which to purchase our redemption from the slave pen. “So through God you are no longer a slave but a son.”

Our response to the grace which sent a person to become sin for us, and to reconcile us, is faith in that person. This is what justifies. Justification has to do with freedom from guilt. We are not justified because we are guiltless for all of us are guilty. We are not justified because we have done something to free ourselves from guilt for no one can ever undo an act he has committed. Not even God can do that! We cannot “take back” what we have done. But Jesus is guiltless. He is the sinless one. If we are in Jesus we are not in a sinless state but in a sinless person. If we trust in his righteousness, that faith or trust is reckoned unto us as righteousness, or justification. Justification must always be a gift of God. We cannot give anything to God to meet a need of his. We must be always on the receiving end.

To one who works, what he receives must be counted as wages, and not as a gift. One who works has something coming to him, but no man has anything coming from God. He cannot be placed in our debt. We cannot keep books on God or “figure our own time.” “To one who does not work but trusts him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness” (Romans 4:5). To be in Christ does not mean we have not sinned. It does not mean our sinful acts have been undone. It does not mean that we are guiltless. It simply means that in him God can treat us as guiltless. He can, through Jesus, reckon our faith as righteousness and not reckon our sins.

The gospel is the good news, the glad tidings of that justification by faith in Christ Jesus. It is the welcome communication from heaven that by trusting in Jesus in complete surrender and commitment, God will regard us as if we were without sin, since we are in one who is in that state. This is the gospel which Paul proclaimed in Galatia. It was the good news that Jesus was not as powerless as Greek wisdom and Jewish legalism. Salvation was not hinged upon coming into wisdom or coming under the law, but upon coming into a person! God has made him “our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30).

Paul declared that the message brought to Galatia was “Jesus Christ publicly portrayed (or placarded) as crucified” (3:1). The truth of that gospel, that is, the essence, the basis, the central theme, was justification by faith in Jesus Christ. Truth is reality, stripped of all extraneous matter and naked of all artificial covering. The glad tidings to the world consisted of announcement of the most tremendous, magnificent and earth-shaking principle in the universe— that justification is by faith in the Son of God. This is the core of the message. This is “the truth of the gospel.”

Shortly after Paul had gone from Galatia, members of the circumcision party came and taught those who heard the good news that something else was required, that faith in Jesus was not sufficient. No doubt their message was the same as that which they promulgated at Antioch, “Except ye be circumcised according to the custom of Moses, you cannot be saved” (Acts 15:1). Paul and Barnabas went up to Jerusalem to consult the brethren. They took Titus along as a test case. They encountered “false brethren secretly brought in, who slipped in to spy out our freedom which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage— to them we did not yield submission even for a moment, that the truth of the gospel might be preserved for you” (2:4, 5). If Paul had yielded on this occasion, the principle of justification by faith, the truth of the gospel, would have been washed down the drain by the flood of legalism.

When Peter went to Antioch he ate with the Gentiles, until certain men came from James at Jerusalem. “When they came he drew back and separated himself, fearing the circumcision party” (2:12). This was a repudiation of the principle of justification by faith in Jesus and an adoption of the tenet of the party— you must believe in Jesus and something more to be in the fellowship. Peter caused a division with his unwritten creed. Others were drawn into the faction, including Barnabas. Paul saw that “they were not straightforward about the truth of the gospel.” Do not be mistaken. Peter still believed in Jesus. So did Barnabas. But they lent their influence to those who insisted that this was not enough to be justified.

Paul proceeds to define the truth of the gospel in one of the most sublime passages in the Galatian letter. "We ourselves, who are Jews by birth and not Gentile sinners, yet who know that a man is not justified by works of the law but through faith in Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Christ Jesus, in order to be justified by faith in Christ, and not by works of the law, because by works of the law shall no one be justified" (2:15, 16). To profess this as the marrow, or kernel, of the gospel, and then, under partisan pressure, to tack something else on to it as a condition of salvation, is to act insincerely and to be "not straightforward about the truth of the gospel."

Those who were in Christ in the days of the apostles were in error on many points. They were mistaken about a lot of things but they were not charged with "preaching another gospel." Freedom from error is not a condition of salvation else all men would be damned. We are not saved by attainment to a certain degree of knowledge but by faith in Christ Jesus. It is by belief of facts related to him, and not by grasp of abstract truth, that we are justified before God. Certainly it is not by performance of meritorious deeds nor by legalistic conformity. When we postulate a program of justification by knowledge we hang ourselves on the gallows we have constructed to rid ourselves of others, unless we are prepared to make ourselves even more ridiculous by affirming that we know as much as God.

There were saints in the congregation at Corinth who still had not been able to completely shake off the notion that there might be something to idols. The apostle wrote, "As to the eating of food offered to idols, we know that 'an idol has no real existence,' and that 'there is no God but one,' . . . However, not all possess that knowledge. But some through being hitherto accustomed to idols, eat food as really offered unto an idol; and their conscience, being weak, is defiled" (1 Cor. 8:7). Paul did not call their honest ignorance, conditioned upon their past teaching and association, "preaching another gospel." Instead, he forbade the one with superior knowledge to act upon it if it would ensnare the weak. “And so by your knowledge this weak man is destroyed, the brother for whom Christ died.” Shall I act in such a manner with regard to cups, classes, colleges or instrumental music that I destroy my brothers for whom Jesus died? Shall I use any of these as a battle-axe with which to chop my brothers to pieces?

There were some in the same congregation who were in error about the resurrection. “Now if Christ is preached as raised from the dead, how can some of you say that there is no resurrection of the dead?” (1 Cor. 15:12). Were these among the “beloved brethren” whom Paul addressed in the last verse of this chapter? The Corinthians were in error when they tried to settle their grievances by impleading each other in heathen courts, yet Paul said it was “brother going to law against brother.” He did not call their error “perverting the gospel.”

Even the Galatians, troubled as they were by some who wanted to pervert the gospel of Christ, were far from perfect. They were below the standard which Paul desired them to obtain. They had come into Christ but Christ had not yet been formed in them. Yet they were his “little children” as evidenced in his words, “My little children, with whom I am again in travail until Christ be formed in you” (4:19). He did not accuse them of preaching “another gospel” because they had not matured. Paul knew the difference between the seed from which life came and the daily bread upon which the children fed. He knew the difference between gospel and doctrine, and between faith and knowledge. He knew that the gospel brought us into being while the doctrine was essential to our growth and wellbeing and he did not make a test of fellowship out of spiritual digestion.

No honest opinion held by one who is in Christ Jesus and who respects his lordship, is “another gospel.” Since it is the gospel which forms the basis of the fellowship with the Father, the Son and with one another in Christ, such an opinion can never be made a test of union or communion in Christ. A man may hold a view as to the perseverance of the saints, the manner of the resurrection, or the second coming of our Lord, and he may prove to be as wrong as one could be, but he cannot be debarred from citizenry in the kingdom of heaven by the other subjects, any more than one can be disenfranchised in the United States because he disagrees with the government space program or holds the view that it is impossible to reach the moon.

No man “preaches another gospel” simply by being mistaken about some aspects of the will of God, otherwise one would need to know perfectly the divine will or be a perverter of the gospel. It is absurd for those good brethren (and they are numerous) who oppose the centralized control represented in the Herald of Truth program, to brand those who defend the program as “preaching another gospel” and “apostatizing.” Those who do so, regardless of motive, reveal that they are ignorant of what constitutes both gospel and apostasy. The brethren who present Herald of Truth are not guilty of “preaching another gospel” simply because they support the work through a manner which some believe to be without scriptural authority.

Whether it is right or wrong to send contributions to support the program of the Highland Church in Abilene, Texas, the doing so and the defending of the alleged right to do so, is not preaching “another gospel.” To quote Galatians 1:6-8 and make such an application is to wrest and twist the scripture. Those who separate themselves from their brethren and set up rival parties, pro or con, are guilty of “setting at nought their brethren.” I have some definite convictions about the Herald of Truth program, and about the principle involved in its method of support, but neither side will enlist me in their factional attitude where I must set at nought my brethren on the other side. They are all my brethren and they are all right on some points and all wrong on others. I propose to recognize them all as my brothers and treat them that way, regardless of how they treat each other. They did not become brothers by an attitude toward Herald of Truth, but by the blood of Jesus applied to their hearts, and no attitude toward a radio or television program will ever be as important to me as that blood. I just refuse to allow an attitude toward things to cancel the relationship created by the cross.

But by the same token those who defend Herald of Truth act with an equal degree of absurdity when they accuse the brethren who hold the view of the pre-millennial return of Jesus, of “preaching another gospel.” Regardless of how or when Jesus comes, or what men think about the time and method of his coming, to set at nought a brother over such matters is to sin against Jesus. It is as wrong to create a post-millennial party, or an amillennial party, as it would be to create a pre-millennial party. We are one body. This is true regardless of our varied views, opinions or interpretations. The brethren who promote Herald of Truth are as factional and divisive about unfulfilled prophecy as those whom they castigate for opposition to Herald of Truth.

I have some definite ideas about the millennium and the coming of our Lord but I refuse to make these tests of fellowship. I shall not drive out the children of my Father because they do not concur with me as to the time when our elder brother will return, or the circumstances under which we will all live with him. I shall not smite my fellowservants because my Lord delays his coming. It is not a correct understanding of the time, manner and place of the second coming which makes us members of the same family, but belief in the One who was incarnate almost twenty centuries ago and died for our sins. There is room in his kingdom for men who dearly love him to hold either view of his return. There is also mercy enough to extend to those who prove to be mistaken about it. I refuse to be a “millennial partisan” of either kind. Neither segment is going to capture and corral me so that I cannot associate with the others and love them as my brothers.

The same can be said for those brethren who think that the use of instrumental music as an aid in corporate worship can be justified by proper interpretation of the scriptures. I do not belong to a vocal music party nor to an instrumental music party. It is just as factional and sectarian to put up a sign “Church of Christ— Vocal Music” in order to separate from brethren as to put up one reading “Church of Christ— Instrumental Music.” Brethren who do either reveal much more about themselves than they do about others. I belong to Jesus and not a faction. Every person whom God welcomes as a child I shall receive as my brother. No group upon this earth will ever again build a partisan wall to enclose me and shut me off from others of God’s children. I shall be shut up only by the love of Jesus.

We need to give serious thought to this problem of “another gospel.” There is a grave danger that those who are most vociferous in their accusation that others are preaching “another gospel” are treading on thin ice and may be guilty of the very thing of which they accuse others. Actually there is no such thing as another gospel and cannot be. The gospel is the good news that we are justified by faith in Christ Jesus. Anything else is just not gospel. That is why Paul said, “I am astonished that you are so quickly deserting him who called you in the grace of Christ and turning to a different gospel— not that there is another gospel, but there are some who trouble you and want to pervert the gospel of Christ.”

To offer justification, or right standing with God, upon any other basis than trust in Jesus, may appear to those who hear it to be “a gospel.” They may regard it as such and even accept and designate it as such. Ultimately they will learn that it could not deliver what it offered, that there is only one basis for right relationship to God. Then that which appeared so plausible and convincing, which seemed so rational and documented, will be shown to be empty and frustrating, and not good news at all.

Let us imagine a person standing at a crossroads, deliberating upon a journey and carefully scrutinizing his map. An affable stranger steps up and enquires as to his destination. Upon learning where the man is going he declares that he can show him a shortcut which will require but half as much time and effort. "That is good news to me," replies the other as they start out. Soon they come to a place where a bridge is out, and in an attempt to find another crossing, they become entangled in a swamp and finally the guide is forced to admit that he is lost. The "good news" proves to be not good at all. It seemed like glad tidings when first offered but it left the traveler in a worse state than before he heard it.

The gospel of Jesus Christ is the offer of a right relationship with God through faith in Christ—that faith which works by love—not by law! There may be many responsibilities growing out of our relationship to the Father, but these do not beget that relationship and the relationship is not created by them. It may afterwards be affected by them and by our attitude toward them, but the relationship itself does not originate in them, and to make it contingent upon them is to come dangerously near to promoting another gospel.

Let us be specific. When brethren make a test of union and communion out of an attitude toward a specific method of breaking the bread in the Lord's Supper, and refuse to recognize as in the fellowship those who do not concur in their special brand of orthodoxy, they hinge justification upon faith in Jesus Christ and something else. The "something else" is agreement with their understanding, inference or deduction from scriptures, as to the method of breaking the bread. Their creed is no longer simply Christ but conformity with a factional pattern. Whatever any party makes a test of fellowship is its creed. Whatever one must accept to be regarded as loyal is a creed.

When brethren make a test of union or communion out of an attitude toward distribution of the fruit of the vine in the Lord's Supper, whether in one container or several, and refuse to recognize as in the fellowship, those who do not concur in their orthodoxy, they hinge justification upon faith in Jesus Christ and something else. The "something else" is agreement with their understanding of the relative importance of the container to communion in the blood of Jesus. Their creed is no longer simply Christ but conformity with a factional pattern.

When brethren make a test of union or communion out of an attitude toward propagation of the message through such media as Herald of Truth, their creed is no longer simply Christ Jesus but conformity with a factional pattern.

When brethren make a test of union and communion out of an attitude toward the millennium, their creed is no longer simply Christ, but conformity with a factional pattern.

When brethren make a test of union and communion out of an attitude toward the use of instrumental music in expression of praise to God, their creed is no longer simply Christ but conformity with a factional pattern.

To make one's right standing with God depend not upon surrender of himself to Jesus, but upon standing right on other things, is dangerously near to perverting the gospel. This was the mistake of the circumcision party in the days of Paul. Let it be understood that Paul did not regard either circumcision or lack of it as of any avail in establishing that relationship. "For in union with Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor the lack of it counts for anything; but only faith that is spurred on to action by love" (Galatians 5:6).

One may be in Christ Jesus in spite of his attitude toward individual cups, classes, colleges, Herald of Truth, the millennium or instrumental music. He may be in Christ and never even know that these issues have troubled the saints. He does not enter this relationship by an attitude toward any or all of these, but if he sets up his attitude on any one of them as a test of fellowship, he makes that attitude or that thing equal with Christ and the cross. When he says, "Except you adopt our attitude concerning one cup (or classes, or colleges, or Herald of Truth, or the millennium, or instrumental music) you cannot be saved," he sits down in the seat of the Pharisees. Many quote Galatians 1:6-8 and apply it to others when they are actually the ones who set up other unwritten creeds and pervert the gospel with their partisan terms of fellowship and justification.

Not every divergent view is "another gospel." Not every area of disagreement makes the one who disagrees with us a perverter of the gospel. Why do those who profess to love God seek so eagerly to brand their brothers and apply hurtful and prejudicial epithets? Why are they so anxious to set at nought their brothers for whom Christ died? Why are they bent upon smiting their fellowservants? Is this the more excellent way? Is this the royal road to unity? Will this accomplish the purpose for which Jesus shed his blood? Will it answer his prayer for the oneness of all believers? If God deals with us at the judgment in the same cold legalistic fashion that we deal with his other children, will any of us be saved?

In closing this little review of one of the "twisted scriptures" I would like to insert two quotations from yesteryear. The first is from the "Declaration and Address" as read by Thomas Campbell at Washington, Pennsylvania, in 1809.

That although inferences and deductions from Scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God's holy word, yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so, for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but properly do belong to the after and progressive edification of the Church. Hence it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the Church's confession.

The next quotation is from the pen of Alexander Campbell, the worthy son of the man who wrote the preceding lines.

The present partyism is a disgrace to our profession. It is fatal to the progress of piety and truth . . . The key of knowledge is virtually taken away, and ages of darkness are again spreading sable wings over a slumbering world. We must awaken from this sleep of death— this fatal lethargy that has seized the body ecclesiastic. Men are fighting about chimeras, loving and hating, approbating and disapprobating one another for reasons they do not comprehend, and, if comprehended, they would blush to see the illusions and phantoms that have bewildered them.

This is the first of a series of reviews of “The Twisted Scriptures.” Others will appear in this journal each month of this year and then be bound in a book bearing that title at close of the year. Be sure and read next month's issue.

Gospel and Doctrine

Mission Messenger (February 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned (Mark 16:15, 16).

This has become one of the “twisted scriptures.” As a result, that which was ordained to save the world is used to divide the church. That which was designed to be glad tidings to hungry sinners has become sad news to harassed saints. All of the confusion stems from the fact that our brethren generally have lost the scriptural distinction between the gospel, the Message to lead men to believe in Jesus as the Son of God; and the doctrine, which is a course of instruction for the training, development and growth of the children of God.

There is as much difference between the gospel of Christ and the apostolic doctrine as there is between the sperm from which a child is begotten and the food which he eats after he is born. The purpose of the gospel is to enlist men in the army of Christ; the doctrine constitutes a manual of arms and book of discipline to develop the soldiers into a fighting force. The first is an announcement that the school of Christ has been opened and eligible scholars will be accepted for enrollment; the latter is the curriculum for daily study by the students, or disciples.

Before we deal with the scriptural connotation involved let us understand why the traditional interpretation is conducive to division and destructive of unity. The common fallacy assumes that all of the apostolic epistles are part of the gospel of Christ and any exposition of the doctrine contained in these letters is preaching the gospel. Since Jesus makes salvation contingent upon believing the gospel, and superficial students generally confuse belief with knowledge, it is further assumed that those who do not subscribe to the orthodox interpretation placed upon every passage “reject the gospel.” Each sect, party or faction, thus makes its traditional explanations and deductions “the gospel” and we end up with as many “gospels” as we have parties.

It is easily understandable that the ones who so reason will conclude that only those are saved who are allied with the party, and all others are outside the pale since they have not “obeyed the gospel” (that is, subscribed to the unwritten partisan creed). But we learn from observation, experience and the sacred scriptures, that we do not all have the same degree of knowledge. God has made us all to differ in the intellectual realm as we do in the physical. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. No two of us upon earth attain to the same identical degree of knowledge about everything at the same moment. As Will Rogers remarked, “We are all ignorant, but just about different things.”

Any attempt to secure unity upon the basis of uniformity of knowledge or conformity in deductive or inferential processes (i.e., doctrinal interpretation) is doomed before it begins. It must inevitably end in dividing that which it seeks to unite. For this reason, those who make such attempts must always resort to creation of external authoritarian power structures in order to compel conformity. This is generally done by investing a person or group with an aura of infallibility so that all non-conformity with the orthodox creed can be equated with rebellion against God. Every individual who desires to be regarded as “loyal” must surrender his right to reason and think upon God's revelation to the "power bloc" and "unity" is maintained by legislation handed down as well as by fear of social rejection by the group accompanied by reprisal for dissent.

Power Structure

In one sect the power structure is invested in a "universal father" whose pronouncements when made ex cathedra (from the chair) are accepted as dogma. This means that this one individual decides for all other individuals in the group what God meant by what he said, or did not say, and such decision must be accepted as the will of God. Other sects, finding it repulsive to their Christian concept to exalt one man to such cosmic importance, reduce the power structure from a universal to a diocesan level, where the bishop becomes the final court of appeal. Still other sects set up a parochial or congregational "power bloc," often consisting of a board of elders. Members of such groups are taught that to differ with the elders is to differ with God. The motto is, "Vox presbuteros, vox Dei" (The voice of the elders is the voice of God). Every sect which confuses community with conformity is forced to recognize either an infallible interpreter or an infallible interpretation. Of course, the procedure is not always as systematized and clearly recognized as those we have mentioned. Sects are like those who compose them and are inclined to be systematic or slipshod according to the nature and temperament of their constituents. Thus, in some cases, the editor of the recognized journalistic mouthpiece may arrogate to himself the mantle of infallibility and be allowed to wear it by default. His office becomes the clearinghouse for all problems and his decision must be accepted as final.

The attempt to make conformity to the party norm the basis of unity is further complicated by the fact that the rational processes cannot be stopped at a given level. Men who are capable of doing so will continue to investigate and will reach conclusions differing with their own orthodox views of the past. When they refuse to succumb to threat or coercion they will be driven out and division will result. Since it is only the more eager students and researchists who labor to improve their intellectual grasp it is evident that the thinkers will be excluded, while the guardians of the status quo will be retained to man the party machinery. Every faction seeks to freeze knowledge at an arbitrary partisan level, and every such faction does it by skimming off the brains.

It is an outstanding achievement of divine wisdom that salvation is made contingent upon belief of facts incorporated in news, rather than upon knowledge of abstract reasoning or deductions drawn from doctrinal truths. The gospel is a unitive force because it consists of facts proclaimed by credible witnesses. These facts must be accepted or rejected. If accepted at all, they must be accepted as facts. All who so accept them are brought together in the one to whom they relate, regardless of ignorance about matters, immaturity, or lack of understanding of what will be further entailed. No subject should challenge a divided church more than the nature and content of the gospel. We propose to examine the word from the standpoints of etymology, scripture and scholarship. We make no apology for the length of our treatise because of the importance of our theme.

Meaning of the Word

Our English word “gospel” is from the Anglo-Saxon “gode spel,” good news, and was chosen as the best equivalent of the Greek euangelion. This was formed by adding the prefix “eu,” good, to a root meaning “message, tidings, or news.” The gospel is an evangel and one who proclaims it evangelizes. One cannot evangelize saved persons, for the evangel is a summons to the lost. Its purpose is to lead men to a state of salvation or righteousness. One who believes the gospel and is baptized will be saved from his past sins, his unregenerate state or lost condition. The gospel precedes faith and produces it. It is not a fruit of faith but the seed of it. It is addressed to unbelievers and not to believers.

The difference between the gospel and the apostolic doctrine is readily seen by application of simple logic. Jesus said, "Go into the world and preach the gospel unto every creature." The gospel is to be taken to the world. It is to be proclaimed unto every unsaved person. But the apostolic doctrine was addressed to churches composed of the saved, or to individual believers. Not a single epistle was addressed to the unsaved in the community, although the obligation to take the gospel to them was referred to in one instance (Romans). The apostolic doctrine was to "the church of God" (1 Cor. 1:2), "to all the saints in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:1), and "to the faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 1:1). It was not to lead men to believe and be baptized but to tell them "how to behave themselves in the house of God" (2 Tim. 3:15).

One of the clearest passages showing the difference between the gospel which begets as a precedent to birth into the family, and subsequent instruction given to the sons is found in 1 Corinthians 4:14, 15. "I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. For though you have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." The gospel is the spiritual sperm. The one who deposits it in the heart is the father, on the basis of principal and agent. Those who are born are sons. Others may teach or instruct them, but they receive life through the evangel, or gospel.

This is borne out by another apostle, Peter, who writes, "You have been born anew, not of perishable seed but of imperishable by the word of God which is living and indestructible." The writer identifies the seed thus, "This word is the gospel which was proclaimed unto you” (1 Peter 1:25). The King James Version leaves the wrong impression by translating, “This is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.” The Revised Version is more accurate. The gospel had been preached unto them before the new birth and in order to produce it. The gospel was for the world, the apostolic doctrine for the church.

With that keen sense of discrimination which characterized many of the pioneers of the restoration movement, Alexander Campbell wrote:

There was teaching, there was singing, there was praying, there was exhortation in the Christian church, but preaching in the church, or to the church is not once mentioned in the Christian scriptures!

Paul once, in his first letter to the church in Corinth, said he would declare to the Corinthians that gospel which he had preached to them, which also they had received and wherein they stood. We preach, or report, or proclaim news. But who teaches news? Who exhorts news? We preach the gospel to unbelievers, to aliens, but never to Christians, or those who have received it (Millennial Harbinger, April, 1862).

William Hurte, in A Catechetical Commentary, remarks about Acts 5:42 as follows:

The apostles rejoiced and went on with their work; but why does Luke use the two words “teach and preach Jesus Christ”? The words simply indicate the two classes to whom they were daily ministering. To the unconverted they preached, and to this class this word is strictly applicable, while believers were taught all things needful for life and godliness. To the former it is, and always must be, proclamation— i.e., preaching— while to the latter it must always be instruction concerning the Lord’s will.

Every kingdom must stand in two relationships to the people of the earth. There are aliens and citizens. The kingdom of heaven is no exception. Since it is the design of heaven to enroll as many aliens as possible into citizenry, and to train those who are inducted to become worthy citizens, there must be two separate and distinct messages from heaven. Both messages will be the word of God, but they will differ as to subject, content and aim. The first will be proclaimed to all men who have not entered into Christ and it must consist of such facts as will motivate the world to accept His sovereignty over their lives. The second must be a course of methodical instruction calculated to develop those in Christ from spiritual infancy to maturity.

The word of God informs us that there are such distinct messages and there are specific terms used by the Spirit to designate them. Since the messages are distinctive the bearers of the message are also distinguished by terms growing out of the nature of the messages. The announcement of news in the Greek world was made by a herald. The word for such a proclaimer was keryx and his message to the populace, that is, the thing proclaimed, was the kerygma. A herald might announce either victory or defeat, that is, either good news or bad. Thus, there is nothing in the word kerygma which indicates the nature of the tidings.

But the kerygma of the followers of the Messiah was universally and uniformly good news. So an additional term was used to describe it. That term is euangelion, which means "glad tidings." The bearer of this message was called euangelistes, that is, a bringer of good news. This good news proclaimed (or preached) by the herald, was announcement of victory in Jesus. It must be remembered that news has to do with facts and facts must be preceded by acts to which the proclaimer bears witness or of which he has knowledge. In view of this, the kerygma took on a definite form. It was "the thing proclaimed" and that thing was called the gospel, or good news.

In 1950, the eminent C. H. Dodd, Professor Emeritus in the University of Cambridge, England, was invited to deliver the Bampton Lectures in America, at Columbia University. He chose as his general theme "Gospel and Law." Dr. Dodd is best known to most of us as Director of the Committee on Translation, which produced the New English Bible New Testament, and which is currently translating the Old Testament and Apocrypha. We offer no apology for a rather lengthy quote from the Bampton Lectures.

According to the evidences of the New Testament, the earliest exponents of the Christian religion worked out a distinctive way of presenting the fundamental convictions of their faith, in a formula which they called "the proclamation." The Greek word here is kerygma. Our translators of the Bible commonly render it "preaching;" but in its current implications at the present day it is misleading. Kerygma properly means a public announcement or declaration, whether by a town crier, or by an auctioneer commending his goods to the public, or by the herald of a sovereign state dispatched on a solemn mission, to present an ultimatum, it may be, or to announce terms of peace.

The Christian preacher thought of himself as an announcer of very important news. He called it quite simply "the good news," or in our traditional translation "the gospel." It was this good news that was imbedded in the "proclamation," the kerygma. It was essentially a public announcement of events of public importance.

The form and content of the proclamation, the kerygma, can be recovered from the New Testament with reasonable accuracy. It recounted in brief the life and works of Jesus Christ, His conflicts, sufferings and death, and His resurrection from the dead, and it went on to declare that in these events the divinely guided history of Israel through long centuries reached its climax. God himself had acted decisively in this way to inaugurate His kingdom upon the earth. This was the core of all early Christian preaching, however it might be elaborated, illustrated and explained.

The preacher's aim was to convince his hearers that they were indeed confronted by the eternal God in His kingdom, power and glory; that they, like all men, stood under His judgment upon what they had done and upon what they were, and that this judgment was now immediate and inescapable, further, that those who would put themselves under God's judgment would, through His mercy, find an opportunity open to them to enter upon a new life; that actually, as a result of these facts which they proclaimed, a new era in the relations between God and man had begun.

Those who responded to this appeal and placed themselves under the judgment and mercy of God as declared in Jesus Christ, became members of the Community, or church, within which the new life could be lived. These members were then instructed in the ethical principles and obligations of the Christian life. This course of instruction in morals, as distinct from the proclamation of the gospel, is covered by the term "teaching," which is in the Greek didache.

Now we have no desire to become boresome to our readers but it is time for us to grow up in our thinking and throw off the garments of mediocrity and superficiality. We must be vitally concerned about and involved in the struggle to learn what the Spirit meant in the words he chose to convey the thoughts of God. It will gain us nothing to talk about "speaking where the Bible speaks," if we do not speak as the Bible speaks. We are not interested in pampering spiritual infants but in providing food for growth. Bear with us then as we quote from Alan Richardson, M.A., D.D., Canon of Durham, on page 172 of "Theological Word Book of the Bible."

In the N. T. we find three words used: Euangelizesthai, to preach good tidings; katangellein, to declare, announce; and kerussein, to proclaim as a herald. The fundamental idea of these words is telling of news to people who have not heard it before— “evangelization.” In the N. T. preaching has nothing to do with delivering sermons to the converted, which is what it usually means today, but always concerns the proclamation of the “good tidings of God” to the non-Christian world. As such it is to be distinguished from teaching (Gr. didache) which in the N. T. normally means ethical instruction, or occasionally apologetics or instruction in the faith. When the preachers (originally the apostles, later the accredited evangelists) had attracted hearers by their proclamation in the marketplace of the gospel of the cross and resurrection they handed them over to the accredited teachers for further instruction in the faith and preparation for baptism. Evangelists and teachers seem to have been distinct ministries in the early church.

We plead your kind indulgence as we select one more statement from the scores of confirmatory quotations within the files which have grown out of our research. This one is from Martin R. Vincent, Baldwin Professor of Social Literature, Union Theological Seminary, New York, in his “Word Studies in the New Testament,” Vol. 1, page 30:

Matthew 4:17. To preach (kerussein). Originally, to discharge the office of a herald (kerux), hence to cry out, proclaim. The standing expression in the New Testament for the proclamation of the gospel; but confined to primary announcement of the message and facts of salvation, and not including continuous instruction in the contents and connections of the message which is expressed by didaskein. Both words are used in Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 11:1.

From investigation we learn that the chosen envoys of Christ had a special message for the alien world. This was a proclamation of victory in Jesus. It consisted of the news of what God had done for those who were his enemies. Since it was contingent upon authority vested in Jesus, it could not be proclaimed until the heralds had proof that he had been “Christed” (i.e., anointed) and elevated to a position of lordship. The proof came visibly, audibly and experientially on the Pentecost following his ascension. Immediately the message was proclaimed! The gospel was fully announced on that occasion and fully obeyed by all who accepted it. This was not a partial seed and those who were begotten by it were not born deformed. They were fully formed as God’s children, although immature.

Nothing else was ever added to the gospel after that date, although doctrinal truths were revealed as required or when circumstances demanded. These doctrinal truths were not a part of the gospel and no one whose life was corrected or enhanced by understanding them was ever said to have obeyed the gospel again. Obedience to the gospel is an act once for all, while partaking of the bread of life is a daily performance. The gospel produced life, the doctrine was for the training and discipline of the children after they had been born.

Careful study of the historical accounts of the proclamation indicates that it was a specific message as to content. It did not depend upon rationalization, deduction or inference. It was not a compilation of laws, a code of ethics, or a collection of abstract propositions. It was a simple recounting of facts which, taken together, formed the kerygma. At this juncture we may correct a mistaken view of a familiar passage. We refer to 1 Corinthians 1:21, where the false concept is created by the rendering in the King James Version, “It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe.”

That this is important is evident from the fact that our hope of salvation depends upon it. Many interpret the word “preaching” to be the act of proclaiming. But God has not offered to save those who believe in the act of announcing something. The word for “preaching” at this place is kerygma. It has to do with the message and not with the action of the messenger. God has chosen by the thing preached, which appears as foolishness to the worldly-wise to save those who believe. The later translations are more accurate in conveying the thought.

“It pleased God through the folly of what we preach to save those who believe” (Revised Standard Version).

“He in his wisdom chose to save all who would believe by the ‘simplemindedness of the gospel message’” (J. B. Phillips).

“He chose to save those who have faith by the folly of the Gospel” (New English Version).

Content of the Message

What were the constituent factors of the gospel? There were seven of these as follows: the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification of Jesus of Nazareth. All of these are centered around the person of Jesus. All are designed to create faith in him. Thus the apostle says, “We proclaim Christ— yes, Christ nailed to the cross” (1 Cor. 1:23). Again, “I resolved that while I was with you I would think of nothing but Jesus Christ— Christ nailed to the cross” (1 Cor. 2:2). It was by this message God chose to save those who believe and those who believe these facts and demonstrate the lordship of Jesus over their lives by obedience in baptism are saved.

The gospel is epitomized in the three saving facts— the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus. There was no saving virtue for the world in the life of Jesus upon earth, sinless as it was. The ascension, coronation and glorification were essential to his acquisition of authority. It was the ransom and redemption purchased by his blood which made salvation possible, and the resurrection which brought life and immortality to light. Accordingly, the apostle, in reasoning with the Corinthians about the resurrection, reminds them of the gospel which they had heard and which gave them life. The resurrection was a vital part of it.

“Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he arose again the third day according to the scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:1-4).

An analysis of this passage will show that the gospel had been preached, received, believed, and that it constituted a foundation upon which the brethren stood. It was now a matter of memory, something to be recalled. It is observable that the Corinthians were saved by the gospel. The saving facts which Paul enunciated were three in number. Obviously the first epistle to the Corinthians was not part of the kerygma— the gospel.

It was a letter written to those who had already received the gospel and were saved by it. The letter was not an evangel but a course of instruction. It was not for sinners but for saints. It was not to make believers, but to make believers better!

Not all who had believed the gospel were equals in knowledge. Some still thought there might be something to idols (1 Cor. 8:7); some thought there was no resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15:12). Some were men of knowledge (8:10); others were weak brethren (8:11). There were those who were feeble, less honorable and uncomely. There were parts that lacked (12:23, 24). Paul hesitated to visit the saints because he wanted to spare them from personal censure (2 Cor. 1:23). He was afraid he would find “debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults” (2 Cor. 12:20). Yet all of these persons had been begotten by the gospel, and Paul introduced the catalog of things just mentioned with the expression, “We do all things, dearly beloved, for your edification.” Those who confuse chastisement of a child with begetting and cannot distinguish between correction and conception are in a sad predicament.

To this reasoning and the abundant findings of scholarship, orthodoxy has but one pat objection of any consequence. An appeal is made to Romans 1:15, which reads, “So as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also.” Assuming that the apostle intended to proclaim the good news about Jesus to those who had already heard and long since accepted it, this is taken as proof positive that the gospel is designed for saint and sinner alike, and that it includes everything which should be taught to the church. It is hardly that simple and those who reach such a conclusion demonstrate that they are much more interested in justifying their pre-conceived notions than they are in unbiased exegesis. We propose to face up to this passage so glibly parroted by many who have never thought below the surface and who have fallen into the grievous error of searching only for a proof text.

The Letter to the Romans

Simple logic will demonstrate that the Roman letter was not part of the gospel because Paul desired to go to Rome personally to preach the gospel. This would not have been necessary if it was to be preached to the church and if this letter was the gospel. It would seem strange indeed to write, “I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome,” if he was doing it at the very moment with his pen. Moreover, in Romans 10:16 he says, “But they have not all obeyed the gospel.” If the letter to the Romans was part of the gospel, none of them had obeyed it, for it was just then in the process of being written. Yet before the Holy Spirit had revealed to him the content of the Roman letter, Paul had already “fully preached the gospel of Christ” from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Romans 15:19). Did he give each of these places a copy of the Roman letter before he wrote it to Rome? If not, one can fully preach the gospel of Christ without reference to, or inclusion of, the Roman letter.

Did Paul intend to preach the gospel to (that is, evangelize) the saved in Rome? Careful analysis does not indicate any such intention. In the first place, this letter was not addressed to the congregation, or church in Rome, but to the saints as individuals. In this respect it differs from the letters to Corinth, Galatia, Thessalonica, et. al. In his Commentary on Romans, Moses E. Lard, says:

In other words, and briefly, it was written to all Christians living in Rome at the time. But it was written to them as individuals, and not as a body or church. This is a remarkable difference between the present Letter and some others written by Paul. They are addressed to churches as such; this is addressed to individuals as such. Indeed, church unity or organization is not once alluded to or recognized in the Letter, unless it be implied in chapter 16:17.

These individuals were addressed from two aspects: as saints in Christ and as citizens in Rome, as the called of God and as Gentiles. Paul expressed a desire to visit Rome for two different reasons.

He wanted to impart unto the saints some spiritual gift and share in comfort derived from mutual faith (1:11, 12). But he had also purposed on numerous occasions to come “that I might have some fruit among you also, even as among other Gentiles” (verse 13). There can be little doubt that the “fruit” Paul sought consisted of persons won to Christ, and he wanted this “among you” on the same basis as “among other Gentiles.” Christ wrought in Paul “to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed” (Romans 15:18).

One purpose of the Roman letter was to inform the saints at Rome that Paul was specifically called to bear the glad tidings to the Gentiles. He wrote boldly about it so they would not forget his special mission. “I have written to refresh your memory, and written somewhat boldly at times in virtue of the gift I have from God. His grace has made me a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles; my priestly service is the preaching of the gospel of God, and it falls to me to offer the Gentiles to him as an acceptable sacrifice, consecrated by the Holy Spirit” (Rom. 15:15, 16).

Then why had Paul not come to Rome to win Gentiles? This would certainly be an important question to the struggling saints in the capital of the Empire. The answer is given. “It is my ambition to bring the gospel to places where the very name of Christ has not been heard, for I do not want to build on another man’s foundation, but as Scripture says, ‘They who had no news of him shall see, And they who never heard of him shall understand.’ That is why I have been prevented all this time from coming to you. But now I have no further scope in these parts, and I have been longing to visit you many years on my way to Spain; for I hope to see you as I travel through, and be sent there with your support after having enjoyed your company for awhile” (15:20-24).

Paul wanted to bring the evangel to the Gentiles in Rome. He was not so ignorant as to try and evangelize the saved. He wanted to have fruit among the inhabitants of Rome, as among other Gentiles. He said, “I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise. So as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also.”

Why did the apostle use the expression, “To you that are in Rome”? There is every indication that he intended for the recipients of the letter to share its contents with their unsaved neighbors— both Jew and Gentile. This would be a natural reaction to an apostolic letter in an area where no apostle’s voice had yet been heard. This will also serve to explain the content of such portions as the entire second chapter, which is addressed to the Jews who make their boast of God and rest in the law, and yet dishonor God by breaking the law. It will also explain the inclusion of material in the last half of the first chapter. This portion of the letter was written to convince the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles of the need for justification by grace rather than by philosophy or law, both of which always end in a blind alley. Surely no one is so foolish as to think these portions are addressed to the saints in our Lord Jesus Christ.

This is not a mere personal opinion of the editor. It is shared by many who are eminent theological scholars. Space will not allow us to cite all of those we have in our files, but we must limit ourselves to one. We have selected Dr. James Macknight, whose Apostolical Epistles is universally known and highly regarded. In his preface, on page 51, he says:

From the pains which the apostle took in this letter, to prove that no Gentile can be justified by the law of nature, nor Jew by the law of Moses, from his explaining in it all the divine dispensations respecting religion, as well as from what he says, chap. 1:7, 13, 14, 15, it is reasonable to think that it was designed for the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles at Rome, as well as for the brethren; who therefore would show the copies which they took of it to their unbelieving acquaintance. And inasmuch as the apostle professed to derive his views of the matters contained in this letter from revelations, and from inspiration, it certainly merited the attention of every unbeliever to whom it was shown, whether he were a Jewish scribe, or a heathen philosopher, or a Roman magistrate, or one of the people; some of whom, I make no doubt, read it.

In his comments on Romans 1:15, Dr. Macknight supplements the above statement in these words:

In regard that Paul, after acknowledging he was bound to preach the gospel both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, adds, I am ‘ready to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome,’ the idolatrous inhabitants of Rome were certainly included in the expression ‘you who are in Rome.’ This verse, therefore, as well as the following, is a proof that the epistle to the Romans was intended, not for the Roman brethren alone, but for unbelievers also, to whom copies of it might be shown.

The Righteousness or God

But we will be asked about Romans 1:17. “Therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith.” Does not the righteousness of God include all God has revealed, and does not this embrace the whole of the new covenant scriptures? If so, does not “the gospel” refer to everything in the new covenant scriptures? It is a common resort of orthodoxy to quote, “For all thy commandments are righteousness” (Psalm 119:172), and then take this passage from the old covenant scriptures and apply it to the letter of Paul, and reason that the gospel includes every commandment of God. Aside from the honesty and integrity involved in such devious maneuvering of texts as pieces on a chessboard, there is another factor which must not be overlooked. Those who make such an argument must rely solely upon the King James Version for the validity of their “logic.”

The Revised Version reads: “My tongue will sing of thy word, for all thy commandments are right.” It is a fairly safe rule that any argument which must depend for its whole strength upon the rendering of only one version should not be given much prominence, to say the least.

What does Paul mean by “the righteousness of God” which is revealed in the evangel? The Greek word here is dikaio syne, and it is a favorite of Paul. He was versed and grounded in the old testament scriptures, having been at the head of his class in the rabbinical school of Hillel, in Jerusalem. He knew that the old covenant scriptures constituted a primary and elementary school to provide a vocabulary for the school of Christ. The Hebrew terms which corresponded to dikaio syne were all derived from a verb— tsadhaq. The idea most frequently contained in these terms was that of vindication or justification. The meaning of the words does not imply that a righteous person is one who is right about things, but that he is “in the right,” that is, in a state of righteousness, or justification. He is not infallibly right because of his actions, but wholly in the right by an act of God. That is why it is called “the righteousness of God.”

Remembering that this is the word for “justification,” we can readily see that no sinner can ever justify himself. He can never undo a single act nor recall a single word in order to become guiltless. He can never be justified by law because this would entail perfect conformity in every minute and meticulous detail, and the least infraction would mean death without mercy. Justification is an act of divine clemency, accorded not because of worthiness, nor because of anything that the guilty person may do to earn or deserve it. It is a manifestation of grace, a divine act of undeserved kindness.

We can now begin to appreciate what Paul meant in the memorable passage before us. In the gospel, that is the Good News about Jesus, is revealed the ground of God’s righteousness, or justification. It is shown to be by faith in the Person of the Message. And the reason for revealing in the Message that God’s righteousness is by faith, is simply to produce faith in us, for even the prophet had declared that the source of life is faith—not law! Those who are justified are those who are in contact with the source of life. Righteousness is a state of right relationship with God, and God is the fount of all life.

We are not justified, or in God’s righteousness, because of superior knowledge, or because we have figured out all the riddles and solved all of the problems of life. Salvation and sophistication are not the same. We are not justified because of intellectual powers or theological attainments. We could never know all there is to know if our life depended upon it. We can be thankful that it does not. Our life depends upon being in the only person from whom all life comes, and our being depends upon sharing his life. Years before the Christ came, the prophet had declared, "The just shall live by faith." Paul contends that this life is now available. It has come. It is revealed in the Good News of Jesus. It is no longer future. It is present. The age of which the prophets spoke is a reality. Bear with me then as I paraphrase for you Romans 1:15-17.

Brethren, I should like to have you know that I frequently planned to visit you at Rome so that I could gather in converts to Jesus as I have done among other Gentiles. Because of my indebtedness to all tongues and classes, I am eager to preach the gospel to you that are in Rome also. For I am not ashamed of the Good News about Jesus, seeing that it is God's dynamic to produce salvation in all who believe the News, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For in this Message God has revealed that justification is by faith, and this revelation is made to produce faith as our only hope of life, for even the prophets declared that faith was the key to life for all those who are justified.

Certainly this is a "free translation" but, after years of study in the implication of these words of the Spirit, I am convinced that it best conveys the mind of God as I understand it to be revealed. It will also be observed that it preserves the basic core of the gospel which is justification by faith. This is what Paul calls "the truth of the gospel," that is, the essence of the Message (Galatians 2:5, 14). For a more thorough discussion of this feature we urge you to read the preceding issue of this paper (January, 1965). The glad tidings about Jesus constitute a revelation that justification is by faith, in the full meaning of "faith" as Paul uses the word. It is only the apostolic usage with which we are concerned, everything else is useless.

The Gospel Dynamic

The careful student will also detect at once the connection between Romans 1:16 and Mark 16:16 with which we began this article. In the commission Jesus sent the apostles into all the world to proclaim the gospel to every creature. He declared that those who believed the Message and were immersed would be saved. Now, Paul affirms that the Message is God's dynamic to salvation to all who believe, whether Jew or Greek. Thus, the gospel is God's unitive force for mankind. It is the gospel which brings Barbarians and Greeks, wise and unwise, together in one body.

It is a tragedy to interpret the apostolic epistles in such a manner as to negate the apostolic gospel. It is a travesty on the spiritual walk to interpret the apostolic doctrine in such a way as to divide those who are united by the gospel of Christ, and thus make "the cross of Christ of none effect." Orthodoxy has exacted a fearful toll on the body of our Lord and will face a frightening responsibility for hacking that body to pieces with the axe of partisan animosity.

It is belief of the facts about Jesus by which all of us are saved, if saved at all. This belief acknowledges his lordship over our lives, and thus commits us to acceptance of all the truths by which we grow as we become aware of them. No man will be saved who deliberately rebels against any doctrinal truth which he understands and apprehends. No one will be lost because of merely mistaken views or human inability to grasp all of these doctrinal truths. The basis of our hope lies in sustaining a right relationship with God through Christ Jesus. If one is right about Jesus he may be wrong about a lot of things and still be saved; if he is wrong about Jesus he can be right about everything else and still be lost.

Our brethren are not actually proclaiming the gospel of Christ as the hope of salvation. They are projecting a system composed of traditional interpretations, opinions and ideas, often conflicting with each other, and demanding conformity to this system as gospel. Such a course will always be divisive. It contains the germ of strife implanted within it. This is not to say that apostolic doctrine is not important nor does it argue that we should not seek to agree upon interpretation. It does mean, however, that our hope of life is not contingent upon arriving at such harmony of understanding, and that it is, and always will be, an ideal toward which we must strive. Our differences about doctrinal matters that do not relate to the facts of the gospel, are occasions for discussion, and not for division. Until we learn what is the content of the gospel we shall lose the learned and confuse the unlearned.

Not one of the apostolic epistles was written to bring men into the fellowship. They were all addressed to those who were in it. Never an admonition to live in harmony or to be of one mind was written to bring men into the fellowship. Indeed, it was because they were in the fellowship that these exhortations were invariably given. Harmony is not essential to entrance into fellowship, but fellowship is essential to any satisfactory striving toward harmony. It is because we have a common relationship that we labor toward a better understanding.

To condition fellowship upon conformity in all of these phases is not to encourage unity, but division. To attempt to enforce conditions of growth as conditions of family relationship is to defeat the purpose of the Son of God and to disturb the peace of the One Body. This is the indictment of that orthodoxy which blinds men and makes them think they are loyal to Jesus when they are chipping, chopping and carving his body to bits.

Our brethren need that grace which enables them to “distinguish between things that differ.” The cause of pure Christianity suffers among the masses because men who pose as teachers, and even would-be theologians, stand before audiences and make disparaging remarks about any distinction in such words as “gospel” and “doctrine.” If the only harm done was to prove the immaturity and mediocrity of their own scholarship one might keep still and allow them to bask in the feeble glow reflected and diffused through the veil which they wear in their reading of the Word, but they hinder the progress of reformation and remove the contest from the arena of universal thought to confine it to their own little restricted corrals where none dare question and all must conform. It is for this reason that an examination of the scriptures in objective fashion is long overdue. There is a difference between the authority of the sacred scriptures and the authority of human interpretations placed upon them to maintain a traditional pattern and to perpetuate a partisan program.

Those of us who expect to be worthy heirs of the restoration movement should rejoice that the religious world is again becoming aware of the principles long since enunciated by the pioneers of this noble effort. If the eminent C. H. Dodd now receives laurels for ideas long since discovered by Alexander Campbell— ignored by his contemporaries in the sectarian world and forgotten by his successors in the movement he helped to spark— we can be grateful to Him who raised Jesus from the dead that He has revived these truths in our day. We will gain little by joining those modern chief priests and scribes who deny the revival and seek to bribe the guards into silence. Let the truth be known!

Peace or Sword?

Mission Messenger (February 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword.

For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law.

And a man's foes shall be they of his own household (Matthew 10:34-36).

We have before us as we write this a letter from a brother in Kansas, who plaintively writes: "You constantly stress peace in every issue of your paper and emphasize that all division is a sin. Have you forgotten that Jesus declared he did not come to send peace, but a sword? Why do you not emphasize that?"

It is apparent that our brother is perturbed because someone has come who preaches "peace to them that are afar off and to them that are nigh." He must find a scripture which makes it appear that Jesus is the prince of strife rather than the Prince of peace. He is as careless in reading what we write as he is in reading what the apostles wrote. We do not believe that all division is a sin. It would be a sin not to be separated from those with whom one has nothing in common— no fellowship, communion, concord or agreement. We are specifically told to, “come out from among them, and be ye separate” (2 Cor. 6:17).

We say that division among brethren in Christ is wrong. It is a sin for the members of God’s family to be divided. Jesus did not come to unite us to the world but to call us out of it. We are not to be one with the world, but we are to be “one body in Christ and members one of another” (Rom. 12:5). Division among believers is contrary to the prayer of Jesus (John 17:21), it violates the apostolic doctrine (1 Cor. 1:10), and it is a work of the flesh (Gal. 5:20). It is a symptom of carnality and immaturity (1 Cor. 3:1-4). It is produced by those who are sensual, and have not the Spirit (Jude 19).

The kind of wisdom that produces envying and strife is not from above. It is earthly, sensual and devilish. It results in confusion and every evil work (James 3:15, 16). We are to be likeminded one toward another, according to Christ Jesus, that we may with one mind and one mouth, glorify God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. 15:6). Brethren who engage in strife are not “walking honestly as in the day” (Rom. 13:13).

What did Jesus mean by the expression, “Think not that I am come to send peace on the earth?” This statement occurs in the context of a speech made to the apostles when they were launched into a hostile world. They were sent forth as sheep among wolves (Matt. 10:16), and they were to beware of men. They could expect to be brought before governors, delivered up to councils, and scourged in the synagogues (17, 18). They were to be hated of all men for the name of Jesus (22), and hounded from city to city by persecutors (23). They were to overcome fear of those who can only kill the body but are not able to kill the soul (28).

When a hate-filled world is confronted with the claims of Jesus and his demand for unconditional surrender to his lordship, unbridled passion and unreasonable antagonism will know no bounds. “And the brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child: and the children shall rise up against their parents, and cause them to be put to death” (21). Yet there can be no compromise. Jesus must be accepted or rejected. He did not come to give us a way out of persecution but a way into life— eternal life! And the choice is not easy. It is difficult to accept Jesus when the dearest friends on earth oppose and the fondest ties must be broken.

Literally, the words of Jesus mean, “I did not come to cast peace on the earth,” that is, as men cast seed into the ground. Peace was not to be sown broadcast. It was to be the product of personal faith. “Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rom. 5:1). “These things have I spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world” (John 16:33). Jesus came to send a sword, which simply means to inaugurate war between those who choose him as Lord and those who deliberately enlist under the banner of the prince of the power of the air.

For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man’s foes shall be they of his own household.

What spirit prompts men to take these words and apply them to the saints, as if the mission of Jesus was to rend and tear the fabric of brotherhood bought with his own blood? It cannot be the Holy Spirit because “variance and emulations” are described as works of the flesh and contrary to the Spirit (Gal. 5:20). Did Jesus come to “sow discord among brethren” and thus become an abomination unto God? Surely he would not set us against each other when he said, “When you stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any” (Mark 11:25).

What would be thought of a father who, while sitting at the table with his children, would hand a sword to his eldest son and tell him to cut the other children to pieces before his eyes? Would he not be regarded as having gone insane and become berserk? Did the Father of mercies send Jesus to teach us how to smite and slay his other children. Is he so devoid of parental regard and affection that he rejoices when we slash each other and spill the fratricidal blood at the common table? What kind of distorted, warped and twisted reason prompts men to take comfort in our sad, sorry, sinful state of division and factionalism, by making it appear that it was the mission of Jesus to create such a state of tumult, turmoil and pandemonium?

I emphatically deny that kind of thinking which implies that my blessed Lord is pleased and happy when we set at nought our brethren over their opinions relative to cups, classes, colleges, orphan homes, the millennium, instrumental music, or any of that motley multitude of transitory things which have fragmented us in this generation. I simply refuse to transfer his right to rule over my life to any preacher, prelate or priest, or to any group or faction composed of men no better than myself—a mere sinner saved by grace! No faction was crucified for me. I was not baptized in the name of any party. My Lord is not divided and I shall recognize no division in his body which he did not create and does not condone.

Let me serve notice, here and now, to factional leaders and promoters who may wait for me to weaken so they can “line me up,” that they wait in vain. I have hitched my wagon of spiritual hope to a star—the bright and morning star—and I never intend again, so help me God, to be either a partisan promoter or a party puppet. I am dedicated to the fight against the factional spirit. I am not interested in engaging in the petty and puerile battles of one faction against another, but in the warfare against the spirit that produces them all. I intend not to be turned back from the long and arduous battle to make His blessed prayer come true and be answered among the sons of men.

There is burning within me a fierce determination not to be deterred by fright of my enemies or flattery of my friends. I intend to labor to expose every misuse of the words of the Holy Spirit sent from God, and to let men see the raw, bare and naked ugliness of that body of orthodoxy which proclaims unity and practices division. To me there is no greater sin than to wrest the words of my precious Lord in such a manner as to make it appear that he was a dissembler and double-dealer who would pray for the oneness of all who believe in him and then assert that he came to cleave these very ones asunder with the sword. The crime is not mitigated by the fact that I once thought I served Him loyally by misuse of these same passages in my own biased and bigoted attempt to make all men conform to my views in the mistaken and fallacious notion that I was "leading them to Christ." I freely confess the sin of such inconsistency and pray that I shall live long enough to undo a part of it, even while others pray that I do not!

I glorify God that all over this great land, in every faction and splinter of the strife-torn restoration movement, there is a stirring of hearts, a striving for recapture of integrity and probity. Men are tired of traditional trumpetings of irrational and irrelevant explanations that do not explain, and of interpretations that do not interpret. Alarmed factional leaders brand this revolution as the "gravest danger to the church in a century," but thoughtful men now know they confuse the church with the faction of which they are a part. Be of good cheer, the word of God is coming into its own, and we shall see great things!

Contrary to the Doctrine

Mission Messenger (March 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

There are a great many tasks which appear to be easier than that of editing a paper like this one. Our readership is very diversified. A goodly number of men with advanced scholastical degrees receive the paper, but it is also read by many more of our brethren who had no opportunity to secure more than an elementary or high school education. Busy housewives and public school teachers are alike exposed to what we write. It is difficult to arrange a format or present a study equally impressive to, or informative of, all who graciously consent to allow the time from busy lives, essential to perusing our articles.

We have had a few letters deploring the length of the articles and expressing a wistful longing for us to chop them down and condense them so they can be read in snatches of time. We sympathize with the dear friends who have thus written. Even some college professors tell us we give them too much to digest in one sitting. They would like a little more soup and salad and not quite so much meat on the plate. I suspect, however, that this once all of you will have to endure our method of serving, faulty though it may prove to be.

For one thing, we think a lot of us have pampered our spiritual organs with pre-digested food in capsule form until the thinking processes have become a little rusty from disuse. The restoration movement has suffered from a dearth of original thinkers for many decades. We must stimulate studies in depth which will encourage brethren to search below the traditional surface which has been scratched and sifted repeatedly through partisan screens. The subjects with which we are dealing are important and do not lend themselves to entertaining little squibs.

Moreover we must recapture a sense of our integrity in the intellectual world. This does not mean setting up a false god of human wisdom or bowing at the shrine of philosophy. It does mean an unrelenting and unceasing quest for truth, and that for truth's sake, regardless of what that truth may do to our cherished positions of the past. The retention of any dross for fear of losing some gold is contrary to the basis of true scholarship and subversive of honesty. We should not hesitate to deposit what we have in the crucible of the present, for that which does not stand the test today was not right yesterday, even though we thought that it was. The gold must be tried by the fire, not just in one generation but in every generation.

It is in this spirit of freedom and fearlessness that we are examining again those scriptures which have been twisted to create, condone or continue division. Our thesis is that any use of the written word to defeat the plan, prayer and purpose of the Living Word is an abuse. This calls for a restudy of the bearing and implication of those scriptures. When our application of the word of God produces the very opposite condition of what that word was intended to produce there is something faulty with our application. Thorough study requires time and thought. It cannot be accomplished in a moment and it does not always make for light reading.

Romans 16:17

Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which you have learned, and avoid them.

Of all the scriptures which have suffered from wresting, twisting and distortion, this is one of the most prominent. Written for the very purpose of protecting and preserving the church from division, it has become one of the chief instruments of such division. Ignoring the greater context in which it is set as a frame of reference, glib partisans apply it without modesty or reservation to every honest dissenter from their factional programs.

What did Paul mean by “the doctrine which you have learned?” The man who was taught that it is a sin to have Bible classes thinks of this as the doctrine he has learned, and feels called upon to exhibit his loyalty to the Word by marking and avoiding all who have classes. The man who was taught that it was a sin to have individual cups in the Lord’s Supper must mark and avoid all who have them. The use of multiple containers is contrary to the doctrine which he has learned. The one who is convinced from what he has been taught that institutional orphan homes are not justified by the scriptures must mark and avoid those who think they are justified.

Those who oppose such propaganda media as “The Herald of Truth” consider themselves obligated to mark and shun those who support it. Those who grew up under the tutelage of a party which decried the pre-millennial interpretation of the scriptures as a sin of the first degree must mark and avoid those whose study has led them to believe that it is proper. The same thing is true upon the part of those who have been taught that instrumental music in the corporate worship is wrong and sinful. In every instance the factional test is “the doctrine learned.”

It is almost unbelievable that thinking men and women could ever be led to believe that the apostle Paul would even condone such a mishmash or hodgepodge, much less deliberately create it by his admonition. Actually, such a position freezes knowledge at the partisan level and makes ignorance a virtue and further learning a crime. If we are to listen only to those who agree with us in every particular we can never acquire additional knowledge. If we are to mark and avoid all who do not parrot our own particular party line we must continue at our present level of ignorance. Surely the apostle did not have in mind the creedal and dogmatic interpretation of each faction by the expression, “the doctrine which you have learned” for that would perpetuate the very factionalism which he wrote to prevent and offset. It would seem that all rational and sensible persons could see such an obvious fact.

The Doctrine Learned

What is “the doctrine you have learned?” What had Paul been teaching the Romans which would cause them to avoid those who were divisive? The entire frame of reference, the context both adjacent and remote, shows that it is the teaching that division among brethren is a sin. Briefly summed up, the doctrine they had learned was, “Do not cause division or place an occasion of stumbling in a brother’s way.”

The content of the four preceding chapters is directed toward advocating, exemplifying and enforcing this doctrine. The basis of the teaching is, “Let us therefore follow after things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another” (14:19). Anyone who disregards this doctrine and insists upon making tests of fellowship where God has not made them (i.e., over days, meats, etc.) should be observed and isolated so his factional attitude cannot divide the body into rival camps over such issues.

The argument of Paul related to Jew and Gentile, and the universal need for justification by faith, concludes with the benediction and “Amen” of Romans 11:36. In chapter 12 he begins his dissertation on the conduct becoming the saints, especially as related to unity and oneness. His doctrine is that God's family should not be divided and its members should not be occasions of stumbling to one another.

Although many members, yet are we one body in Christ, and every one members one of another (12:5).

We are to love each other without hypocrisy (12:9); be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love (12:10); and be of the same mind one toward another (12:16).

We are to owe no man anything except to love one another (13:8), for love is the fulfilling of the whole law (13:10).

We are not only to deprecate strife and envying, but actually to abhor them, and put on the Lord Jesus Christ, making no provision for the flesh and the exercise of any harmful passion (13:13, 14).

There will be differences among the members. Past environment, the present degree of knowledge, various temperaments, and other factors, will enter in to make adjustment difficult. Chapter 14 is an inspired treatise on those attitudes essential to preservation of unity in spite of differences. The foundation of the approach is laid in verse 1.

A man who is weak in his faith is to be welcomed. "Without attempting to settle doubtful points" (New English Version). "Not with the idea of arguing over his scruples" (J. B. Phillips). "Not to determinations of reasonings" (Young's Literal Translation). "Not for controversial arguments" (Authentic New Testament). "Not in order to pass judgment on his doubts" (Weymouth). "Not to pass judgment upon his scruples" (Moffatt). "Not to criticize their views" (Charles B. Williams). "Do not discuss his opinions" (Charles Kingsley Williams). "Not for the purpose of deciding doubtful points" (Centenary Translation). "Not for the purpose of passing judgment on their scruples" (Twentieth Century). "Not for disputing opinions" (Rotherham).

We are neither to despise nor judge one another (verse 3), but allow each to stand or fall to his own master (4), and reach a personal conviction in his own mind (5). We dare not set at naught a brother, for we shall all stand before the judgment seat of Christ (10). Each will give account of himself to God (12) so I am not accountable for my brother's conviction, nor am I accountable to my brethren for my own conviction. My brother is not answerable for me and I am not answerable to my brother, but to our God.

The brotherly relationship must be more important to me than any thing upon which we disagree, and must be more important than all those things which threaten its disruption. Under no condition am I to allow any opinion, scruple or personal conviction to destroy a brother for whom Christ died (15).

The kingdom of God is composed of values which transcend all matters of argument over things which disturb its citizenry. It is made up of majestic qualities which are universally accepted within the body— righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit— and to elevate any secondary considerations to an equality with these qualities is neither acceptable nor approved (17, 18).

Jesus died for persons and not for their opinions or ideas, right or wrong, and those for whom he died must be more important to us than anything for which he did not die. It is good to do nothing by which a brother stumbles, or is offended, or made weak (21). A man must not do that about which he has personal qualms or doubts, "because his action does not arise from conviction, and anything which does not arise from conviction is sin" (23).

The strong must accept as their own burden the tender scruples of weaker men and not consider themselves (15:1).

Each must consider his neighbor and think what is for his good and will build up the common life together. We are all to accept one another as Christ has accepted us, to the glory of God (15:7). As God accepted us in our weakness, with mistaken ideas, warped views and unhealthful attitudes, so we must accept each other in the same state or condition. We must not make the kingdom of heaven to consist of our convictions, attitudes or opinions, but of citizens who must be tolerant of each other in such matters, else there can be no kingdom of heaven at all.

Factional Persons

After having given this extensive teaching on avoidance of division and offences, the apostle recognizes that there will be those who will not heed it. Even God cannot provide a doctrine that is proof against dishonest hearts or unscrupulous motives. There will always be some who refuse to serve Christ, but in their egotism and selfishness will create a factional atmosphere and seduce the minds of innocent people with smooth and specious words. What should be done with those who disregard the teaching about preserving peace and insist upon having their own way, regardless of the consequences? The answer is forthright.

Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them. For they that are such serve not our Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple.

A careful analysis of this passage in purely objective research does not indicate that the apostle is advocating public or corporate action at all. Indeed, the Roman letter differs from other epistles in that it was not addressed to a congregation, but to individual saints. (See this discussed at length in our issue of February, 1965). The “avoiding” recommended here to the brethren is individual. They are simply told to steer clear of those who would create division and to stay out of their way.

The factional spirit is like a flame. It must always have additional fuel or it will eventually flicker out. It is like a cancer. If it cannot reach additional healthy tissue it will subside. It is obvious that no one can ever create a faction without followers, and if all of the brethren will simply hold at arm's length a smooth talker who advocates pulling away, he cannot harm the body. Factions begin when members start fraternizing with factionalists. It will help us to remember that every factionalist seeks to carve out a body after his own image, and it is easier to carve soft wood. When a factionalist starts wooing you to join in a movement to pull away he has chosen you for the same reason that a termite chooses its timber—you are easier to work on! One is complimented when a factionalist passes him by!

The word “mark” is from skopeo. This is the form of the word which appears in telescope, microscope, etc. It has to do with vision. It means “to observe, watch, keep an eye on.” There is nothing in this word which indicates any action whatsoever upon or against an offender. The action is all upon the part of the observer. It consists simply of keeping another under surveillance.

“Divisions” is from dichostasia. This is a combined form composed of a word for “apart” and one for “standing.” It literally means “standing apart,” and here it refers to “alienating one from another.” It can be used to designate “divided loyalties” or to describe the condition that occurs when one segment of those who should be together allows a breach to occur which holds them aloof from others. Such a condition is a result and it proceeds from a cause. It is contrary to the will and purpose of God and one who produces the condition disobeys God.

“Offences” is from skandalon from which we get our

English word “scandal” and “scandalized.” The original has an interesting history. At first it referred to the trigger of a trap, the part to which a bait is fastened, and which tripped or sprung the trap or snare when the intended victim took the bait. Later it came to apply to the contrivance or instrument as a whole. It is essential to the efficient functioning of a snare that it be not recognized for what it is and that its real nature be concealed. W. A. Vine says, “Always metaphorically used in N. T. of that which arouses prejudice, becomes a hindrance to others, or causes them to fall by the way.”

“Avoid” is from ekklino which means “to turn away from, to hold aloof from, to stay out of the way.” There is nothing in the word which implies any organized action, or formal discipline of the congregation. The brethren are urged to avoid involvement with the person under consideration by keeping aloof from him or staying out of his way. If there is no congregational action implied in the terms “mark” and “avoid” there is none to be found in this verse at all and those who employ the passage to separate themselves from another congregation of saints over some point of difference are the perpetrators of division. There is a great deal of difference between keeping an eye on a brother who would make a partisan out of you and staying out of his way, and refusing to have anything to do with another congregation whose members sincerely disagree with some partisan interpretation. That is, there is a difference in keeping an eye on a diseased member and taking a meat cleaver to the body.

J. B. Phillips translates the passage, “And now I implore you, my brothers, to keep a watchful eye on those who cause troubles and make difficulties among you, in plain opposition to the teaching you have been given, and steer clear of them.”

Adam Clarke says, “Let them have no kiss of charity nor peace, because they strive to make divisions, and thus set the flock of God at variance among themselves, and from these divisions, offences are produced, and this is contrary to the doctrine of peace, unity and brotherly love which you have learned.”

James Macknight paraphrases thus: “Now I beseech you, brethren, mark them who set up separate assemblies for worship, and who occasion the weak to fall by false doctrine, or by enjoining things indifferent as necessary, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned from me in this epistle, and avoid them.”

In explaining the passage, Macknight says, “The apostle had in his eye the Jewish teachers, who in many churches set up separate assemblies for worship of God (see Jude, ver. 19), on pretence of greater orthodoxy and sanctity than others, and who would admit none to their communion but such as joined them in their peculiarities, and who represented all others as erroneous and impious.” It is apparent that the “Jewish teachers” of this kind are not all dead.

How Division Is Caused

There is no more prolific cause of division than the orthodox interpretation placed on this passage. All who equate “this doctrine” with a partisan interpretation and dogmatically demand conformity to it are destructive of the peace of the one body and are the chief offenders against unity at the very time they quote the passage to exclude or excoriate others. The church of God has suffered indescribable harm from such prejudicial expositors who have split the disciples asunder under the guise of loyalty to Jesus, and driven out humble saints by their arrogant and papistical decrees. Eternity alone can reveal the damage done to the body of Christ by the unscriptural and unscrupulous application of Romans 16:17. Let us consider one way by which such harm is accomplished.

A humble brother in the Lord prayerfully peruses the sacred oracles and in his study becomes convinced that the Son of God will return to the earth prior to the thousand years spoken of in the Apocalypse. He shares his views with the brethren and learns that others as sincere as himself do not reach the same conclusion. They continue to meet together around the common table with mutual respect and regard for each other. Then a preacher comes into the community and learns that the brother has arrived at a premillennial interpretation which seems to him to best explain what the scriptures express concerning the return of the Lord. The preacher visits the man with a view to “setting him straight on what the Bible teaches,” but finds that the other insists upon being his own interpreter and refuses to abdicate his right to search the scriptures for himself.

The preacher then begins a series of lectures on “The Millennium” in which he has free rein to express his understanding of the subject without opposition. The other brother must merely sit and listen in silence. After having set forth his interpretation for several months from the pulpit and on his weekly radio program, the preacher informs the congregation that they have learned from him that the premillennial interpretation of the scriptures is not from God, and it is “time to take a stand for the truth.”

He gleans occasional statements from individuals who have espoused the premillennial view, lifts them out of context and applies them to all who believe that Jesus will return before the thousand years. When the brother whom he opposes denies certain extremes he declares that all who adopt the premillennial view are cut from the same pattern and tarred with the same brush. He implies that all of these think more of their premillennial view than of anything else and have more in common with denominational “premillennialists” than they do with the Lord’s church. He insists that one cannot be in “the Lord’s church” and disagree with the orthodox position on the millennial reign.

The trap is now set. The trigger is baited for “scandalizing” the body of Christ and destroying a brother for whom Christ died. But how can this brother be set at nought? The preacher informs the congregation that “the loyal churches” will cut them off if they “fellowship premillennialists.” He declares that if they do not “put away such wicked persons” the time will come when they cannot even get a “faithful preacher” to conduct a funeral service for their dead. He calls for the congregation to “line up with the faithful brotherhood.” Then Romans 16:17 is used as the stick with which to throw the trap. “Mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which you have learned and avoid them.” Now a humble brother whose only sin is that of thinking for himself is hounded out along with those who refuse to bow their knees to such despotism, and who regard no one as high priest except Jesus.

Does someone insist that this description is exaggerated? I deny it! The truth is I am describing actual cases of which I have been aware. Who caused the division? Who caused the offence, that is, baited the trap? Is it a crime for one to study the word of God for himself? Is it a crime to reach a conclusion from such study? Is it a crime to retain a conviction until one is personally convinced that he is in error?

Who was at fault when the hierarchy demanded that Galileo, under threat of torture, retract his theory that the earth revolved around the sun? Was the position which obtained at the time— that no person has a right to hold an opinion without consent of the church— a correct one? Is that position correct now? I charge without hesitancy that those who make of the church a mere party to uphold any millennial position as a test of fellowship are the ones who cause the division.

A man may be in Christ and know nothing about the millennium. One can be in Christ and be mistaken about the millennium. He can be in Christ and interpret the scriptures from an amillennial or premillennial viewpoint. This does not say that both views are correct. It merely argues that being in Christ Jesus is not contingent upon either view. One is not in Christ because he is right about the millennium, but because he acknowledges Jesus as Lord over His life. It is absurd and asinine for people who trust in the Lord Jesus Christ to fall out over how and when he will come again. This is an event over which neither group can exercise control. It will occur in God's time and manner regardless of our ideas about it.

To form parties around our interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy and set at nought our brethren is sinful, sensual and scandalous. It shows that we are babes in Christ, that we are yet carnal and walk as men. It reveals that we are still partaking of the works of the flesh. We are stupid and shortsighted when we allow men to use us as partisan pawns about such things and herd us into their factional alignments.

My Position

The doctrine I have learned is that division in the family of God is contrary to the will of God. My Father does not want his children shivered into splinter groups or warring tribes. He loves all of his children as I love both of mine. For that reason I positively refuse to allow any man or group to put a party brand upon me which will separate or segregate me from any of my brethren. I shall keep an eye on those who try to enlist me in their exclusive little segments and avoid them. I'll keep out of their way when they try to get me to be a front man for their little cliques and clans. I belong to Jesus Christ. He bought me with his blood and I do not intend to sell out to anyone else for anything less. No one can make me believe that I can best love God by mistreating his other children. The ones I shall mark and avoid are those who try to get me to mark and avoid all others outside of their little coteries and circles. I know that they are factional and divisive.

It is true that I have learned a lot of other things which commend themselves to me as the doctrine of Christ but I do not intend to create a party to defend or denounce them. Having learned the doctrine that division is a sin, I shall mark and avoid all who create schisms and offences contrary to this doctrine. No man can be sound and sectarian at the same time. My aim is to save souls and lead them to Christ. It is not to increase or enlarge any party or faction as such. It is enough with me if the Lord adds men to the one body without my trying to entice them into some party or faction. I intend to stand fast in the freedom wherewith Christ has set me free. And I shall defend in others the same freedom I demand for myself! I am not for sale!

I am asked if this will not create some problems for other brethren in their attitude toward me. It will for those who are not free. Any free man in Christ is a problem to those who are factional. Every faction has to corral and brand all others and one who does not wear a party label of any kind presents a serious problem. The problem is not created by my freedom but by their factionalism. Let them become free and the problem will be solved. Let them tear down their corral fences and remove their artificial barriers and keep an eye upon those who would build them up again and remain aloof from them and all of us can be happy in Jesus and with each other.

In the past, instead of marking those who were divisive, it was generally those who were divisive who did the marking, accompanying it with such cutting and slashing as rendered the body a spectacle of shame and disgrace to an unbelieving world. It is time to stop this form of insanity which makes us bite and devour the body of which we are a part. Jesus died to make Christians— not cannibals!

The apostle describes the characters to be marked and avoided. “Such creatures are no servants of Christ our Lord, they are slaves of their base desires; with their plausible and pious talk they beguile the hearts of unsuspecting people” (verse 18). Have we become so hardened against our brethren that we regard those who differ with us about cups and classes as “no servants of Jesus Christ our Lord but slaves of their base desires?” Are we so callous that we will thus brand God’s children who differ with us about the method of caring for orphans? Are we so benumbed in spirit and frigid of heart that we conclude that every brother and sister who expects Jesus to come in advance of the millennium is “no servant of Jesus Christ our Lord?” Are we mere spiritual robots of steel, case-hardened and unfeeling, so that we can drive out any saint who differs with us about the utility of instrumental accompaniment in praise service to God?

If these do not fall into such a category as Paul describes, why do we twist and wrest this scripture as applicable to them? Have we been chloroformed by our own orthodoxy and paralyzed by partisan prejudice until we cannot see that to employ this passage to project division makes of us the aggressors and the ones to be marked and avoided? Why do factional promoters quote this verse and apply it to others? Is this the way to add brotherly kindness to godliness and love to brotherly kindness? Is this how we fulfill the admonition to speak not evil one of another, brethren? Is this the way to eliminate envying and strife and to overcome confusion and every evil work?

I know not what course others may take, but as for myself I have resolved never again to be brought into serfdom to any man or made the slave of any machine. I shall steadfastly refuse to be made a cat’s paw for any clan or a carrier pigeon for any party. I will be answerable to God for my thoughts and actions and will allow no one to control my thinking down here who cannot assume responsibility for it up there. If I must answer for it alone in heaven I shall reserve the right to do it for myself on earth. I can best face the head of the one body by cherishing and nourishing every other member attached unto him. I can best serve the Shepherd by associating with all of the sheep rather than by foraging with a few of them in the arrogance of isolation from the flock.

I shall value a brother in Christ Jesus more highly than I value what he thinks, knowing that the blood of Jesus makes him priceless even while his thoughts are inferior. All of the brothers I have are “brothers in error” because there are no other kind. Those who think they are not are in the worst error of all. But if they were good enough for God to accept they are not too bad for me to acknowledge. They can be my brothers on the same basis they are his children, and I will not stigmatize them as causing division when they are simply victims like most of the rest of us.

Not of Faith

Mission Messenger (March 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

This issue of the paper provides a proper forum for expressing my view concerning the abuse of Romans 14:23, by controversialists who appear more interested in winning arguments than in serving the cause of truth. I am reluctant to mention this, knowing in advance that my motives will be misjudged, but my reticence is overcome by a firm resolution to maintain integrity in interpretation, regardless of personal cost. If the fallacy was committed only by novices I would be inclined to ignore it, but since it crops up in other journals under the signatures of college professors who are sure that they are “a guide to the blind, a light to those in darkness, a corrector of the foolish,” a few words on the matter seem to be imperative.

Although the illogical argument has been used in opposition to various things— cups, classes, colleges, and collectives for the care of orphans— it is more frequently employed as the culminating barrage against instrumental music in corporate worship. The argument customarily proceeds along the following lines. Faith comes by hearing and hearing by the word of God (Romans 10:17). Instrumental music does not come by hearing the word of God, because the word of God is silent concerning its use in the church. Therefore, instrumental music is not of faith. After concocting this syllogism, which hardly deserves to be so designated, a second phase is introduced. “Whatsoever is not of faith is sin” (Romans 14:23). Instrumental music in worship is not of faith. Therefore, instrumental music in worship is a sin. Those who regard individual cups, classes, colleges, or institutional orphan homes as a sin, merely slip the words “instrumental music” out and drop their own issues of the moment in the vacant slots and they have a ready-made argument as incontrovertible proof of the utter sinfulness of whatever it is they oppose.

One does not have to be especially adept in either the sacred scriptures or science of dialectics to point out at least three loopholes in this compound of propositions. However, we must confine ourselves to one which twists a scripture and spins a web of sophistry. We are not thereby entering into an examination of the right or wrong of cups, classes, colleges, clarinets or concert pianos. This is aside from our present pursuit. Our point of investigation centers around the meaning of the expression, “Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.” We think that, correctly understood, this passage might convey exactly the opposite meaning to that intended by orthodox debaters.

The 14th chapter of Romans is devoted to showing us how we can live together in spite of differences and varied concepts. This difficult assignment can be achieved only by mutual recognition of and respect for the following principles which are elemental to the Christian structure.

1. The basis upon which God welcomes us all. He receives us with our varied scruples and opinions (14:3), and we must “welcome one another, therefore, as Christ has welcomed you” (15:7).

2. The absolute and universal lordship of Jesus (14:9), which makes him the sole judge of all as to motive and practice (14:10), and removes such judgment from our sphere of action.

3. The inviolability and sovereignty of the individual conscience which determines for each saint the validity of any action or thing at a given time. Even that which is not unclean of itself becomes unclean to one who thinks it is unclean (14:14).

4. The law of relative values which makes a man for whom Christ died more important than any thing for which Christ did not die. Incorporated in this is the truth that a man is of more value than his thoughts (14:15, 16).

5. The nature of the kingdom of God which consists of universals of such magnitude as to transcend mere transitory things, and which provide a foundation upon which all of us can stand (14:18).

6. The reciprocal obligation devolving upon all to pursue only what makes for peace and for mutual upbuilding (14:19).

One who does not predicate his approach to this chapter upon these considerations will be like a ship without a rudder or a plane without radar. We are now ready to consider the meaning of faith in verses 22, 23. "The faith that you have, keep between yourself and God; happy is he who has no reason to judge himself for what he approves." Obviously Paul is not talking here about the faith which saves, about which he spoke in Romans 10:17. That faith is to be proclaimed and shared. The faith here is a personal conviction as to whether one in Christ can engage in certain things which others do in Christ. It is a private persuasion. "Let every one be fully convinced in his own mind" (verse 5). As Phillips very aptly translates it, "Your personal convictions are a matter of faith between yourself and God, and you are happy if you have no qualms about what you allow yourself to eat." One must not inject this faith, or impose it upon others. He must cherish it in the full realization that God knows he is right even if some brethren do not think so.

One must never act against personal conviction. Even if a thing is right one must not violate his conscience and do it if it appears wrong to him. If he has doubts he must resolve them or overcome them before he proceeds. “But he who has doubts is condemned, if he eats, because he does not act from faith; for whatsoever does not proceed from faith is sin.” Since this faith is one’s personal conviction or opinion, will the brethren who employ the statement in opposition to the use of instrumental music, concede that it is not sin for those to use it whose consciences do not condemn them and who act in “good faith.” Will they agree on this issue to “let every one be fully convinced in his own mind?” Will they cease judging those who do and let them stand or fall to their own Master? Or, will they pilfer the passage from its context and rob it of its setting to make an argument?

Now comes a strange paradox. When we begin to ask such questions, the reply is that this chapter is not dealing with such things as instrumental music at all, and it does not fall into the category of eating meats and respecting days. Then why do these brethren appeal to the final verse as the major premise in their syllogism? The height of inconsistency was reached by one brother writing in a prominent partisan journal published in the Southland. In one issue he employed the final verse of Romans 14 to prove that instrumental music in the worship was a sin, and shortly thereafter devoted a page to proving that the chapter had nothing to do with such matters. “Surely the legs of the lame are not equal.”

It is right, and even obligatory, for our brethren to oppose that which they conceive to be detrimental to the sacred scriptures, but they should not need to rewrite those scriptures in order to do so. Those who propose to quote from Romans 14 need to decide which side they will take. One cannot pitch on both teams and be the umpire too. He cannot operate both ends of the see-saw at the same time! It is astonishing indeed how the defenders of partisan programs will warp and wrest the very word they claim to recognize as authority.

Are You a Liberal?

Mission Messenger (March 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

The brethren in Christ who grew up in a narrow and intolerant faction which they were taught, from earliest childhood, to regard as the one holy, apostolic and catholic church of God upon earth, and who were encouraged to think of all others outside the partisan pale as “heathen and publicans,” find themselves in a state of shock when someone dares to question whether their faction, or any other faction, so conceived and so dedicated, is the sole constituency of the body of which the Son of God is the head. That there should be saints in Christ who are not in the party is unthinkable. The rest of the world may be wrong about many things, and is wrong about most everything, as they view it, but that their leaders can be wrong about anything, is unthinkable.

Under these conditions, when someone suggests that the party walls are arbitrarily constructed by men and do not represent the limits of God’s acceptance, and that there are sons of God outside “the brotherhood” created by allegiance to a certain journal or its viewpoint, he is liable to be branded as a liberal. This convenient term is used to frighten those who would be disposed to climb up on the top rail and investigate beyond the limits of “the old corral.” There is something about the word “Liberal” which connotes denial of things basic and fundamental to the Christian concept. The mere mention of it conjures up the form of a spectral evil genius, garbed in the robe of a philosopher, who plots and plans, in conjunction with Belial, the seduction and destruction of all we hold dear. To designate a person as a "Liberal" is equivalent to warning all of the folks that when he is in the neighborhood, they should put the dogs under the porch, call all the children in, lock and bar the door, and draw the shades before crawling under the beds.

This is of interest to me because I have before me as I write, three papers, each produced by a different party in "The Church of Christ." One is edited in California, the other two in Texas. The California journal has an article designating as "liberals" the folk who subscribe to the viewpoints of both Texas papers because they espouse and defend Bible classes and individual cups. The congregations which have these things are referred to by the rather fantastic and slightly amusing caption, "Sunday School and cups churches." But one of the Texas journals designates the followers of the other as "liberals" because they endorse what is called "centralized supervision." This is a term coined to describe the method of support of "Herald of Truth" which is a propaganda device specializing in the employment of radio programs.

The third paper has an editorial referring to me as "a liberal." Members of the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood have much in common, one of them being that all of them are tagged as "liberals" by some of the others. One does not need to be much of a logician to reach the conclusion that if every one is a liberal no one is, and that which loses its power of distinction can no longer distinguish. Before the word "liberal" can possibly define a man's position in these days, the one who uses it must define the word "liberal." As a label it is so indistinct that one cannot tell the content without opening the container. It is a little like the dear old soul who wanted to tell her pies apart and marked some of them T. M. for "'Tis mince," and the rest of them T. M. for "'Tain't mince." We may all be liberal and not know it. On the following grounds I cheerfully plead guilty to the charge of my fellow-editor in Texas, who would like to see me hanged but always gets tangled in his own rope while trying to throw it across a limb.

1. If reception of all who are children of my Father as my brothers, on the same conditions as he accepts all of us, makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

2. If reverence for the Lordship of Jesus over the whole body, and recognition that every sincere immersed believer in His divine Son is in that body makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

3. If regard for the authority of the new covenant scriptures in every particular, as well in fellowship and unity as in repentance and baptism, makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

4. If registering one's love for all the brethren, sharing with them and associating with them, calling upon them to pray to the Father, and defending their right to be answerable to a common Master, makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

5. If refusal to make anything a test of fellowship or of union or communion, which God has not made a condition of salvation, makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

6. If the resolution to be just a Christian and a Christian only, and not some special brand or type of Christian, not even a "Church of Christ Christian," or a "Christian Church Christian," makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

7. If respect for the sovereignty and dignity of the individual conscience, coupled with the steadfast refusal to allow my thinking to originate in or be regulated by any pressure group, in Texas or California, makes one a liberal, then I'm a liberal.

On the same grounds I suspect we are developing more “liberals” all of the time. Not all have been “liberated” yet and cannot allow it to be known for fear of reprisal. But better days are in the offing. The sun is starting to break through the clouds. In the meantime I am trying to overcome the factional tendency to label others in the family. A man is not so much of a liberal or extremist because of where he stands as because of where I stand as I look at him. One might be on my left and still be “right,” or he might be on my right and still be “left.” I am concerned that all of us be in Him and that He abide in us. If we remain in the right person it will be difficult to stay in the wrong place!

Analysis of Apostasy

Mission Messenger (April 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

It has long been a slogan of those affiliated with the “Churches of Christ” that “We speak where the Bible speaks, and remain silent where the Bible is silent.” Actually this statement is more of a cliché than a governing principle. It is apparently not taken too seriously by those who parrot it. There may be some question as to whether it is possible to literally implement the import of the statement, but in any event each faction makes it sufficiently elastic to include what it wants to include and to exclude what it wants to deny. We are treated to the ridiculous sight of two dozen parties “speaking where the Bible speaks,” and all saying something different; and “remaining silent where the Bible is silent,” while openly denouncing the silences of each other.

Apparently a goodly number of the professional preachers and teachers in the various segments give more concern to speaking where the Bible speaks than they devote to speaking as the Bible speaks. If we intend to be true disciples, in the real sense of that word, we must not merely quote texts and repeat words used by the Spirit, but we must mean the same thing the Spirit meant when he used the terms. To do otherwise would be to wrest or twist the words of revelation. Words are signs or symbols of ideas and we must convey the proper ideas of the words we use or else we will confuse the hearts of men.

It is obvious that we have developed a great many ideas foreign to the sacred scriptures which we try to sanctify by clothing them in scriptural verbiage. We assume that what we now have is the primitive church restored and we conclude that by applying Biblical designations we prove that these things are of divine origin. It is demonstrable that almost every scriptural term has been abused by attaching it to something, or by attaching something to it, which is foreign to the sacred writings. A few examples are bishop, presbytery, church, worship and sanctuary. One of the most critical abuses is that of the word "ministry." Whereas the Spirit applies this to every form of service compatible with the Christian ideal, our brethren now speak of "the ministry" in a specialized and exclusive sense. In the new covenant sense one enters the ministry when he comes into Christ by an act of God; in the decadent modernistic sense he "enters the ministry" by completing a curriculum outlined by men. Until we recapture the vital significance of the priesthood of all believers, and the ministry of all the saints, we will be only nibbling at the edge of restoration.

It is in the field of human relationships and attitudes toward each other, however, that we often exhibit our dearth of those qualities essential to the survival of any movement based upon common faith. Even the most casual observer can see that when the strength of a cause is dependent upon the separation of its adherents from an alien world, to apply those epithets to one which belong only to the other, will weaken those who should be strengthened, and strengthen those who should be weakened. The hope of the survival of the Christian faith lies in our ability to manifest such love toward others as will transcend all else.

When Satan can take advantage of those differences which will naturally arise and tempt us into treating each other as aliens, he has injected a venom into the blood-stream of the body which will eventually paralyze it. In spite of this, many of our brethren think they prove their loyalty to Jesus when they brand other members with designations belonging only to the unregenerate. Passages demanding that Christians be not unequally yoked with pagans are quoted to keep Christians from being yoked to each other. Those written to encourage the saints to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness are employed to keep the saints from having fellowship with others in the light. Those written to forbid a greeting to men who denied that Jesus had come in the flesh are quoted to keep apart those who firmly believe this salient truth.

Apostates and Apostasy

One word which we believe is misapplied is “apostate.” Every deviation from the orthodoxy of every faction is labeled apostasy; every honest non-conformist is an apostate. One who cannot conscientiously see any violation of the divine purpose of the ages in the use of individual containers to distribute the fruit of the vine in the Lord’s Supper is called an apostate by those who regard this as an innovation. The same thing is true of those who have Bible classes for teaching the word of God to different ages, those who have chartered homes in which to rear and care for orphans, and those who hold that the coming of our Lord will be pre-millennial.

I have before me, as I write, a periodical published by those brethren who oppose the method of producing and financing “Herald of Truth.” This international propaganda medium is presented under direction of one congregation in Texas. The elders of this congregation solicit and receive funds for the program and it is supervised by them. This is designated “centralized control” by a large segment of the brethren in the non-instrument wing of the disciple brotherhood. They regard it as being in the same category as a missionary society and have coined the word “institutionalism” to describe the philosophy of those who support Herald of Truth and certain types of orphan homes. In the journal to which I allude is an editorial attacking those who espouse the philosophy, and three times they are referred to as “liberals and apostates.”

It is not our intention here to enter the ranks of the contenders on either side, nor to attempt to determine for any of our readers the right or wrong of the thing under discussion. We do not suppose that anyone would be so foolish as to try to show that the primitive saints had anything comparable to “Herald of Truth.” No one would expect to find it in what our brethren call “the pattern.” Those who support it do so on the basis of deductions and inferences, that is judgmental interpretation of the scriptures. Those who oppose it do so on the same basis. All of them want to respect the authority of our Lord, but both groups confuse their interpretations with the scriptures, and argue for the authority of their opinions as scripture.

Like every other serious person who loves the Lord, I hold some views relative to the validity of the things under discussion. I suspect that both factions miss the real dangers to Christianity involved in their contentions. However, my present purpose is to point out that neither those who support or those who oppose “Herald of Truth” are apostates. The spirit which prompts brethren to so categorize and castigate each other is infinitely more harmful to the cause of our Lord than the methods they employ for implementing their work. The divinely ordained means of impressing the world with our discipleship is not related to programs, methods or promotional schemes, but is to be by attitude toward each other. If we are tempted by Satan to allow things to disturb or destroy this attitude we have no other means of drawing or attracting mankind. “By this shall all men know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another.” It is not likely that many will be attracted to a movement in which all are branded as apostates by others in the same movement.

What Is Apostasy?

The word “apostasy” does not appear in the King James Version, but the Greek original is found twice. Once it has to do with the untrue accusation against Paul that he taught “all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses” (Acts 21:21). Literally the word means “to fall away,” and the tenor of the context shows that Paul incurred the animosity of the orthodox Jews because they mistakenly concluded that he was advocating utter abandonment of Judaism, “saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs.” This would amount to an absolute defection from the revelation they had been taught to revere.

The other occurrence is in 2 Thessalonians 2:3, where Paul assures the saints in Thessalonica that the return of the Lord was not imminent because it had to be preceded by a “falling away” of such magnitude as to result in the enthronement of “the man of sin, the son of perdition.” The defection would be the culmination or result of the mystery of iniquity, and would be characterized by one “who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God.”

The one editorial to which I referred uses the word “apostates” more times than the Holy Spirit employed it in the whole of the new covenant scriptures. It is a striking fact that, in spite of all the problems at Corinth, not once in two letters addressed to the saints in that city did the apostle refer to any of his brethren in Christ as apostates. The truth is that the Holy Spirit never once labeled any brother in the Lord by the term so frequently bandied about today by aspirants to factional leadership and control. Our brethren who are thus stigmatized are not apostates. They have not deserted Jesus. They have not fallen away from the faith. They have not defected from the Christian walk.

One who loves the Lord Jesus Christ is not an apostate simply because he cannot conscientiously concur with the orthodox position of a party. No one becomes an apostate because of his view on cups, classes, colleges or collectives for the care of homeless children. It is a reflection against the Father to stigmatize his children who love him by accusing them of apostasy because of personal peculiarities of sentiment. It is also an indication of the deep infiltration of factional bitterness into the hearts of those who engage in such accusations. Honest disagreement about the relative value of methods and manners under controversy does not make apostates of those who are either pro or con on such things. Men can be mistaken without being malicious. They can fail to understand without falling away from Jesus.

The extreme harshness toward sincere brethren holding dissident views is working its own rebuke. It is helping to arouse brethren everywhere to the true nature of the factional spirit. There is a revolution taking place. It is making an impact upon some in even the most reactionary parties. For the first time in a century which has been marked by splits and schisms there is a notable change occurring. Brethren are becoming weary of misrepresentation by partisan leaders. They are tired of the sin of over-simplification which makes the adherents of one faction "the good guys," and everyone else "the bad guys." They are sick of silly charges and countercharges in orthodox partisan journals which specialize in challenges to debate but which contain nothing challenging to live for. There is a deadening sameness, a paralyzing mediocrity, in the material presented in these factional mouthpieces. This is apparent when one considers how much all are aroused by an occasional thought-provoking article which slips by the editorial desk.

The current revolt is strongest in the college and university group, but it is spreading to all classes and conditions of saints. Brilliant young men and women who have been trained to think are exercising their right to do so in every department of existence. In the spiritual realm they have associated with some who have been branded as “dangerous” and have even been labeled “heretics” and they have found them to be the real salt of the earth. Indeed a “heretic” in some circles is one who has not lost “his savor.” Many are no longer content with a passive role where you never dare to question the interpretations of the preacher, and must swallow the party regulations related to fellowship without protest.

This gathering of the forces of reform, and the crystallization of antifactional thinking, has frightened the defenders of orthodoxy. Veiled threats are being issued. The three familiar factional weapons— innuendo, ostracism and boycott— are being unsheathed. But they are not working as effectively as they once did. A new day has come! A new generation has arisen! Those who are leading in the current reformation have been publicly assailed as posing the greatest threat to the church in a century. But the force of this is blunted when it is recognized that those who make the charge have confused the party in which they live and from which they draw their financial livelihood with the church for which Jesus died. Men will resist anything which threatens their financial standing and social prestige.

It is being said that the revolution is making capital of emotional, unsettled and unstable youth, but the truth is that the college men and women who are involved are the most serious, studious and sanctified ones on the campus. They can no longer make one’s test of relationship and loyalty to the Lord Jesus hinge upon an attitude toward cups, classes, orphan homes, the pre-millennial viewpoint or instrumental music. They place the relationship in Christ Jesus ahead of the things about which the children argue. They think brethren can fall out with each other without falling away from Christ. They know the difference between an intellectual approach to a problem and apostasy from the one Lord.

I am not afraid of the spirit of challenge and adventure.

The fresh breezes now blowing across the restoration movement are invigorating and healthful. We cannot lose by re-thinking our course in the light of the sacred oracles. Let the searchlight of examination be turned on in full glare against any position we have held in the past. Let the word of God be critically studied anew and every passage be analyzed afresh. We want to know the truth regardless of cost or suffering. No price is too great to pay for this “gem of purest ray serene.” Only the party is endangered by such a course. The church of God will be unscathed and will reflect more brilliantly the glory belonging only to God. Let the truth be known!

The Unrecognized Unity

Mission Messenger (April 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

Did it ever occur to you that the unity for which Jesus prayed might come and we would not recognize it? “The wind blows where it wills; you hear the sound of it, but you do not know where it comes from, or where it is going. So it is with everyone who is born of the Spirit.” Could this also be true of that unity which is born of the Spirit? “You cannot tell by observation when the kingdom of God comes. There will be no saying, ‘Look, here it is!’ or ‘there it is!’ for in fact the kingdom of God is among you.” Is it possible that the unity of the kingdom will be like the kingdom itself? Will it be in us and dwell among us in a very real sense but free from show and overt demonstration?

Perhaps the Christian world is like the Jewish world when Jesus came. Here were people who had the word of God. They revered it, studied it and discussed it. Jesus said to them, “You search the scriptures because you think that in them you have eternal life.” They were familiar with every Messianic hint and prophecy. They had built up great commentaries containing the text of their debates and disputations. But when Jesus came they did not recognize their Messiah. They knew the plan of the scriptures but they did not know the Man of the scriptures.

Out of their interpretations they built up an idea of how Christ must come and how he must act. But the revelation was one thing and their interpretation was another thing. Jesus came “according to the scriptures” but not according to their ideas of what the scriptures meant. They could quote the scriptures by rote to prove they were right. Of them it was said, “You rely upon the law and are proud of your God; you know his will; you are confident that you are the one to guide the blind, to enlighten the benighted, to train the stupid and to teach the immature, because in the law you see the very shape of knowledge and truth” (Romans 1:17-20).

The retort to every question would have been, “It has to be this way because that is what the Book says!” And when he appeared he came according to the volume but not according to their version. He fulfilled God’s revelation but failed in their expectation. They knew only one solution. When there is a seeming conflict between the law and the Lord, the first must be glorified and the other crucified. “We have a law and by our law he ought to die.” The law they had was the law of God and they used the law of God to kill the Lamb of God. Clever legalists can legalize anything. They do not deny the cross; they simply nail men to it. To them it is not a means of ridding themselves of sin, but of a Savior.

When Jesus came “the people were on the tiptoe of expectation” (Luke 3:15). They are that way now on the subject of unity. Interest is at fever pitch. The ecumenical council at Rome and the ecumenical movement in Protestantism— these have kindled thought and sparked hope in a prospect so vast and magnificent that men whisper their very dreams in awe. Organizations that once seemed indispensable are now ready to be offered upon the sacrificial altar, traditions which were deemed vital are now ready for the scrapheap. This is a period of restlessness, transition and upheaval. New structures are being debated, old structures are being demolished, re-structure is being deliberated.

In the midst of the maelstrom of activity with the hum of party machinery and the buzz of political maneuvering, I seem to hear the whisper of a still small voice from the bygone centuries, warning as of yore, "If they tell you, 'He is there in the wilderness,' do not go out; or if they say, 'He is there in the inner room,' do not believe it." The unity for which Jesus prayed is not a project of conventions nor a product of councils. It cannot be drafted, dictated or documented. It cannot be voted in, voted out, or even voted on. There will come no hour when men can affix their signatures to a declaration and say, "This is it!" It is true that a cessation of partisan hostilities can be thus arranged, and tired combatants can lay down their factional arms, but this is as far from "the peace that passeth understanding" as the east is from the west.

We are trained and conditioned to think only in terms of organization. We can do nothing without conclaves and charters, laws and by-laws. And we are tempted to think that because we have been imbued with the spirit of organization that our structures are organizations of the Spirit. In reality we have not been organized to live but we have been organized to death. We have forsaken the simplicity of the One Way for the complexity of our own ways. We have forfeited affection for affectation. Increasingly we hear about "the community image" of the church, little remembering that those who make an image generally end up worshiping it.

Unity will never come by legislation. It is not the child of conventions nor the seed of synods. It is not sired by sessions nor born of boards. Unity cannot be enforced externally; it must be enjoyed internally. It is a fruit of the Spirit and fruit grows naturally from the substance absorbed by deep roots. It is not explosive or exhaustive.

When hearts yearn for each other with a deep and abiding affection, when brotherhood is conditioned upon common Fatherhood and fellowship is recognized as the result of mutual sonship, unity will flow forth as a broad and tranquil stream whose crystal waters are furnished by the bubbling springs of thousands of quiet hearts. Then we will not need to argue every action of every faction, nor debate every minor deviation of every dissident party, but love will triumph over trouble and we shall grow together in the bundle of life with the souls of all the brethren, and we shall be tied with the scarlet line that flowed from his lacerated side. This is unity of the Spirit!

It is on its way! You can sense its throbbing, pulsating presence in the growing revolt against narrow intolerant orthodoxy on the campus of every college in this land. Men are growing tired of bickering over trifles in a world at crisis. They are weary of insane feuds bequeathed from generations past which have no relevance in this day of decision. They are sick of being pawns in party struggles for power promoted by jealous preachers. The futility of proclaiming unity while practicing division is freely acknowledged. The parroting of scriptures with partisan prejudice is working its own rebuke. The childish competition and ridiculous rivalry at the rim of Armageddon are being rejected by rational minds. The folly of a church militant against herself is being seen in true perspective in the light of burning “heretics” who were the truest friends of truth.

The “fellowship of the concerned ones” is growing. The factional defenders of partisan orthodoxy are frightened. A few years ago they laughed among themselves and cautioned each other to ignore what was happening. They comforted one another with the thought that no reform had ever made any impact upon them. The organization was iron-clad and every dissenter was doomed to waste his life away without affecting those inside the wall. They no longer laugh. The hollow echoes of yesterday haunt them like ghosts of the past.

A new movement is gathering force— a twentieth century restoration movement— linked by kinship to the restoration movements of long ago and yet destined to meet realistically the needs of our contemporary era. Already the roots of the plea for fellowship have penetrated every partisan fence and barrier. Hearts are beating in unison of purpose even while minds are still disturbed by varying opinions.

Such unity will continue to grow, although unrecognized by factional proponents who dogmatically insist that it must come only by surrender to them instead of to Jesus. It is a unity in depth and will not be attained by shallow compromise. It is a unity of maturity in vision which will offset the childishness of division. It is a unity which will call with compelling voice to the scattered sheep grazing upon the barren slopes of a sterile sectarianism, and they will lift up their heads and listen and hear, and move toward the Shepherd, realizing as they draw closer that “there is one flock and one Shepherd,” and there can never be more than one. It is the natural unity which belongs to a divine organism and can never be created by a human organization. It is the spirit of unity produced by the unity of the Spirit— and these can never be reversed!

The Pervading Silence

Mission Messenger (April 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

A brother writes from Saskatchewan to enquire if our offer to various colleges has received an answer. Another brother, who lives in Texas, writes, "I have been watching your columns anxiously to see if your courageous offer would receive a favorable reply and an invitation from my alma mater. I will be grievously disappointed if they do not accept your proposal." Both of these men refer to the following statement which we published in our issue of last October.

To those who are of a disposition to place the quest for truth above partisan politics we make this proposal. We will appear at our own expense on the platform of the annual lectureship at George Pepperdine College, Abilene Christian College, Lubbock Christian College, Harding College, David Lipscomb College, and Florida College, and submit to open public questioning by members of the faculty, or if permitted, by the entire audience. We pledge that we will conduct ourselves with proper Christian decorum and love those who disagree as much as we do those who agree with our views.

This article constitutes our personal permission for any freedom-loving alumnus or group connected with any of the colleges mentioned, to petition the administrative heads of their alma mater for a fair hearing on our position. We have been the subject of discussion in absentia in every one of these schools in classes or on the public platform. We await with interest the outcome of this offer to see if a single one of them will dare to face up to the greatest challenge of the twentieth century— that of offering a real basis for Christian unity which transcends all partisan, sectarian and factional considerations.

Thus far only a deathlike silence has greeted our offer insofar as college officialdom is concerned. But a faculty member of one of the colleges wrote that some of his colleagues had agreed that if one of the professors in Abilene Christian College had presented my position on fellowship and unity he would have been hailed as “the savior of the restoration movement,” although they did not dare acquiesce in it now, for it would be “the kiss of death.”

There is a grassroots movement gathering momentum which will not always be squelched. Students and faculty members alike are growing tired of the projection of a partisan image in a world calling for relief from the burden and scandal of the sectarian spirit. Who knows but what the time may yet come when I shall be allowed to set forth my own position and defend it before audiences which have heard attacks made which were unfair and unjust? Our brethren cannot always hide from the truth for “the eternal years of God are hers.”

Walking in the Light

Mission Messenger (May 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

“But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin” (1 John 1:7).

No discussion of fellowship can ignore this statement. It is apparent that the fellowship mentioned is conditioned upon “walking in the light” and doing so to the extent that God is in the light. But what is the light? What is darkness? What is it to “walk in the light?” An objective analysis of this passage and a proper answer to these questions produces a real surprise to partisan defenders who have merely accepted a traditional explanation without study or investigation.

It is not our present intention to outline at length the background of this epistle. That belongs more appropriately to our forthcoming discussion of 2 John 10, 11. It will suffice now to say that, at the time of this writing, the last survivor of the apostles was living in Ephesus. Here he came into direct contact with the sect of the Gnostics who had infiltrated and disturbed every congregation in the Greek world. These factionalists pretended to special insights and claimed to have knowledge of the mystical and elemental structure of the universe. They took their title from gnosis, knowledge. They were the “knowing ones,” those on the inside, as opposed to the uninitiated.

Although there were various schools of gnostic thought, all were basically agreed upon the idea underlying their synthetic philosophy, that all matter is essentially evil. On this basis they concluded that God could not have personally created the world because he could have no contact with or relationship to evil. By the same token they concluded that Jesus was either a phantom, or that he was born of Joseph and Mary and elevated to Sonship with God at his baptism by John. Under the leadership of Cerinthus and other advocates of that day, this philosophy wormed its way into every congregation in Asia Minor. Wherever it went it destroyed the faith of many in the fact that Jesus had come in the flesh.

Prevalent in the theory was the idea that there could be no possible union between the human and the divine. The former was material and, therefore, evil; and the possibility of fellowship between them was regarded as absurd and ridiculous. God was so far above the universe which had been created by a demi-urge, one of a series of emanations which had gone out from the divine essence, that he was wholly unconcerned about anything on earth and completely without interest in mankind. There could be no bridging of the chasm between deity and humanity, and from this stemmed two conclusions. Jesus was not deity manifested in a body of flesh and there was no such thing as a stage of fellowship between God and man.

John counters this theory with his gospel record. This will account for the difference between it and the “synoptics.” This term is applied to Matthew, Mark and Luke, because their contents can be charted in parallel columns and synchronized. A synopsis can be made which will be true of all three. The gospel according to John does not lend itself to such treatment. It was written for a distinctive purpose and to meet a wholly different need. The first two epistles of John were written for the same purpose. Both specifically deal with the treatment to be accorded those who “deny that Jesus is the Christ” (1 John 2:22), that is, “that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh” (2 John 7).

An analysis of 1 John in the light of its background and the circumstances which called it forth, is one of the most rewarding experiences which can come to the dedicated Bible student. John begins by affirming that eternal life, which was with God from the beginning, was manifested and made visible unto men, and that he was one of the selected witnesses who beheld that life embodied in a person, and could testify to it. “We have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life.” Since eternal life was with the Father from the beginning, and was not merely extension of time, but possessed the quality of personality, the pre-existence of the “Word of life” was thus asserted.

Nature of the Testimony

The fact that prior to the manifestation, the Word was in a different state, does not argue against existence. It serves only to demonstrate that the incarnation revealed to human eyes what previously had been hidden from them. Once accepted, this would deal a death blow to elemental gnosticism. But there was a group of gnostics called the Docetics, from dokeo, to appear, to seem. These alleged that Jesus possessed no reality, that he was immaterial, and a phantom (or phantasy). For their benefit the apostle shows that the Word not only became flesh, but was actually subject to examination by the senses.

He argues against the possibility of the witnesses being deceived or deluded upon the basis of their intimate personal association with the embodied Word. From the standpoint of time, proximity and conscious interest, they had ample opportunity to examine the validity of his claims. They were with him long enough and were associated with him closely enough that they could not be misled. Their own careers and very lives were staked upon his veracity. They had left all and followed after him.

Their examination was audible, visual and manual. “We have heard, we have seen with our eyes, we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life.” The best proof is visual, and this is stressed. Not only did they see Jesus with their eyes, but they “looked upon” him. This has to do with studied investigation or prolonged scrutiny. Theirs was no mere passing glance. They did not simply look at Jesus as he passed by, but they looked upon him. The apostles were qualified witnesses. Their testimony met all of the requirements essential to proving a point of fact.

Their experience with the manifested Word made possible a fellowship with the Father, and with His Son Jesus Christ. Eternal life became incarnate in Jesus, and when Jesus took up his abode in them, eternal life became incarnate with them. “This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life” (1 John 5:11, 12). When the Word of life became embodied, that Word was designated the Son of God. When eternal life dwells in us we are also called sons of God. “Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God” (3:1).

The declaration of what the apostolic witnesses had seen and heard was to make possible the extension of the divine-human fellowship unto their hearers, and thus provide for them fulness of joy. The essence of the message which had been conveyed unto them by God and which they, in turn, conveyed to others, was summed up in the words, “God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.” Since the declaration was to assure fellowship of the human with the divine, and since it consisted of the statement that God is light in the absolute, it is obvious that nothing can be of greater importance than identification of the light. Fellowship is conditioned upon walking in that light.

Fellowship is not by word but by walk. It is not the testimony of the lips but of the life. The word “walk” means more than merely making progress in a given direction, or placing each foot alternately before the other. It involves experience and sharing of thought and life. “And Enoch walked with God, and he was not (found); for God took him” (Gen. 5:24). “Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God” (Gen. 6:9). Inasmuch as God is light, to say that one is in fellowship with God, while walking in darkness, is to lie and do not the truth. Darkness is the opposite to light.

Identifying the Light

“But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.”

What is the light? In this context the light is what God is, for God is light. The word “light” is used as a symbol for various qualities or things in the inspired scriptures. Sometimes it is used for divine revelation, and the unrevealed is darkness. Sometimes it is used for reverence of the living God, and idolatry is darkness. More frequently it is used for knowledge and ignorance is darkness. Only by studying the frame of reference in which the term is employed can one be certain of its meaning.

In this connection, we can eliminate from consideration anything which it is not possible for man to possess in the same degree as God, that is, in an absolute or perfect degree. “God is light and in him is no darkness at all . . . If we walk in the light as he is in the light.” This immediately excludes knowledge of God’s will from consideration. It is obvious that none of us can have the same degree of mental perception as God. The finite mind cannot embrace the scope of the infinite. To walk in the light cannot mean either to perfectly understand God’s will or to perfectly do it. This would require something we do not have in the flesh.

Fortunately, we can determine from this brief epistle what light is, as John uses the word. Light is love. It is not, however, affection, sentiment or passion. This love of which John speaks is agape, the love which God had for us which prompted him to send Jesus to die for us. It is that active and energetic good will which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object. It must be expressed. It can never be passive. It is apprehended in its demonstration which is always outreaching and outgoing. "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us" (3:16). It is this in which we must walk.

Light is love and since the opposite of light is darkness, the darkness must be hate. Once this is grasped every sentence in the epistle falls into place like the pieces of a jig-saw puzzle and a beautiful picture results. Let us proceed with the proof of our assertion. To abide in the light is to love the brethren. "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him" (2:10). If this is correct, hatred for the brethren will be darkness. "He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother is in darkness even until now" (2:9). This last is the equivalent of saying, "If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie" (1:6). "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar" (4:20).

It may be urged that the completing phrase of verse 6 is "do not the truth." This is correct for if we walk in darkness "we lie and do not the truth." But it is by brotherly love that we know we are of the truth. "And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him" (3:19). To the Greeks, truth was the reality which was at the basis of all appearance. It was the ideal which was behind every semblance. It was the genuine. John is saying that those who are "in the truth" are obligated to walk according to it, and the reality behind God's whole purpose is love. If we say that we share in the divine nature (have fellowship with God), and walk in darkness (hate our brethren), we lie and do not the truth (miss the reality underlying the whole Christian structure).

Personification of Love

On what premise can we conclude that John introduces the theme of love in conjunction with his affirmation that the Word of life was personalized? The answer is simply that it was the love of God which made eternal life manifest unto us. Because he loved us thus, we ought also to love one another. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him" (4:9). "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" (3:16). "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another" (4:11).

The Son of God was "God manifest in the flesh, reconciling the world unto himself." But that which was manifested was the Word of life which was with God in the beginning, and which was also God. But that light which was manifested was eternal life (1:2). It was this Word of life personalized which constituted the basis of the apostolic message. "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you." Eternal life is not extension of time but expression of love! Read the following carefully. "This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light" (1:5). "For this is the message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another" (3:11). "This is the message . . . God is light." "This is the message . . . that we should love." There are not two messages. There is simply the message. It defines the nature of God and outlines the expression of that nature in those who are his sons.

And if it be true that light is love, it must follow that, if God is light, God is love. On this the record is positive. "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him" (4:16). "He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love" (4:8). To the serious student nothing else should be necessary to identify the light. When a writer says, "God is light," and in the very same connection twice explains what he means by saying, “God is love,” it should require little intellectual ability to determine that in the context of that writer, light is love!

Perfection of Love

We come now to the chief intellectual hurdle and the greatest challenge to the scholarly mind. If light is love, does this not imply that we must possess love in the absolute, that is, in perfection? Whatever light is we must experience it, that is, walk in it to the same degree as it is manifested in God. “If we walk in the light as he is in the light.” That this is absolute is proven by the statement that “God is light and in him is no darkness at all.” If we walk in the light as he is in the light there can be none of the opposite effect in us.

We have already eliminated knowledge from consideration because all of us are ignorant in some degree, of the will of God. No one knows as much as God. To assume that light is knowledge of God’s will and darkness is ignorance of it, is simply to make us liars. We would then have to read, “if we say that we have fellowship with him and are ignorant of any part of the divine will, we lie and do not the truth. But if our knowledge is absolute and perfect, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.” No sane reasoner would want to hinge his hope of being cleansed from sin upon knowing as much as God does.

But do we not face the same problem if we regard light as being love? Can we love as God? Can we walk in this light as God is in the light? I unhesitatingly affirm that we can. This was the very purpose of John’s epistle. It was written to tell us why and how we must do so. The thing that disturbs many is that they regard love as something to be achieved rather than something to be experienced. But no one achieves light. It is a creation of God, a blessing to be bestowed and enjoyed. And that love which is equivalent to light is not something to be attained by human striving. It is a gift of God. It is a commitment unto us of the divine nature. "Love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God" (4:7).

When the love of God was personalized in Jesus, God revealed the possibility of incarnating the divine nature. That nature had always existed but was never expressed before as it was in Christ. "In him the whole fulness of deity dwells bodily" (Col. 2:9). In him the world could see love manifested. The nature possessed by God could now be incorporated in man, for true love was now available. "A new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you: because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth" (2:8): The true love was now reality in flesh.

The love that God requires he supplies. It is a fruit of the Spirit. It is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit which is given unto us of God (Romans 5:5). It did not originate with man but with God. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us" (1. John 4:10). "We love because he first loved us" (4:19). When God dwells in us his love is perfected in us (4:12). "And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love: and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him. Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world" (4:16, 17). As he is, so are we— and in this world!

This does not minimize our responsibility. It does not mean the human factor is eliminated. The provision of love is God's part; the expression of it is ours. God never forces us to act contrary to our will. It is his will to make love ours, it is ours to will love to others, and to be like him. This is proven by the fact that sometimes love is regarded as light which man cannot create, while at the same time man is commanded to walk in that light, that is, to exercise it in his own life. A man can love his brother or he can hate him. The manifestation of love is contingent upon the will of the individual, but one who is completely surrendered and committed to God will spontaneously and naturally walk in love. The secret is the surrender of the will absolutely to God so that the divine nature is incarnated in us as it was in Jesus. The Word must become flesh in us!

Loving Our Brothers

God is light. God is love. One who walks in love walks in light. One who dwells in God dwells in light. One who dwells in love dwells in God. God dwells in such a person, so he is in the light and the light is in him. “God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him” (4:16). It is as we love our brothers that we walk in light and move out of darkness— the darkness of hate and animosity. Let us note the things affirmed of such love.

1. To love the brethren is to abide in the light (2:10). The word “abide” is not the word for a temporary dwelling. It is not used of transients who merely stay overnight. The light is the fixed residence of those who love the brethren. They do not merely pass through the light enroute from one area of darkness to another.

2. Love for the brethren is one of the two distinctive marks of sonship with God. “Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God” (3:1). “In this the children of God are manifest and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother” (3:10).

3. Love for the brethren is a way-mark to identify the area into which we have come as that of life. “We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren” (3:14). The expression used here has to do with crossing a frontier. It was used of those returning from an alien country to their native land. When one is able to love the brethren unreservedly, because they are brethren, and not upon other conditions, he can know that he has left the territory where death reigns. He no longer breathes the noxious fumes of hate, he is in a purer atmosphere. He does not wade through the murky swamps of animosity. His feet are on solid ground.

4. Love for the brethren is a criterion by which we can determine we are of the truth. It is useless to contend we are of the truth when we do not love our brethren. We can memorize the scriptures and be able to quote whole chapters but this does not demonstrate we are of the truth. “And hereby we know we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him” (3:19).

5. Love manifested toward brethren enables God to dwell in us, that is to be in fellowship with us. As we love, the divine love is perfected in us. We must love as God loved. His love was not conditioned upon our sinlessness, our perfection in knowledge, or our freedom from error. The love of God is different from all other forms of love. Love which is composed of sentiment, affection or emotion, is extended to those who are deemed worthy. The love of God creates the worth in itself. The first loves those who are precious; the others are precious because they are loved.

When we tolerate or endure those who disagree with us and love those who do not, we are no better than the despised and outcast publicans (Matt. 5:46). They loved those who reciprocated in kind. Theirs was the mutual sharing of misery. Our love is to be creative and outgoing. It expends itself because only in so doing can it live. In loving we see God in our own hearts. “No man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another God dwells in us, and his love is perfected in us” (4:12).

6. When we are partners in Brotherly Love, Unlimited, we are freed from all torment of fear. This is not true of those who are restrained and restricted by a legalistic concept of the Way.

All who seek to live by law, or love by law, will spend their time on earth “bound in shallows and in miseries.” Who knows if he has learned all he could learn, done all he could do, or climbed as high as he could by exertion of his own power or ability? There will always be doubt and suspicion, fear and distrust, under such a system. God changed the world by turning love loose. When we do the same we lose all fear of men on earth and judgment after death. The secret to the carefree life is love unbounded. “Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment . . . There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love” (4:17, 18). Notice that it is only perfect love that can cast out fear. Imperfect love is always frightened and fearful.

Hating Our Brothers

In the context love is a positive, active, energetic and energizing force. It is creative. But hate is negative. Because of its nature love must express itself in positive fashion, but hate need not necessarily do so. It can be simply lack of love. Man was made with the ability to love and thus to be like God, who is love. When he fails in this respect he does not cross the frontier. One must do something to leave where he is but he need not do anything to stay where he is. Not to love is to hate! This thesis would be incomplete if we showed the nature of love without studying the nature and results of hate.

1. Hatred for the brethren (that is, lack of love) leaves one in darkness. Regardless of how one may assert he is in the light, if he does not love, he lies. “He that saith he is in the light and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now” (2:9). Darkness is simply absence of light. God did not create darkness. He created light.

2. Hatred of our brethren blinds us and makes true perception impossible. No man can ever grasp the import of God's revelation until he loves his brethren as God loves them. To assert that one sees the truth while hating his brothers is like a blind man claiming to view the beauties of nature. "But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes" (2:11).

3. Lack of love for the brethren is proof of the fatherhood of Satan in our lives. The realm of hatred is presided over by "the prince of the power of the air." Those who operate in the area of hatred and animosity are on the devil's territory. It is useless to affirm we are sons of God if we do not love God's other sons. "In this the children of God are manifested and the children of the devil" (3:10).

4. Those who do not love the brethren are still in the domain of death. They dwell like lepers in putrid sepulchers, and like the evil spirits of old "abide in the tombs." It is by love that we cross the frontier from death unto life. He who has not learned to love has not learned to live (3:14).

5. One who hates his brother is a murderer. Under the regime of Christ, thought and intent may be taken for the act. Jesus pointed out that those in olden times said, "Thou shalt not kill" but now to be angry against a brother without cause, or to slander or falsely accuse him, might result in losing one's soul. One who hates lacks only the opportunity to do violence to a brother who is the object of his wrath and spite.

6. One who does not love does not know God. He may know about God and be able to catalogue the attributes of deity. But there is a difference in the ability to identify a person and in being identified with him. It is one thing to describe another; a wholly different thing to abide in Him. "He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love" (1 John 4:8).

The Fallacy of Orthodoxy

It cannot be denied that the average preacher of “The Church of Christ” regards the light of which John speaks as his own creedal interpretation of the new covenant scriptures! To “walk in the light” is to live up to the traditional factional explanation of the party of which he is a member. To “walk in darkness” is to deviate in some particular, especially that of the special party emphasis, from the unwritten creed. There are some two dozen factions in the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood. Each one thinks that it alone is in the light and all of the others are in darkness. Since “fellowship one with another” is conditioned upon “walking in the light,” and since the light is the legalistic code of the faction, fellowship is regarded as ordained of God to be limited to fellow-partisans.

It would be a matter of compassion if only the ignorant and unlearned were victims of such philosophy, but it becomes tragic when it is realized that this type of exposition is advocated by editors and journalists who have a reputation in their parties. It is even advanced by college professors responsible for teaching the young. The situation would be regrettable if such teaching was given without intent to unduly influence others; it is even more so when it is done with the deliberate design of maintaining division in the family of God, and keeping apart those who should recognize each other as brethren. When the humbler saints indicate a desire to exhibit love for those on the other side of a partisan wall they are discouraged by misapplication of the statement, “If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another.” Actually the revised factional version should read, “If they will walk in our light as we are in that light, we will have fellowship with them.”

The apostle John wrote in a time of crisis to stimulate believers in the Word of life and to encourage fellowship in love. His letter is a majestic treatise on brotherly love, unsurpassed in the whole realm of literature. In spite of that, men under the guise of loyalty to Jesus single out a passage and interpret it in such a manner as to make fellowship impossible and to render every claim of the epistle upon our better selves null and void. I deny that the light in this instance is a written code. God is light but he is not a written code. Not a letter that John wrote was either life or light. If the third epistle was either one, the apostle deliberately withheld life or light from Gaius, for he declared, "I had many things to write, but I will not with pen and ink write to thee." If the second epistle was to be life or light, it was imperfect, for John wrote, "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink." That the first letter was not intended to convey life is evident. "These things have I written unto you that believe on the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life" (5:13). Eternal life is not having a copy of the Bible, but having the Son of God. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (5:12).

Where is the congregation of believers which will brazenly affirm that it is composed only of those who know as much about God's will and purpose as God himself? If the light in which we must walk to have fellowship, is knowledge of God's revelation, we must either be as perfect as God or we cannot be in fellowship. "If we walk in the light as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another." "God is light and in him is no darkness at all." If darkness is ignorance we cannot be ignorant at all. We must know all there is to know, and be as wise as God, or else we walk in darkness. If we say we have fellowship with him and walk in darkness—if we are ignorant about anything—we lie and do not the truth.

The absurdity of this lies in the fact that we will have to immerse people in the morning and exclude them from our fellowship in the afternoon, for if they do not come to a perfect knowledge as soon as they are immersed they are walking in darkness. If the champions of orthodoxy say that we must allow them time to learn, then we ask how long can they walk in darkness and be accepted? How much of the Bible must one be able to grasp perfectly before he is walking in darkness? How much of it can he misunderstand and still walk in the light?

It is time to quit playing around with such puerile proponents of partisan positions. Where is the preacher who quotes this passage to debar saints and discourage fellowship among brethren, who will dare affirm that he is as wise as God and as good as God? If he dare not say that he is, by his own admission he is not in the fellowship. Like Haman, he is hanged on the fatal gallows which he constructed to destroy others. I consider the traditional orthodox interpretation placed upon 1 John 1:7 as one of the most dangerous ever palmed off on unsuspecting men and women. It is subversive of the Spirit and a scandal to the church of God. It dooms the body to disintegration and can only damn us all to destruction.

Let us recapture the valid meaning of this warped and wrested passage and use it to promote fellowship, not pervert it. God is light. God is love. If we walk in the light we walk in God. If we walk in love we abide in God. If we love our brothers we abide in the light. You cannot separate light and love. Neither can you separate those who love one another. We quit living together when we quit loving each other. The road to togetherness is the path of love. “And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also” (1 John 4:21). When we heed this command, and only then, can it be said, “As he is, so are we,” and it can be added— “in this world.”

Ecumenical Encounter

Mission Messenger (May 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

Alexander Campbell declared that the restoration movement was inaugurated as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” At the time of its inception the sectarian spirit was running high. Campbell and his contemporaries spoke to members of all religious parties whenever invitation was extended or opportunity afforded. It is doubtful that these men ever turned down an invitation to address any convention of earnest men. Frequently they encountered resentment upon the part of those who regarded the divergent sects as a fulfillment of the divine purpose on earth.

In our day the situation has changed. Many leaders in sectarian circles deplore division in the Christian realm. Extensive research is being prosecuted into the grounds for unity. The entire religious fabric is being colored by ecumenical thought. If Campbell were alive now he would undoubtedly rejoice at the altered attitude everywhere manifest. One wonders to what extent that attitude may reflect some of the ideas he dropped as seeds in the whole field of Protestantism.

What about the heirs of this noble experiment which made such signal gains against such frightful odds in the early part of the nineteenth century? Are they entering the ferment of dialogue to point seekers for unity to the restoration ideal? Strange as it may seem, they are conspicuous by their absence.

Other restoration groups of different national origins are participating directly in the current exchange. They are bringing to bear the thinking of their fathers and there is some evidence that they are making an impact in stemming the tide of liberalistic philosophy.

It is with a sense of regret, mingled with shame, that I confess that most of those within the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood hardly know what is transpiring in the world immediately about them. Even the occasional articles (always critical and negative) dealing with the current confrontation of our religious neighbors betray a sad deficiency of understanding upon the part of the writers. These must be governed wholly by hearsay. They have never attended one of the meetings which they denounce, they have never met the men whom they castigate. Most of our brethren have never exchanged correspondence with the leaders in other areas of the religious spectrum.

Ours is a most unrealistic situation. We claim to have the very cure for which others are searching. We boast that the restoration principle is the answer to the problems of strife and schism. But our factions are monasteries into which we have retreated and isolated ourselves from the mainstream of thought. We spend our time talking to ourselves about others. The balm of Gilead is applied only to those we consider to be whole and well. We do not go to those whom we regard as sick.

It is observable that even in schools professing to be Liberal Arts colleges, no one can appear upon the program who does not parrot the party line. Only “sound” men are invited to participate and a “sound man” is one who can be trusted to say what the promoters want to hear. Our brethren dare not listen to another angle. They cannot share thought with others. They can only unload their thinking upon others! They can only offer a monologue, never a dialogue. Lectureships devoted to a study of “restoration” are loaded in advance. There are no real forums or exchanges between divergent groups. Any such exchange has to be on the purely partisan and childish level of debate.

What would happen, for instance, if Abilene Christian College would rise above the narrow confines of orthodoxy and measure up to the stature of bold leadership demanded in our day, by inviting representative men from all segments of the restoration movement to share in a program where the varied viewpoints would be heard and discussed? Would not the school be hailed as a pioneer in a noble endeavor even by the thinkers outside the ranks of the restoration movement? Of what are our brethren afraid?

In 1866 David Lipscomb and Tolbert Fanning took the lead in urging conferences everywhere between the Baptists and the Disciples. Lipscomb wrote, "Will not our brethren then invite the Baptists, either as a body or as individual churches, to meet them, and prayerfully consult, to see if they cannot come together, and labor and worship as one people in Christ the Lord?" Both editors signed a statement which said, "The idea of a meeting for consultation, as suggested by Dr. Broaddus, is certainly in harmony with the spirit of the Christian religion and at all times must result in good to those who engage therein with the proper spirit. What say our brethren, Baptists and Disciples of Tennessee and the South? Will they speak out freely on the subject? Whether for or against the pages of the Advocate will be open to them."

Those brethren were made of real stuff! Most of their heirs are unworthy of such spiritual sires. Not only will their successors not meet for consultation with the Baptists but most of them will not even meet with their fellowheirs of the restoration movement to "prayerfully consult, to see if they cannot come together." Not only are the pages of their journals closed to real discussion encounter, but they will not even announce a meeting when the brethren come together. I charge that if David Lipscomb were alive today he would not be allowed to teach in the school that bears his name. He would be excluded from any “Church of Christ” in Nashville and denounced as a Ketcherside-ite. We have become sectarian, factional and frightened! We would not even let our “restoration fathers” in the door!

But an individual can rise above all of this. He can throw off the shackles! He can blot out the partisan brand with the blood of Jesus. As a free man in Christ Jesus I am ready to go anywhere, to meet with any group and to discuss with them the deepening insights into truth. I am also a seeker! What a thrilling thing it is to be just a Christian and a Christian only, without obligation to defend anything except the one body of which He is the head. What a source of power to recognize as your brethren all who “by one Spirit are baptized into that one body.”

If it be urged that the ecumenical machinery is so complex that only an organization can survive among it, or that its concerted sound is so great no voice can be heard above it—disregard such notes of failure. Go as Paul went in his penetration of the Greek world with its maze of philosophy! Go in the faith of Him who opened up the Red Sea when destruction appeared imminent. Go in the power of the indwelling Spirit who has never lost an encounter.

I feel driven by deep inner compulsion to share the little I have gleaned with all who love Jesus, in spite of the unfortunate circumstances which have conspired to separate us from each other. I have resolved to belong to no one but Him who bought me. I have pledged allegiance to a person and not a party! I solicit the prayers of all those in “the fellowship of the concerned” that I may conduct my life with reverence and godly fear. I do not subscribe to the defeatist philosophy that we can best help the world which Jesus left heaven to visit by remaining in our own little heavens and refusing to visit and share with them. Fortunate am I indeed that I am controlled by no vested interest and have nothing to lose but my soul!

Receive Him Not

Mission Messenger (June 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed: For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds (2 John 10, 11).

This is one of the “twisted scriptures.” It has become the handle for every factional tool used to pry apart the living stones in the temple of God. It is the murderous knife employed to dismember the body of the Lord. It was written by the apostle of love to protect the flock of God from prowling wolves who sought to seduce them through denial of the foundational fact that Jesus has come in the flesh. It is now used to convert the sheep into snarling dogs, snapping at each other over every stray scrap of doctrine. It has substituted the law of the pack for the love of the flock.

No other passage so well illustrates the danger inherent in ignoring the context. That the leaders of thought in the “Church of Christ” should have been betrayed into adopting an interpretation which makes unity impossible and renders ridiculous their vaunted claim to respect for the authority of the word of God, is one of the amazing developments in the restoration movement of which we are heirs. Any use of the written word which makes impossible the fulfillment of the prayer and purpose of the Living Word is abuse and misuse. We can never regain our integrity as scholars until we repudiate the current partisan explanation which makes every vagary of thought and dissent an occasion to destroy fraternal relationship and stab love dead at our feet.

What is “the doctrine” which is so transcendent that one who does not attest to it, must not be allowed to enter the house, nor be given a greeting on the street or in the marketplace? Or, looking at it from the opposite position, what is it that, when advocated is so heinous and so poison to the fellowship, that to merely salute its proponent is to make one a participant in his vicious works? The use of individual cups in the Lord’s Supper, says one. Bible classes on the Lord’s Day, says another. Chartered homes to care for orphans, says still another. Advocacy of the pre-millennial coming of the Lord, or of instrumental music, or of missionary societies— all of these are added to the motley list by partisan voices raised to high pitch in the clamor for debate.

The depth of one’s love for the family of God can be determined by the relative value of those things for which he is willing to sacrifice or break it up. The triviality of those views elevated to a higher station than the family ties created by the blood of the cross is indicative of the shallowness and superficiality of thought eating like a pernicious cancer at the heart of a great restoration movement in our day. Who can really believe that the apostle who wrote more about brotherly love than any other man, would recommend that we refuse entrance to our homes to those saints who disagree with us about cups, classes, colleges, or collectives for the care of orphans? What sane reasoner can actually conclude that to greet a brother who differs with us about the millennium or instrumental music is to become a participant in some “evil deed”? The very absurdity of such a conclusion renders obnoxious the common usage made of the passage by “Church of Christ” expositors.

I do not hesitate to say that so long as these men maintain such an unrealistic attitude toward the sacred scriptures they can never make any impact upon the thinking world. They will only be purveyors of prejudice, agents of animosity, and disseminators of distrust. Such explanations are exercises in eisegetics, not exegetics. They inject a meaning into the holy oracles rather than extracting one from them. And while there was a time when dogmatism held men and women in line because the masses could neither read nor write, that day is over. We face another “Great Awakening” in the religious realm. Enlightened people are growing less satisfied with the dry husks thrown out to them by factional debaters.

To what did John refer by “this doctrine”? Who were the wandering teachers who were to be refused entrance when they applied for hospitality? What condition existed at the time which made it imperative that the “elect lady and her children” refrain from giving a greeting to certain teachers? Who were those who “went beyond” and did not remain in the doctrine of Christ? Surely what they denied must be related to the very fundamental and essential facts upon which Christianity was predicated to require such drastic measures to preserve it inviolate.

General Observations

Every reputable scholar known to us believes that John was writing to counter-act the pernicious effects of Gnosticism. Upon no other ground can we account for the approach of his gospel record and first two epistles. Who were the Gnostics? What did they teach? Why were they so dangerous to the Christian concept? How did John become involved in the controversy? It is not our purpose here to analyze this synthetic philosophy, interesting though it might be. We shall be content with supplying our readers with sufficient background material to enable them to see the purpose and intent of John and to recognize how modern “interpreters” among us have warped and wrested what the apostle wrote. For your own convenience and to aid the reviewers of what we write, we will number the various observations.

1. The word “gnostic” is from gnosis, knowledge. The Gnostics were “the knowing ones.” It was believed by the Gnostics that all matter is inherently evil and only spirit is good. Since the spirit was imprisoned in the body, and the body is composed of matter, the chief aim was to free or liberate the spirit. Taking their cue from the Greek mystery religions they taught that only by probing the depths and ascending the heights of knowledge, could that which was real be delivered from the material. This required an elaborate secret ritual coupled with painful, arduous and disciplined investigation and research into the mystical infinite wisdom of God. All men were not equipped to do this, either from lack of time, inclination or ability, and the majority of these would continue on a mere animal plane. The Gnostics were in a class by themselves in that they could “go beyond.”

2. This idea of a spiritual aristocracy made up of specially endowed thinkers who were on “the inside” would wreak havoc upon the idea of fellowship. For this reason John emphasizes over and over that all of the saints have access to, and possess, knowledge. The word “know” appears in its various forms eleven times in chapter two. “Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things” (2:20). “I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth but because ye know it” (2:21). The one who doesn’t know where he is going is the one who hates his brother (2:11). In chapter three “know” is found 8 times, in chapter four 7 times, and in chapter five 7 times. In every instance the disciples are comforted with the thought that knowledge is not the special privilege of the few. Note the recurrence of “we know” and “ye know.”

3. The Gnostics held that matter was evil. On this basis they speculated that God could not have created the earth because it is material. By the same token the idea of the incarnation was unthinkable. One group held that Jesus was simply an ethereal person, a mere phantom. They insisted that he never had a real flesh and blood body, that he was pure spirit. These were called Docetics, from dokeo, to appear. John attacked this speculation by affirming that the apostles had heard, seen, scrutinized and handled Jesus with their hands.

4. Cerinthus was the first Gnostic leader whose name has come down to us. He lived in Ephesus where John apparently wrote his epistles. According to Eusebius, the father of church historians, John knew Cerinthus for what he really was. Cerinthus made a distinction between Jesus and the Christ, or Logos. He taught that Jesus was human, the son of Joseph and Mary. But Jesus increased in wisdom and in favor with God, which he could not have done if he had been God, according to Cerinthus. (See Luke 2:52). When Jesus was thirty years of age, he had lived in such a state of purity that God adopted him, publicly announcing that Jesus was his Son in whom he was well pleased. Upon this occasion the Christ (anointing) descended upon him in the shape of a dove. Cerinthus reasoned that Jesus could not have been God prior to this as he did not have the Spirit of God until it descended upon him. The Christ came upon him at John's baptism.

He further contended that the Christ (Spirit) could not be killed or made to suffer pain. The human Jesus was nailed to the cross and endured agony but the Christ had withdrawn as he came, and was beyond the reach of men. It is for this reason John insists that, "This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ: not by water only, but by water and blood" (1 John 5:6). It was not just Jesus who came to be baptized but Jesus Christ; it was not just Jesus who was crucified but Jesus Christ. He did not come by water (baptism) only, but by water and blood (crucifixion).

5. The crux of the whole matter as it affected Christian faith lay simply in the fact that a Gnostic could not believe in the incarnation. It was impossible for such a person to admit that the preexistent Logos was made flesh. This provided a real test. If one, upon being asked, “Do you believe that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh?” answered in the affirmative, you could be sure he was motivated by the Spirit of God. If he denied or hedged, as the record says, “Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist” (1 John 4:1-3).

Specific Observations

Having given this meager outline of Gnostic philosophy we turn to consideration of the group of Gnostics against whom John sought to protect the saints. Let us list some of the things about them which we can learn from his writings.

1. We know that these men pretended to have access to a source of knowledge which made them superior in wisdom to the average member of the body. It was their aim to make the Way intellectually acceptable to the philosophic schools by expressing their concepts of Christ in the language of Oriental mysticism. They belonged to an arrogant cult of philosophic aristocrats who claimed to have the ability to go beyond and penetrate the veil of true learning. The idea that Jesus had come in the flesh was spiritual pap for infantile mentalities but could not be countenanced by the advanced reasoner. John declared that the true gnosis was the apostolic testimony and the test of knowledge of God was willingness to receive that testimony. “We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us: he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error” (1 John 4:6).

2. We know the Gnostics were respected and received by many and that they were numerous. They were regarded as possessing visionary insight and revelatory power because they were accepted as prophets. For this reason the apostle cautioned the saints to test the spirits “because many false prophets have gone out into the world” (1 John 4:1). John labels them antichrists and says, “Even now there are many antichrists.”

3. We know these men were traveling from place to place as did many of the philosophers and teachers in the Greek world and they no doubt depended upon the homes they contacted in each community to extend them hospitality. Any such home would then be used as a base for their efforts. It is significant that John says, “Many false prophets are gone out into the world.” The false prophets were doing what Jesus commissioned the apostles to do.

4. We know that the Gnostics were separatists and schismatics and that they abandoned the body of saints to create a sect of their own. The unity of the body is based upon acknowledgment of the great fact that Jesus is the Christ. When men no longer are willing to accept this foundation upon which the community of heaven was planted they become antichrists. “They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us” (1 John 2:19). It is interesting that, in this context, John shows the one creed which can bind us together, repudiation of which will fragment us. “Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son” (2:22). So long as one accepts fully the fact that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, he remains upon the foundation upon which Jesus said he would construct his community. When he forsakes that foundation he forsakes all that is Christian.

5. We know that even though the Gnostics withdrew they still sought to influence those who allowed that which they had heard from the beginning to remain in them, and who continued in the Son and in the Father (2:24). These false apostles were proselytizers. Under the guise of teaching advanced truth they wormed themselves into any home which would receive them, and led those who dwelt there to deny that Jesus was the Christ.

It was to warn against such teachers that John wrote, “These things have I written you concerning them that seduce you” (2:26).

The reply of those who were solicited by these “advanced thinkers” was to be simply that they did not need any man to teach them, but having been anointed by the Holy Spirit they had access to all truth, and that truth was always consistent. The additional truth must be measured by what they had formerly been taught by the apostles. “But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him” (3:27). Those who were taught by the Spirit would abide in Christ, that is, in what they had been taught by the anointing. The Gnostics “went beyond and abode not in the doctrine of Christ” (2 John 9).

All history bears out the truth that during the lifetime of John, and in the very area where he resided and wrote, this synthetic philosophy was presented with ruthless disregard for the unity of the congregations. False prophets insinuated themselves into every company of the saints and promulgated their unhallowed speculations. It became necessary to issue blunt warnings to the saints against extending a welcome to such teachers, or allowing their homes to be used as bases from which to launch war on truth. This brings us to an analysis of the short epistle known as Second John. It contains the passage with which we are concerned in this article.

The Second Epistle

We shall not enter into the controversy as to identity of the addressee of this letter. It is my personal opinion that it was written to a Christian sister and her family. It is altogether possible that the congregation of saints met in her home. It will be observed how John speaks of truth and love in the same connection. He does not regard truth as being composed merely of facts which have been verified. Truth is a relationship which transcends human relationships. John loves the elect lady and her children in the truth (verse 1). All others who have known the truth exhibit the same love (1). The truth dwells in God's children and is age-lasting (2). The trinity of divine blessings—grace, mercy and peace—these are shared in truth and love (3). We walk in truth as required by God (4).

John approaches the primary purpose of his letter of admonition and warning with familiar language. Certain phrases are at once associated with certain writers. One of these phrases used by John is “a new commandment.” Every such phrase should be considered in the light of its other appearances. That which John wrote to the elect lady will be correctly understood only in conjunction with what he wrote elsewhere upon the same topic. We must never forget that the gospel record and first epistle of John are general. They were written to meet a condition faced by the community of saints at large. The second epistle is specific. It deals with the same condition on a local basis and provides a specific approach to it. But the specific must be understood in the light of the general. One is not qualified to diagnose and treat a specific cancer until he knows the nature of cancer in general.

1. John filled his gospel record and first two epistles with a dissertation on love (agape) but these were not written primarily to be treatises on love at all. They were produced to offset a dangerous philosophy which threatened dissolution of the community by destroying the foundation upon which it was built. Love is the antidote to such a condition because it cements and holds the hearts of the saints together in times of greatest stress. One who reads the writings of John about love will derive much pleasure from the observations of the apostle but he will never understand why John injected the teaching as he did until he remembers that love was a prescription for the body at a time when certain errors were becoming epidemic.

2. John besought the elect lady to remember that he wrote no new commandment. He simply reminded her of the commandment heard from the beginning. He identifies that commandment— that we love one another (5). Only if we recall constantly the nature of this commandment which was had from the beginning can we ever understand John properly. In 1 John 2:7, the brethren are told that John will write no new commandment unto them, but an old commandment which they had from the beginning. They are told that the old commandment is the word which they heard from the beginning.

The word is not the new covenant scriptures. They did not have this from the beginning. The new covenant scriptures grew out of needs created by later circumstances. Philemon was a letter of commendation for a runaway slave, Onesimus, who was returning to his master. Philippians was a letter of thanks for assistance to Paul when he was in prison. First Corinthians was written to deal with a demoralizing state of affairs disclosed by the visiting family of Chloe, and to answer queries in a letter brought by Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus. All of this came later. The word which was heard from the beginning was “Love one another.”

From the beginning Jesus said, “This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you” (John 15:12). Again, “These things I command you, that ye love one another” (15:17). John wrote to the elect lady, “This is love, that we walk after his commandments” (2 John 6). Those who regard the Way as being a legalistic system lay great stress upon this, but they fail to grasp the significance of the following sentence, “This is his commandment, that, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.” The previous verse tells us that what we heard from the beginning was to love one another. This is the commandment of Christ. What John is here saying is, “This is love, that we walk after his commandments, and his commandment is that we love one another and walk in that love.” But why does John use “commandments” (plural) and “commandment” (singular) in the same sense? The answer is found in Romans 13:9, where we are told that all the commandments are summed up in one word, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.” This lifts the commandments of Christ above the level of law to the plane of love. This is the word we had from the beginning.

3. The reason for the admonition to the lady and her children to continue to walk in love is that, “Many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist” (7). Here John pointedly identifies the kind of traveling false teachers against whom he warns the recipients of this epistle. This letter was written to counter the efforts of the Gnostics. “The many deceivers who have entered into the world” are “the many false prophets who are gone out into the world” (1 John 4:1). The deceivers of whom he now writes are the seducers of whom he has written. “These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you” (1 John 2:26). The things written identify the personages as antichrists (1 John 2:18).

The Fundamental Doctrine

4. The elect lady and her children are cautioned, “Look to yourselves, that you may not lose what you (or we) have worked for, but may win a full reward” (8). The purpose of the apostolic message was to build men in love on the Christhood of Jesus, so that the eternal life they possessed by having the Son might eventually terminate in fulness of joy in his presence. Those who face up to the fact of his divine Sonship in the flesh will be rewarded with fellowship face to face in the future. If we abide in him here we may abide in his presence over there. But if antichrists seduce us to forfeit our faith in the greatest fact in the universe we will lose all. So fundamental is this fact of faith that rejection of it is the fundamental falsehood of this age. “Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?” (1 John 2:22). There is one foundation of salvation and one foundation of damnation. Both are directly concerned with the same fact. “He that believeth . . . shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned.” (I trust that no carping critic will conclude that I have intentionally devaluated baptism in making this point).

5. “Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son.”

To whom does the apostle relate the expression, “Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ?” What is “the doctrine of Christ”? Let us notice some of the other translations.

“Anyone who goes ahead and does not abide in the doctrine of Christ does not have God” (Revised Standard Version).

“No one has God who goes too far and fails to stay by the teaching of Christ” (Charles B. Williams).

“Whoever goes beyond, and does not remain within Christ’s teaching, will not possess God” (Authentic Version).

“Anyone who runs ahead too far, and does not stand by the doctrine of the Christ, is without God” (New English Version).

“Anyone who is ‘advanced’ and will not remain by the doctrine of Christ, does not possess God” (James Moffatt).

“The man who is so ‘advanced’ that he is not content with what Christ taught, has in fact no God” (J. B. Phillips).

It will be noted that these substitute for “transgresseth”

(King James Version) such expressions as: goes ahead, goes too far, goes beyond, runs ahead too far, and advanced. Both Moffatt and Phillips indicate by usage of quotation marks that the term “advanced” is used in a special sense. Those who are under consideration are not really advanced thinkers; they just flatter themselves that they are. These later versions are more nearly correct than the King James Version. The word “transgress” is a translation of parabaino, and it is true this is found in a few manuscripts. But all of the best copies have proagon, to go ahead, to advance beyond.

This was the very claim of the Gnostics. They looked with disdain and contempt upon “the common herd” who thought of Jesus as being the Word (Logos) made flesh. In their intellectual arrogance they had advanced to the place where they could see that Jesus was not the Christ. Jesus was human. The Christ was spirit. These two were not the same. They did not deny that Jesus existed nor did they deny that the Christ existed. They did not even deny that for a period the two had been invested in the same person. But they did deny that Jesus was the Christ or that the Christ was Jesus. Jesus was not the word (Logos) and had no existence prior to the incarnation, as they viewed it. Therefore there was no incarnation. Jesus did not come in the flesh.

The apostolic declaration was that Jesus had come in the flesh. This was basic, elemental and fundamental. The spirit which confessed this was of God; the spirit that did not confess it was not of God, but was antichrist. This was the test proposed by which to “try the spirits whether they are of God” (1 John 4:1-3). This was the foundation. One who was on that foundation might be mistaken about many things and all of them were, but they dare not be mistaken about the foundation. It is noteworthy that one was built upon this foundation by a positive action—confession that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (1 John 4:2). The opposite is not denial, which is also a positive action, but simply “not confessing.” “Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus is come in the flesh is not of God.” This eliminates not only positive denial, but also neutrality. One cannot occupy a neutral position as to the identity of Christ and be built upon the foundation. The foundational fact must be confessed— as a fact! One cannot be either a gnostic or an agnostic.

6. We can determine what “the doctrine of Christ” is in this sense by the effect of “going beyond” or “abiding in it.” One who advances has not God; one who “abides in it” has both the Father and Son. The doctrine of Christ, in this case, does not consist of the things Jesus taught, but of the thing taught about Jesus. The ethical and moral values of Jesus are very important. Nothing we say here must be understood as minimizing their value. One must “keep the commandments of Jesus” (John 15:10), and if he loves Jesus, he will keep them, naturally, automatically and spontaneously, for this is the only possible reaction of love. Only one who does not love Jesus will not keep his sayings (John 14:24). Yet we must all, without exception, place some qualification upon living up to the requirements of Jesus. “As far as we are able,” “to the extent we understand them,” “as we learn what he wishes,”— these are all our own qualifications to explain how we can have God, and how He can have us, while we fail to live up to His perfect example. We often transgress, and often disobey. If we did not the Father would not need to administer chastisement. Yet we are told that all of us are partakers of such chastisement, and without this we would but demonstrate that we are bastards, and not sons.

But “the doctrine of Christ” about which John wrote cannot be qualified. It cannot be governed by mitigating circumstances. One who does not abide in it has not God. It is just that plain. It is just that positive. What is “the doctrine” one must have in order to have God? Whatever it is, it was possessed by all who have God while the apostles were still alive. It was possessed by “the lady and her children” and by “all others who are in the truth.” It could not have been a copy of the new covenant scriptures, for no person on earth possessed that, not even the apostle John. It could not have included the Second Epistle of John for those to whom it was written were already “walking in truth” before John wrote it. This epistle could not have been a part of “the doctrine of Christ” for there were those who had already gone beyond that doctrine when this epistle was written.

Fortunately John identifies the doctrine essential to having the Father and the Son. “Who is the liar but he who denies that Jesus is the Christ. . . . No one who denies the Son has the Father. He who confesses the Son has the Father also” (1 John 2:23). Jesus is the Christ! This is the foundation of the community of saints, the colony of heaven on earth. Jesus is the Christ! This is the only confession we may scripturally require of any penitent seeking admission to the fellowship of the redeemed. Jesus is the Christ! Every spirit which confesses this is of God. Jesus is the Christ! This is the only creed essential to overcoming the world. Jesus is the Christ! The one who believes this has the witness in himself.

But what of the “advanced thinker” who denies this great fact? How was the Gnostic teacher to be treated? How was one who did not abide in this doctrine to be regarded by those who did abide in it?

“Receive Him Not”

7. “If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed; for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds” (10, 11).

“Do not receive him into the house or give him any greeting, for he who greets him shares his wicked work” (Revised Standard Version).

“If any one who comes to you does not bring this teaching, do not receive him under your roof nor greet him; for he who greet him is a sharer of his evil deeds” (Weymouth).

“If anyone comes to you and does not bring this doctrine, do not admit him to the house— do not even greet him, for he who greets him shares in his wicked work” (Moffatt).

“If anyone comes to you who does not bring this doctrine, do not welcome him into your house or give him a greeting; for anyone who gives him a greeting is an accomplice in his wicked deeds” (New English Version).

“If anyone comes to you and does not bring this teaching, do not receive him into your homes, do not even bid him welcome; for he who bids him welcome shares in his evil deeds” (Authentic Version).

In the face of what has gone before, I would not presume upon the intelligence of my readers to further identify “the doctrine.” Only those who ignore background, setting, contemporary issues and context, could ever mistake it. The application to other matters could only be made by those with a party axe to grind— those who would fasten upon the phrase “receive him not,” to deny their relationship with the very brethren whom Jesus taught us to love. The warping and wrestling of this scripture by factional defenders should serve as a warning to us of what happens to those whose hearts are filled with the party spirit and who search the scriptures for a means to separate and segregate themselves from other brethren in the Lord.

Inconsistency of Orthodoxy

I have heard the expression “this doctrine” applied to every item of controversy among the various factions calling themselves “The Church of Christ.” Depending upon the particular party whose champion quoted it, the expression has been related to individual cups, Bible classes, colleges, orphan homes, the pastor system, fermented wine in the Lord's Supper, a method of breaking the bread, the pre-millennial viewpoint instrumental music, missionary societies, and a diversified host of motley issues which have made "the restoration robe of righteousness" a Joseph's coat that puts the rainbow spectrum to shame.

In every instance these partisan exponents have shown themselves to be utterly inconsistent. They have slashed themselves with one side of the knife which they have sharpened in eager anticipation of stabbing others. But their very inconsistency proves that each is better than his unwritten creed. These brethren dare not apply practically what they claim to believe. Take for example the preacher who quotes 2 John 10, 11 in condemnation of one who cannot see that instrumental music as an aid in corporate worship is a sin. Does not the one who deplores the use of the instrument receive the other into his house— either the public meetinghouse or his private dwelling?

The fact is that all of the non-instrumental groups I know, not only receive into their houses those who disagree with them, but go to great lengths to try to get them into their houses. When they hold a meeting they spend money on radio and television programs, as well as newspaper advertising, all beamed at the very ones whom they condemn as "bringing not this doctrine." They go from door to door, greeting and saluting all and sundry, and when they find someone who does not agree with their position they urge him to come. They meet him at the door, welcome him warmly, and give him a "chief seat in the synagogue." Of course, after the meeting is over at night and the "faithful ones" remain behind to congratulate themselves upon the success of the personal work and the fact that "the Christian Church preacher attended," if one asks if it would have been a sin to call upon the visitor to lead prayer, the evangelist will quote, "If any man come and bring not this doctrine receive him not into your house nor give him any greeting."

If 2 John 10, 11, applies to “a Christian Church preacher” as my factional brethren so childishly designate those who use instrumental music, I charge that to even allow him to enter the house (much less invite him to come), makes them “accomplices in his evil deeds.” It is such absurd, ridiculous and puerile reasoning which will keep thinking people from seeing the real force and beauty of a plea which began as “a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects.” The very essence of sectarianism is exclusiveness, and if anyone is more exclusive than those who twist this scripture to justify their sectarian prejudices I have yet to meet him. Our brethren should be ashamed to live and afraid to die!

Every party among us, even the most reactionary, will greet any person who attends their meetings— after they get over their surprise. Of course they would not call upon him to pray to the Father but they will run halfway across the house to provide him with a songbook already turned to the right page, so he can praise the Father. He cannot pray out loud by himself, but he can pray as loud as he wants with others, if the prayer is set to a tune. I am thankful that literally hundreds of our brethren are becoming embarrassed by the imbecility and senselessness of the preposterous position in which they find themselves. The party spirit has driven them so far down a blind alley that at last some are trying to scale the fence at the other end and get back on Main Street again. This is good and I intend to give them a hand when I can.

My Position

I propose to regard all of God’s children as my brothers. I intend to treat them as brothers. I have resolved to make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. I shall accuse no one of being an antichrist who is built upon the one foundation simply because he differs with me in understanding of such things as cups, classes, colleges, the millennium, or instrumental music. I shall not allow our divergent views upon these things to keep me from associating with any of my brothers, or helping all of them.

I shall go visit any group to share what I have learned, and to share in what they have learned. I shall go with none of them in partisan alliance, for my allegiance is to Jesus Christ. I am joined to Him and through Him to all others who are joined unto Him. Never again will I be a champion of any party, faction or clique. I refuse to be affiliated with any clan in which my love for these precludes my love for those. I belong to nobody and no body but the body of Christ!

Under no circumstances will I apply to those who believe that Jesus is the Christ, those passages written to condemn those who do not confess this fact. My brethren are not Gnostics. They have not gone out from us even though we differ about many issues which have disturbed our tranquillity. When brethren come where I am speaking, I shall not seek to determine how they stand on instrumental music, the millennium, or Herald of Truth, before I call upon them to pray. These are matters between them and our Lord. If they can explain their position to his satisfaction, they need not try to satisfy me with their explanation. I am not so much interested in where they stand as I am in the direction they are facing. I shall recognize their right to pray because they are in Him and not because they are in some party. I have no party and no party has me! This last is even more important than the other. I know a lot of brethren who claim to have no faction, but a faction has a claim upon them. They stand in jeopardy every hour!

Upon the one foundation living stones are builded together. These stones are not all the same size, shape, texture or variety. A stone house must be built with the stones available in the area. Since stones vary from one area to another, a house in one location may not look like that in another. The house of God is not made of stones that are uniform in knowledge, perception, ability or aptitude. It is composed of those who are joined together by mutual faith in Jesus and cemented by love. The foundation for all is the eternal abiding principle in confessional form, that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." "If any man come and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, and give him no greeting."

Conformity or Diversity

Mission Messenger (August 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

Some of our brethren who mistake conformity for unity appear to be startled when they first learn that we suggest there may be unity in diversity. Actually we go much farther than that. We assert that if there is any unity at all it must be unity in diversity, if it is to be enjoyed by free men. There is no other kind of unity. Our opponents themselves are proof of this for not one of them is a member of a congregation where every person understands every scripture alike. Each party agrees upon the factional test which it has singled out and made the supreme issue. Upon every other matter the greatest latitude is permitted.

For this reason every group which contends for the conformity of every member is inconsistent. Those who quote scriptures urging the saints to live in harmony under the delusion that unity and harmony are identical, misunderstand both human nature and the scriptures. There is a widespread notion that because the primitive saints were together and had all things common, and because they were “of one heart and one soul” this means they all had exactly the same opinions and views of every thing related to the Christian walk. Nothing could be more remote from the actual facts.

God made men so that as long as they are in the flesh they will be divergent in opinions. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. There is as much variety in our mental, as there is in our physical makeup. This is not an evil. It is good. It stimulates study and research. It is the soul of all discussion and investigation. Without it forbearance would be an unnecessary virtue and patience would become a lost art. Of even greater significance is the fact that if unity came by intellectual agreement rather than as a grace-gift from God, it could never produce a peace that passes understanding. No one will deny that our human understanding is frail, fallible and faulty. Peace that originated with it would always be imperfect. A stream cannot rise above its fountain or source.

Our unity is in a person, not in our personal opinions. We are one in Christ. Ours is the unity of the Spirit. Nothing is more clearly taught in the word of God. The Spirit of God dwells in every child of God. There is but one Spirit and every one in whom the Spirit dwells is one with every other such person. Of course every one in whom the Spirit dwells will exert a conscious effort continuously to promote harmony and good will. He will be a peacemaker because only such can be called the children of God. But he will also recognize that harmony is a fruit of unity and not the reverse.

God no more expects all of his children to be exactly alike than I do my children. Nor does he “tighten the screws” on them to enforce conformity any more than I would do so in my physical family. The truth is that his revelation teaches us we are different from each other, and it is because of this that we are able to fulfill His purpose and carry out His will upon the earth. Mere likeness in every detail would make this impossible. A man is able to be one flesh with his wife, not because they are alike, but because they are not. Oneness is not exact likeness. Harmony cannot be produced by harping on one string but by blending the sounds from various instruments.

Areas of Diversity

1. In the primitive community of saints there was a diversity of gifts (1 Cor. 12:4-6). “Now there are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit; and there are varieties of service, but the same Lord; and there are varieties of working, but it is the same God who inspires them all in every one.” The variety is in the saints, the sameness is in the Godhood. To eliminate the variety among the members would make the purpose of God of none effect. It is only when they recognize the source of their oneness that they can achieve a common purpose. “To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good” (verse 7). What was said of gifts bestowed supernaturally will also be true of gifts derived naturally.

2. There was a diversity of functions. “For as in one body we have many members, and all members do not have the same function, so we though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members one of another” (Rom. 12:4, 5). There is one question proposed by the Spirit which we need to face. “If all were a single organ, where would the body be?” (1 Cor. 12:19). The divine arrangement is expressed in the next verse. “As it is, there are many parts, yet one body.” Our very diversity in function makes it possible to have unity in an entity.

3. There was a diversity in understanding. Some had to be addressed as babes in Christ (1 Cor. 3:1). Their grasp of truth was elemental. “I fed you with milk, not solid food; for you were not ready for it; and even yet you are not ready.” Others were mature. “Yet among the mature we do impart wisdom” (1 Cor. 2:6). The impartation of wisdom was always on the basis of the ability to grasp what was taught. There was a difference from person to person and from congregation to congregation.

4. There was a diversity in knowledge. The apostle Paul pointed out that all knowledge was relative (1 Cor. 8:2). God’s revelation is perfect for the purpose for which given. Man’s knowledge of it is not perfect. In the community of saints at Corinth there were those who were fully aware that “an idol has no real existence” and “there is no God but one.” There were others who were not so positive. “However, not all possess this knowledge. But some, through being hitherto accustomed to idols, eat food as really offered to an idol; and their conscience, being weak is defiled.” Thus the saints were divided into “men of knowledge” (verse 10) and “weak men” (verse 11). Yet they were both men for whom Christ died and to sin against one of these brethren was to sin against Christ.

5. There was a diversity of customs. It was true that in Christ Jesus there was neither Jew nor Greek, but it was also true that there were Jews and Greeks in Christ Jesus. These statements are not contradictory. The gospel did not require a Jew to become a Greek, nor a Greek to become a Jew, in order to be in Christ Jesus. It was only in Christ they were one. This required adjustment to local conditions upon the part of one who traveled from one area to another visiting the saints (1 Cor. 9:19-23; 10:31-33).

Ragnar Bring writes, “They were all one in Christ. This unity was far more profound than a fellowship between those who hold similar views, or who think alike, or who are brought together because of social fellowship and equality. The unity in Christ Jesus was a unity which remained in spite of external inequalities, just as the unity of Christ with God remained and did not in any way become less when Christ emptied himself and became man, ‘born of woman, born under the law’” (Commentary on Galatians, page 187).

The nature of the unity in the early Christian communities was what made them so effectual. The world of that day was accustomed to the unity of exclusiveness which existed in fraternities and burial societies. Here people were brought together through mutual regard for each other and because of common secular interests. There was nothing strange about a synagogue composed of Freedmen, even in Jerusalem (Acts 6:9), but to find a congregation made up of men of different habits, customs, racial origins, etc., laboring as a unit because of a common love for Jesus— this was impressive indeed. The deepest unity can never be that of conformity. It must always be a unity that exists in diversity.

6. There was a diversity in opinions. The apologists for “the cult of the rubber-stamp” can never successfully negotiate the depths of Romans 14. Here is a chapter deliberately designed by divine direction to tell us how to maintain unity in actual diversity. It forbids contempt on the part of one group for another, and forbids censorship on the part of the other. It begins with a flat statement that we must welcome men who differ with us about matters of opinion, and not for the purpose of involving them in disputes or debates about the differences. “As for the man who is weak in faith, welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions.”

The very next verse shows that those whom God has welcomed need not see everything alike. There is room in Christ for men to believe different things and still be one. One believes he may eat anything, while the weak man eats only vegetables. What reply is made to this by defenders of orthodoxy? One Colorado brother who is the champion of a legalistic code of conformity as God’s ideal for his family, declared in print that there was no room for varied beliefs among those in Christ. He asserted that the only believer was the man who could eat anything, while the weak man acted through lack of faith. His predicament only becomes greater for he has God welcoming men who act through lack of faith, or without faith. The record says, “He also who eats, eats in honor of the Lord, since he gives thanks to God; while he who abstains, abstains in honor of the Lord and gives thanks to God” (verse 6). Will our brother have people honoring God in and through their lack of faith?

Note that expression “in honor of the Lord.” This is the key to many of our problems. When men cease to regard the Lordship of Jesus over their lives, what they do is not acceptable. But those who act “in honor of the Lord” may differ greatly and may be exactly opposite in their views about many things and still be accepted. No legalist can ever grasp this! He will argue that “One of them has to be wrong.” Granted! Perhaps they both are wrong. Then how can they be accepted? The answer is that the basis of our acceptance is not that we are right about everything. This would require no grace to save us. Why is this not the basis of acceptance? For the simple reason that the kingdom of God does not mean being right about such things. It is in a wholly different sphere and upon a different plane. Being correct or mistaken about such things as observing days and eating meats does not affect our standing in it. There can be “diversity of opinions” about all those things in which the kingdom does not consist without affecting the constituency of the kingdom. “For the kingdom of God does not mean food and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit” (verse 17).

When I think of the implications of this revelation from God, I am startled to realize how we destroy the work of God over matters wholly irrelevant to the kingdom of God. What we are doing, of course, is trying to make the kingdom after our own image. By seeking to become lords over the faith of others we end up being our own God. Each conformist uses himself as a criterion. Men must know as much as he knows, see things as he sees them, interpret passages as he explains them, hold the opinions that he holds. Divergency is a sin, not because of disagreement with the party, for the party is but a projection of the partisan. It is a “sin” because it does not recognize his infallibility. To question him is to question God.

When another “infallible leader” arises in the party there must be a division. The party is the world— the religious universe— of the factionalist, and there cannot be two infallible interpreters in the same world while they differ with each other. In case of difference each must have his own world. Every factional leader thinks of his party as the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of God on earth. This is the position of the Roman pope as respects his party. It is also the position of all the lesser papas in all of the orthodox parties of our day. Yet there comes to us in all of the controversies over means, methods, and measures, the solemn warning, “Do not for the sake of food, destroy the work of God” (Romans 14:20). Does this principle apply to that which sustains a factional body as well as that which feeds the physical body?

One Voice

We want to refer to one matter in connection with this which is so apparent that only those who are blinded by prejudice can fail to see it. Let us remember that when Paul wrote to the Romans the questions relating to eating of meats and observance of days were of tremendous importance and significance. They seem inconsequential to us now because they are not our problems. They have been displaced by other issues which may some day seem as trivial to others as questions about eating of meats seem to us now. But brethren were destroying each other over these matters when Paul wrote. The church was being shattered. These matters were made tests of fellowship and communion. If one had told the first century saints that the time would ever come when these would no longer trouble the body they would not have believed it. It will help us to remember the conclusion of the apostle.

The entire chapter (Romans 14) is given over to showing that men should respect and treat each other as brethren in spite of differing personal convictions upon these issues. The word “brother” occurs over and over and the expression “your brother” is of special importance. The theme is that brotherhood is a relationship created when God receives us (verse 3) and we need not agree with each other upon everything either to become brothers or to continue as such. After showing that we may maintain our divergent views and emphases, and be answerable unto God for them, the apostle concludes, “May the God of steadfastness and encouragement grant you to live in such harmony with one another, in accord with Christ Jesus, that together you may with one voice glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ” (15:5, 6).

Harmony with one another, and accord with Christ Jesus, are not contingent upon seeing everything alike. We do not have to settle all of our differences to be in harmony with one another. Harmony does not consist of seeing everything alike on the understanding level, but of welcoming one another on the faith level. This is a higher level upon which peace that passes understanding is created by the death of Jesus. He did not die to create a union of philosophers, but a family of brothers. To predicate unity upon understanding is to sublimate faith to human knowledge, that is, to destroy the greater with the lesser. This makes the cross of Christ of none effect. Those in Christ do not have to settle all of their differences. All they need to do is to settle their differences in Christ, that is, to make the relationship he created by his blood greater than anything about which they differ.

Notice again the expression “one voice.” It would be foolish for the apostle to devote a whole chapter to proving that men did not have to hold the same views or express the same ideas about a great many troublesome things, and then end up by saying they must all speak the same thing about every point of controversy in order to please God. We conclude that a community of saints can “with one voice glorify God” even while holding various opinions. The King James Version reads, “That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God.” To be of the same mind and to speak the same thing— as Paul uses the terms — cannot possibly mean to think alike or talk alike about every issue arising to trouble the saints, else the apostle made a serious mistake in writing the chapter of which this statement is the actual conclusion.

The harmony of mind is on the faith level, and so is the harmony of speech or testimony. It is “the faith of the gospel” which produces our oneness of thought and speech, not faith in our understanding or interpretation of doctrine or dogma. Men may strive together in the clouds who would strive against each other in the valleys. The battle of faith must be fought on higher ground than that of opinion, speculation, or mere human acquisition of knowledge. The tragedy of our age is that we have been so busy hacking each other to pieces on the lower slopes that we can never gather enough united strength to storm the ramparts. “Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ, so that whether I come and see you or am absent, I may hear that you stand firm in one spirit, with one mind striving side by side for the faith of the gospel.” I have resolved to fight by the side of any child of God who battles for that faith. I shall not stop to kill my brother before I attack the enemy.

Basis of Conformity

Since every faction in the Christian spectrum exists on the basis of a special emphasis, either upon a particular scripture or a specific idea, what is the basis for the cult of conformity and order of orthodoxy within the restoration movement of which we are heirs? I think it can be said without fear of denial that the basis of operation centers around 1 Corinthians 1:10. It is a twisting, warping and wresting of this scripture which leads them astray. It is astonishing that a passage written to offset division should be given an interpretation which can only produce and promote division, and which will open and aggravate numerous festering wounds without ever closing a single one.

Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.

What does this mean? To what did the Holy Spirit allude by the expression “all speak the same thing”? What is it to be perfectly joined together? To be “in the same mind and in the same judgment”? The quest for truth demands objective research into this language. We dare not evade it regardless of where it leads us. We can begin by observing that when Paul admonished the Corinthians to “speak the same thing” he was not plotting sermon outlines nor planning Sunday school lessons.

The expression occurs within a setting and must be understood in the light of its context if properly interpreted. The family of Chloe had informed the apostle that the church of God at Corinth was divided into four segments— a Pauline party, a Cephasite clan, an Apollosite auxiliary and a Christite cult. Each person was affirming aloud his affiliation to one or the other of these factions. The apostle wrote, “Every one of you says,” and proceeded to show that they were saying they were not of the same party, or for the same leader. His exhortation to speak the same thing simply meant to desist from these factional identifications. It was given to cure a condition and must be understood in the sense of its application to that condition. The statement has no reference to conformity of opinion or interpretation. One did not have to speak the same thing about eating of meats, or keeping of days, for instance. There was room for differences in such a sphere.

William Barclay catches the proper spirit by translating the expression, “You should make up your differences.” He says, “The phrase he (Paul) uses is the regular phrase which is used of two hostile states or parties reaching agreement.” Weymouth has it, “to avoid disputes.” James Moffatt translates it, “I beg of you all to drop these party cries.” The New English Version renders it, “agree among yourselves.” Hugh J. Schonfield, in The Authentic New Testament, puts it, “all hold together.”

The apostle is not regulating expressions or voicing of ideas among those who are walking together in love. His injunction is designed to heal a breach or bridge an existing gap. "To speak the same thing" stands opposed to controversy or contention. "It is reported that there are contentions among you . . . I beseech you to speak the same thing." Those who quote the passage to apply to enforced conformity and stereotyped expression are always inconsistent. They must leave broad areas where their partisans can say different things and remain in the factional fold. It is only upon the humanly formulated test of loyalty, the party shibboleth, that all must pass muster and walk the verbal chalk line.

In that segment of the restoration movement which does not use instrumental music in corporate worship, there are some twenty-five separate and distinct factions. Every one of these parties allows the greatest latitude in opinion (and frequently in ethical and moral behavior), except in the test of partisan identity. For example, there is a rather large group dedicated to crusading against what is called "centralized control," especially as evidenced in "Herald of Truth," a propaganda device using radio and television media. It is demanded that, if one is to be regarded as "sound in the faith," he must "speak the same thing" on the issue around which the party rallies as its standard.

However, many of the brethren in this party of the opposition differ on a great many things. They do not agree upon divorce and re-marriage, Christians bearing arms in war, the qualifications of elders, and many other things. All of these are considered as grounds for discussion while support of certain institutions is regarded as a basis for division. Who makes the decisions as to which things are vital and which ones are not? Who draws up the list of things that are immune and exempt, and formulates the limitations and restrictions? Who surveys the extent of the yard to be enclosed by the fence inside of which the children may argue and fight while composing "the brotherhood"?

Perhaps the most glaring demonstration of inconsistency is found among those who regard themselves as “the mainstream” of the non-instrument wing. Here are found men in Liberal Arts Colleges maintained by members of the segment, who exercise some personal independence and license. It is generally known upon every campus that certain teachers do not share the views of others. Conflicting and contradictory explanations may be given of certain passages from one classroom to another. Yet, as a body, these have reached an official interpretation of Revelation 20, and one who holds the pre-millennial view is excluded and often not regarded as in “the Lord’s church.” It has been decided by “the powers that be” that the authorized and infallible interpretation of Revelation 20 shall be deemed, and is hereby decreed to be, opposed to the pre-millennial coming of the Lord, and this dogma shall be a test of fellowship, and of union and communion among the saints. Greater legalism hath no man than this!

The flagrant inconsistency of college professors in the “main line orthodox” branch of the non-instrument segment is seen in the fact that they laud as “giants” of the restoration movement, men who were avowedly pre-millennial in their interpretations. The books written by these worthies of another generation are required reading, yet if the men who wrote the volumes were alive today they would not even be allowed to lecture to a class composed of those who must pass an examination on what they wrote. Since their day certain views have become part of the dogma. Fortunately, hundreds of alert young men and women in college are seeing through the incompatible and incongruous attitudes imposed by factionalism. A revolution has begun. Although it is still forced to be an underground movement to a great extent, it is the most hopeful sign of returning sanity in more than a century of bitter and unmitigated strife.

Thinking men and women can never be satisfied that all must understand Revelation 20 alike, while they may differ on every other chapter in the Bible. Who determines the “musts” and the “mays”? It is only those who wrest such expressions as “all speak the same thing” into tools of conformity who must muzzle men’s minds in one area of revelation, while allowing them to run at will in other sectors. Of course, this all stems from a legalistic attitude which results from fear, not from faith. Men know they will not see every point of interpretation alike. They never have. The libraries of thousands of volumes on religious themes prove it. If it were not so, no theological school would require more than one set of commentaries. It is interesting to see the variety of commentaries offered for sale by bookstores operated in conjunction with journals whose editors unrealistically declaim that “we must all speak the same thing.” There seems to be a lot of money made from the fact that we do not!

Fruit of Inconsistency

The factional tendency which asserts itself when men realize that they do not always infer the same thing from what they read, is to fasten upon a particular item of belief, and elevate it out of proportion to other items, and even exalt it above the cross of Christ. On this matter they take a positive and definite stand, and judge every person by whether he “speaks the same thing” on this issue. The tragedy of such procedure is found in the fact that it is destructive of integrity, both in the intellectual and behavioral realm. When one becomes convinced that his relationship with Jesus is established and sustained, and that his loyalty is determined, by his position on some item of controversy, every other consideration is relegated to secondary status.

The folly of attempting to secure unity by conformity in opinion, interpretation, or mutual understanding can be seen by observing “The Church of Christ” today. Here we have two dozen factions all clamoring that we must speak the same thing, and all speaking something diverse from the others. It is not that these brethren are ignorant or illiterate, or stubborn or unprincipled. They are good men who have been misled as to the meaning of the scriptures which they regard as authoritative. How much better it would be for them to give an exhibition of what they mean by “speaking the same thing and having no divisions.” Virtually the only time they speak the same thing is when they quote this passage at each other.

A great many students are perplexed by the statement “that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.” Surely if conformity is taught anywhere it is taught in this verse. Again, the problem is one of context. The expression “Be perfectly joined together” is katarizo, which carries with it the idea of restoring to original state or condition. It was used as a medical term for reducing a fracture, or setting bones in a joint or socket. We still talk about bones “knitting together.” A good example is found in Galatians 6:1, “Brethren, if a man is overtaken in any trespass, you who are spiritual should restore him in a spirit of gentleness.”

It is employed in Matthew 4:21 and Mark 1:19 for mending nets. In these cases it is apparent that the idea is to correct a situation so that proper functioning can resume. This is the reason for setting a broken bone, for restoring a member discovered in a trespass, and for repairing a net. The appropriateness of this term will be seen when we remember that the word for “divisions” in 1 Corinthians 1:10 is schisma. This denotes “a tear or rent, as in a garment.” It is used in Matthew 9:16 for the rent which occurs when unshrunk cloth is used to patch a hole in an old garment. The corresponding verb schizo, occurs in the word schizophrenia, a type of psychosis resulting in a split personality.

With this background we can grasp the significance of what Paul is saying to the Corinthians. The fabric of brotherhood had disintegrated through cleavage and the formation of parties. It was impossible to discern the one body even when they met together in one place, because they maintained their exclusive partisan associations (Cp. 1 Cor. 11:18, 29). It was necessary to repair their grievous state so that the body could properly function again in the midst of a pagan society. Allow me to paraphrase the passage so you may understand what the apostle is saying to correct the situation.

“I implore you now, my brothers, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you stop your party cries so that the fabric of brotherhood will not be further rent and torn, and that you mend those rents which already exist by cultivating the same mind and the same judgment.”

The Repair Tools

We recognize that it is difficult for those who have been reared and trained in a legalistic attitude to surrender sermon texts and outlines which have grown hoary with repetition. They will fight to hold on to such heirlooms in spite of their lack of value, simply because they have been in the family so long. Accordingly, when full explanation is made in an open forum of the meaning of the apostle, someone who must make “a last ditch stand” always arises to demand what is inferred by the expression “the same mind and the same judgment.” Brethren who have long postulated unity based upon conformity and scoffed at “unity in diversity” find it a difficult thing to swallow their partisan pride and say, “I’ve been wrong about this scripture all of my life.”

I know from experience what happens to an honest man who has been defending an outpost under the mistaken concept that it is the whole territory, when he comes face to face with his captain who demands that he haul down the partisan banner from above his walled fortress which he has so proudly defended. I also know the trauma which occurs when one must surrender his stock of ammunition, the scriptural passages with which he has been bombarding various camps of the saints on the other side of the hill. I suspect there is ever the temptation to want to retain your side arms and continue to do a little partisan “bushwhacking” in your leisure time. So it never surprises me when a preacher in my audience digs in his heels, wraps the factional rope around his hands and hangs on for dear life while it slowly slips from his clutch and he looks wildly around for reinforcements, hoping the cavalry will come dashing down the slope at the last minute to save the party flag.

However, in this case, my own integrity will not allow me to compromise my conviction. I must insist that the apostle is not advocating conformity across the whole Christian spectrum as essential to oneness. Instead, he is dealing with a specific situation. The community of saints had disintegrated into four warring tribes, making the community of saints militant against itself. The apostle commands a repair job. He begins with an emergency measure calculated to halt the growing cleavage. “Stop these party cries!” (all speak the same). He then proceeds to the method of repairing the damage already done. “Mend the rents in the fabric” (Be perfectly joined together).

A repair job requires tools. These instruments must be adapted to the task to be performed if the end is to be accomplished. The tool which Paul hands to the Corinthians for their work of restoration is labeled, “the same mind and the same judgment.” No other device could fit a situation such as there existed. They must have the same mind as to what they were to try to do. They must have the same judgment as to how to accomplish it. The first refers to purpose, the second to method.

To assume that what was absolutely essential in correcting a critical emergency is normative for daily living and survival is indicative of shallow thinking. It is like insisting that one should throw away food and live on penicillin shots because this was prescribed when one had pneumonia. If all members of a household are aroused at 3:00 o'clock a.m. to rush one to a hospital with a ruptured appendix, we do not conclude they must all arise at that time each morning to demonstrate that they are still members of the same family. Nor do we assume that because they functioned in such perfect unison under special stress they may not disagree with each other about many things and still love each other dearly.

There is room in Christ for differences. There is no room for division. It was division which Paul sought to eliminate in Corinth, but he only sought to palliate differences in Rome (Romans 14). You eliminate disease by curing it, you palliate a condition by easing it without curing it. The treatment for division is rejection of the condition. The treatment for differences is forbearance of your brethren. To differ with brethren is not a sin, to divide the family is a sin. We oppose division because we hate sin, we seek to reduce tensions and lessen areas of difference because we love brethren. We must regard division with intoleration while we treat differences in a spirit of toleration. Toleration is not endorsing something which you think to be wrong, it is simply enduring one who thinks it is right. It is a relationship sustained to honest brethren and not to their ideas or thoughts. A brotherhood is composed of thinkers not abstract thinking.

So long as division exists in the community of saints we share in its shame even while laboring to overcome it. If we condone or defend it we also share in its scandal. No one in the family of God can be wholly free of disgrace as long as the strife in the family is exposed to the open gaze of an unbelieving world. Not one individual can justifiably adopt an attitude of indifference or unconcern when the Lord has laid upon all the burden of being peacemakers. This requires much more than being a passive peace lover. It demands an actively pursued campaign to restore peace—to make peace. It is not enough to boast that you have never caused division. You may not have caused anything else, either! If division exists in the community where you are, regardless of who created the situation, you are obligated by the authority of God's word to do something to repair the breach.

This involves much more than a halfhearted invitation to another partisan preacher in the community to "Drop over sometime and we'll talk about our problems over a cup of coffee." It includes being able to drink the cup that He drank, and being baptized with the baptism He experienced. Peace must be waged. It must be relentlessly pursued. "Seek peace and ensue it." There must be a strategy of peace in which temporary defeats are never confused with a lost cause and skirmishes are not confounded with the war. Division must be seen in its true nature— as a damnable, destructive, defiant sin against God and the Majesty of His Fatherhood. The campaign for peace among our divergent elements is not a game of tiddley-winks. It is an endurance contest which is not a struggle for men with weak hearts and sickly stomachs. Peacemakers must be "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might."

The Baptism of John

Mission Messenger (August 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

The city of Ephesus provided the site for many interesting experiences in the life of Paul. Some of these are related in Acts, chapter 19. One of them had to do with immersing about a dozen men. When the apostle first encountered these, he asked them, “Have ye received the Holy Spirit since ye believed”? They replied, “We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Spirit.” He asked them, “Unto what then were ye baptized?” They said, “Unto John’s baptism.” Paul informed them, “John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus.” When they heard this they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.

Why were these men immersed again? Does this passage furnish scriptural authority for baptizing a second time all whose knowledge of the ordinance and the blessings accruing therefrom, was imperfect at the first? Because of what we believe to be a palpable error contributing to the promotion and perpetuation of the sectarian spirit we propose a thorough examination of the nature of John’s baptism and its relationship to this event. We are convinced that this passage is wrested from its context and is bent and forced to fit a situation to which it has no reference. We are also persuaded that many of our brethren negate and nullify the work of John and make his labors and death appear a little ridiculous and of no consequence.

We hold that John's work was divinely directed and that it was effective. To better share our views we shall make a few preliminary remarks and then ask a series of questions which we will allow the word of revelation to answer. When a house is to be built, or a nation to be born in one day (Isaiah 66:8), the material to be incorporated into that house or kingdom must be prepared in advance. The house of God is composed of living stones (people) and the work of John was to go before, or in advance of Jesus (Mark 1:2) and "make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Luke 1:17). It is our conviction that he did this and when the king was inaugurated, those who were previously prepared and acknowledged were given the privilege of becoming citizens in that kingdom which they had heard proclaimed in "the gospel of the kingdom" (Matthew 4:23). Let us bring this out in answer to certain definite questions.

1. Under whose authority was John commissioned?

"There was a man sent from God, whose name was John" (John 1:6).

2. How was he empowered to fulfill his mission?

"He shall be great in the sight of the Lord . . . and he shall be filled with the Holy Spirit, even from his mother's womb" (Luke 1:15).

3. What was his specific mission?

"To make ready a people prepared for the Lord" (Luke 1:17).

4. How was he to prepare them?

"To give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins" (Luke 1:77).

5. Did he accomplish this by preaching?

“The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and every man presseth into it” (Luke 16:16). “In those days came John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness of Judea” (Matthew 3:1). “And many other things in his exhortation preached he unto the people” (Luke 3:18).

6. Did he announce Jesus as the Son of God?

“John bare witness of him, and cried, saying, This was he of whom I spoke” (John 1:15). “And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God” (John 1:34).

7. Did John require faith in Christ Jesus?

“John verily baptized . . . saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus” (Acts 19:4).

8. Did he command repentance?

“And saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand” (Matthew 3:2).

9. Did this entail reformation of life?

“Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance” (Matthew 3:8). “And the people asked him, saying, What shall we do then? He answereth and saith unto them, He that hath two coats let him impart to him that hath none: and he that hath meat let him do likewise. Then came also the publicans to be baptized, and said unto him, Master, what shall we do? And he said unto them, Exact no more than that which is appointed you. And the soldiers likewise demanded him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely: and be content with your wages” (Luke 3:10-14).

10. Was repentance followed by confession?

“Confessing their sins” (Matthew 3:6).

11. Did John baptize the believing penitents?

“I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance” (Matthew 3:11).

12. Was this baptism for the remission of sins?

“John did baptize in the wilderness and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins” (Mark 1:4).

Careless students have sometimes made a play on the term “baptism of repentance” in an endeavor to show that it could not have produced salvation and prepared those who were baptized for citizenship in the approaching kingdom. This is done to enforce the contention that only “baptism into Christ” can establish covenantal relationship. But it must not be forgotten that all of those whom John immersed were already in covenant relationship with God under the legalistic system then in vogue. John baptized no one but Jews, but he baptized them in preparation for a new order where relationship to Abraham would not be the controlling factor. He said, “And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham unto our father” (Matthew 3:9).

No amount of cavilling will set aside the facts. John was to give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins (Luke 1:77). God sent him to “baptize with water” (John 1:33). His baptism was distinctly said to be “for the remission of sins” (Mark 1:4).

13. Did all of those whom John made ready for the Lord receive him when he came?

“He came unto his own and his own received him not” (John 1:11). “His own” were not Jews as contrasted with Gentiles, but “his own” as contrasted with the rest of the world.

The world of mankind did not recognize him; many of his own did not receive him. “He was in the world, and the world was made by him and the world knew him not. He came unto his own, and his own received him not.” John preceded Jesus for the specific purpose of making ready “a people prepared for the Lord.” If the disciples of John were not “his own” any more than the rest of the Jews who were not prepared, why were they called “the people prepared for the Lord?” Moreover, the inspired record makes a clear distinction between “John’s disciples and the Jews” (John 3:25).

14. What happened to those of his own who did receive him when he came unto them?

“But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God” (John 1:13).

Every Jew on earth had been born of blood, the will of the flesh, and the will of man. But his own to whom Jesus came had been born of the will of God. Some of these did not receive him after they had been prepared for him by repentance and baptism for the remission of sins. “From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him” (John 7:66). Some of his own did receive him and believed on his name. To them he gave power (the privilege) to become sons of God. Why did he have to give to these who had been born of God the privilege of becoming sons of God? Why were they not sons of God automatically? The answer is that at the time of birth the family had not yet been set up. The kingdom was yet in preparation. These living stones were made ready in advance and on the day when Jesus was granted authority and coronated to sit at God’s right hand they were incorporated into the kingdom. From that day forward that only had validity which was done in the name, that is, by the authority of Jesus Christ (Col. 3:17).

15. Were the twelve apostles baptized before Pentecost?

Yes. Not only were they baptized to become disciples of Jesus, but they baptized others during the lifetime of Jesus (John 4:1, 2). Some of the apostles were disciples of John before Jesus was identified to them. When they learned that he was the one for whom they were prepared they immediately followed him. “Again the next day after John stood, and two of his disciples, and looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith, Behold the Lamb of God! And the two disciples heard him speak, and they followed Jesus” (John 1:35-37). “One of the two which heard John speak, and followed him, was Andrew, Simon Peter’s brother. He first findeth his own brother Simon, and saith unto him, We have found the Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ. And he brought him to Jesus” (John 1:40-42). The disciples of John and the disciples of Jesus, before the death of Jesus, were baptized by the authority of God with the baptism which John described by saying, “He that sent me to baptize with water. . . .”

16. How could these be baptized and prepared as members of the body before the body existed?

In exactly the same way the head was prepared for the body prior to its inception. Jesus was baptized by John and so were those who were “charter members” of the body. When he became the head they automatically became members for a body does not consist of a head alone.

17. Were not the people immersed on Pentecost the first members of the body?

Certainly not. The record specifically says, “Then they that gladly received his word were baptized: and the same day there were added unto them about three thousand souls” (Acts 2:41). It was not those who were added but those to whom they were added who had the priority. Certainly the apostles who proclaimed the message were already part of the body unless you conclude that the gospel was first proclaimed by those outside the body of Christ.

18. Do we have any idea how many who were prepared under John's baptism automatically became members of the body by divine privilege?

All did who received Jesus and believed on his name (John 1:12). We can be certain that the number of disciples in Jerusalem approximated a hundred and twenty (Acts 1:15). That there were more than this is evidenced by the fact that Jesus appeared to more than five hundred at one time (1 Cor. 15:6).

19. When did John's baptism cease to be valid?

When all authority was bestowed upon Jesus by the Father, "for he hath put all things under his feet" (1 Cor. 15:27). John's baptism was performed under the authority of God and was valid until God transferred that authority to the Son. Since that time baptism (as well as all else we do or say) must be in the name of Jesus Christ, that is, in recognition of his Lordship over all. John baptized by the authority of God, but he baptized no one in the name of Jesus, because Jesus had not received the authority. Those who were baptized by John were required to believe in Jesus as a coming Lord, not as a present sovereign (Acts 19:4).

20. Were there any who continued to proclaim the baptism of John after it was invalidated by the transfer of authority to Jesus?

No doubt all did who knew of the baptism of John but did not know of the ascension, coronation and glorification of Jesus. Lines of communication were not as well established then as now. A good many years after Jesus was "by the right hand of God exalted and received of the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit" we have an example of one man who did not know that John's baptism had been superseded by that in the name of Jesus Christ. "And a certain Jew named Apollos, born at Alexandria, an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures came to Ephesus. This man was instructed in the way of the Lord; and being fervent in the spirit, he spoke and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John" (Acts 19:24, 25).

The expression "mighty in the scriptures" indicates that Apollos was thoroughly conversant with the law, the psalms and the prophets (the Torah, Hagiographa, and Haphtarach of the Jews). Certainly there is no relation here to the new covenant scriptures, for not a word of these had been written when Apollos was eloquently declaiming. The term "instructed in the way of the Lord" is typical of one who was recognized as a teacher in the synagogue because of familiarity with the discussions of the scribes and expounders of the Torah and its implications. Through his knowledge of the scriptures, Apollos had come to expect a forerunner of Jesus who would prepare a people for the Anointed One. He recognized John as a precursor of the Messiah, and baptism as a means of preparation, but he did not know that the Anointed One had taken the seat of authority.

21. Were there those who were baptized unto John's baptism after it had become invalid by transfer of divine authority?

Yes. The twelve at Ephesus of whom we previously spoke were in this category (Acts 19:1-7.) In all probability they were baptized by Apollos, for it was in Ephesus that he eloquently and fervently spoke and taught, urging the baptism of John (Acts 18:25). Obviously, since it is the authority of Jesus which validates any act performed under the Messianic regime their baptism was irrelevant and incompetent.

22. What test was proposed by Paul as to their status in the Lord Jesus?

He asked the logical question, “Have you received the Holy Spirit since you believed?” This was certainly the proper query, since all those who were immersed in the name of Jesus were promised the Holy Spirit as a gift (Acts 2:38). Those who were baptized by John in preparation for the kingdom did not receive the Holy Spirit at the time of baptism, since the Spirit could only be given to believers after the glorification of Jesus. “But this spake he of the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet given; because that Jesus was not yet glorified” (John 7:39).

Of course all who were previously prepared by John the Baptist, and who received Jesus, were given the Spirit at the time when they were given the privilege of becoming sons of God, having already been born of the will of God. The indwelling Spirit is a mark of sonship. “And because you are sons God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts” (Gal. 4:6). The apostles were of this number and were given the Spirit on the day when Jesus was made head of the body. They were a part of the charter membership of that body. We can determine when the body became a functioning unit by determining when the head and members were united by the Spirit (Cp. Acts 2:33).

We should not pass on without calling attention to some undesigned factors about Paul’s question and the circumstances growing out of it. He did not ask if they had received the Holy Spirit since they had been baptized, but since they had believed. Upon determining that they were unaware of the Spirit’s existence, he asked, “Unto what then were ye baptized?” This demonstrates that the apostle had no concept of believers, as disciples, who had not been baptized. There was no such thing with the apostle as “unimmersed believers” in the fellowship. Indeed it was he who wrote, “For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ” (Gal. 4:27). When Paul found a believer whose faith did not produce the fruits of union with Christ, he wanted to know instantaneously unto what he was baptized. Here is evidence that belief in Jesus is made effective by obedience in baptism.

23. What made the original baptism of the twelve disciples at Ephesus invalid?

We can best determine the answer to this by ascertaining what was done to provide valid baptism for them. It is at this juncture that modern partisans who regard baptism as a factional rite or tribal initiation fall down in their assumption and reasoning. Their baptism was not invalid because of their personal ignorance of the blessings or results intended to accrue from it, or because they did not understand when such blessings were bestowed. It was not even because they did not know they were to receive the Holy Spirit at the time for the evidence is that this blessing (as well as others) spontaneously resulted when baptism was performed under the proper authority. That is why the absence of this gift indicated that the baptism was performed under the wrong authority, which is no authority at all in things spiritual.

In view of the fact that when the Ephesian disciples learned the facts about Christ they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, we can conclude that it was being baptized under another name or commission which rendered their baptism ineffective. It was not a mistaken idea about baptism nor a wrong view about the blessings to be received from it that was at fault, but a defective concept of the status of Jesus.

It is not faith in baptism, but belief in Christ which makes our obedience acceptable. When a man believes that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," he may be ignorant about a great many things, and so may the one who immerses him, but this will not affect his acceptability with God. We are welcomed because of faith in Jesus, not because of perfection in knowledge of God's ordinances. A man may hear the good news of Jesus from a preacher who, because of faulty knowledge, tells him his sins are forgiven prior to baptism, but if the believing penitent does what God tells him to do, the fallacious view of a mistaken preacher will not cancel the promise of God made by grace.

I suspect if you were to enquire of baptismal administrators in most of our contemporary religious parties, as to the name in which, or the authority under which, they immerse, they would unhesitatingly affirm that they acted in the name of Jesus. We need to regard baptism as a universal means given by God for implementing our faith and not try to make it a mere factional gate. It is my honest conviction that Acts 19:1-7 did not give rise to rebaptism as practiced in our day, but men adopted a narrow and exclusivistic pattern of thought and sought for a scripture to sustain it. I regard every sincere immersed believer who was baptized in the name of my Lord as God's child and my brother. I am in the divine fellowship with all such in spite of the ignorance of all of us!

I have nothing to conceal and I refuse to cavil or quibble. If it be asked whether I believe that I have brethren scattered among the various sects and parties now in existence, the answer is emphatically that I do! God's sheep are still a scattered flock. Our task is to help gather them. We will not accomplish it, either by denying that they are sheep, or by creating another narrow sect into which to lead them. The body of my Lord is greater and nobler than any party or faction. It is greater than all of them put together!

Our Abiding Heritage

Mission Messenger (September 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

An address delivered at The World Convention of Christian Churches, San Juan, Puerto Rico, August 10, 1965

The death of Omri, and the succession of his son Ahab to the throne of Israel, launched the hapless people of Samaria upon a period of twenty-two years of constant crisis. The new king had the dubious distinction of exceeding all his predecessors in the practice of wickedness. In 1 Kings 16:31, we read, “And as if it had been a light thing for him to walk in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, he took for wife Jezebel the daughter of Ethbaal king of the Sidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshiped him.”

Jezebel descended upon the northern area of Palestine with an insatiable passion to banish the worship of Jehovah and install the pagan fertility cults with their orgies and excesses. She inaugurated a blood purge of the prophets of God and vowed to exterminate them. The hero of the age was Elijah. Upon the brow of Mount Carmel he confronted four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal in a public test of sacrificial fire, and when he was proven victorious, he ordered the seizure of the pagan priests and slew them all on the banks of the brook Kishon, at the foot of the mountain.

Jezebel was enraged beyond measure. She sent a servant to Elijah with the message, "So may the gods do to me, and more also, if I do not make your life as the life of one of them by this time tomorrow." Elijah fled for his life, stopping in the wilderness of Beer-sheba only to gain strength to press on. Forty days later he reached his destination at Horeb, the mount of God, where he abode in a cave. This was the mount where the law had been given years before. Upon that occasion the precipice was wreathed in thick smoke. The thunder reverberated through the crags, the forked tongues of lightning illuminated the eerie scene, and an earthquake caused the mountain to shake as the whole earth trembled.

Perhaps the lonely prophet, who thought the last altar had been toppled by ruthless heathen, and every other witness for Jehovah except himself had been murdered, returned to the source or point of origin of the national religion, for assurance of the power and permanency of the promises of God. He may have been like many in our day who are disturbed by the clamor of dissident voices, and distressed by the chorus of discordant partisans, until they long to return to Pentecost and experience anew the thrilling inauguration of the new covenant. But covenants are like persons who enter into them, they have but one birthday. The rest are anniversaries. You experience birthdays but you celebrate anniversaries.

Surely the prophet thought he would recapture the glory of ancient Sinai when God ordered, "Go forth, and stand upon the mount before the Lord." And truly the phenomena began as at the first. "And behold the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and broke in pieces the rocks before the Lord, but the Lord was not in the wind; and after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake; and after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire; and after the fire a still small voice. And when Elijah heard it, he wrapped his face in his mantle and went out and stood at the entrance of the cave."

A great wind— an earthquake— a fire! These are the most powerful forces in nature. All three were present when the covenant was given and God was in them. Now he was not in them, but after they swept on there was “a still small voice.” But it was the voice of God and it commissioned Elijah to return to active service and to pursue a course which would shake Israel and Syria to their very political foundations. The voice of God may not always be heard above the raucous ravings of the prophets of Baal. But it is there and it speaks with as much authority in a still small voice at the mouth of a cave as it does with the sound of a trumpet from the summit of a mountain.

The question of the authority of the Bible can never be divorced from that of the authorship of the Bible. Before one resolves to respect, or agrees to avoid, the authority of the Book, he must confront three questions in proper sequence. Is there a God? If so, has he communicated his thoughts to men? If he has done so, is that communication contained in the volume called “The Bible”?

This is not an assembly of atheists, an association of agnostics, or a society of skeptics. It would presume upon your patience and tamper with your time to present proof of the existence of Deity. The very title of the convention affirms it to be Christian, and assumes, if it does not assure, that those who come to it, as those who come to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

The longer I live and the more I meditate upon things divine, the more absurd it seems that there could be a personal God who did not communicate his wishes to the rational beings whom he designed and created to fulfill those wishes for their own happiness and his glorification. For if he did not communicate his will it would seem reasonable to deduce that either he would do so but could not, or, that he could do so and would not. But if he purposed to do what he had no power to perform he could not be God, and if he possessed the potential but preferred to preserve us in ignorance of the essentials to our wellbeing he would not be God. A God of consolation must be a God of communication!

If it be agreed that God, as the absolute good, would reveal to man those things which are for his ultimate good, it would appear further logical that this revelation would be preserved for the good of all mankind, until the ultimate is achieved or the destiny attained. Otherwise, God would exhibit partiality toward, and prejudice in behalf of, certain peoples and certain ages. The preservation would demand no greater demonstration of power than the revelation.

The highest form of communication known to man is by words which are adopted as symbols of ideas and vehicles of thought. Words may be either spoken or written, but when the original ideas are to be made accessible to future generations, in their primitive purpose and pristine purity, they must be consigned to documents which are subject to constant research as source materials. Traditions which are continually filtered through fallible memory processes soon forfeit any claim to authority based upon origin.

To one who accepts the premise that there is a body of writings properly designated the holy scriptures, or sacred writings, and that the constituent elements have won their place in the canon because of recognized authenticity and genuineness, the question of whether God has communicated with man presents no further occasion for doubts. That the Bible claims to contain a revelation from God is apparent even to the cursory and casual reader. If it does not, it is apparent that no such revelation is available, for no other book can approximate the credentials offered by the Bible for confirmation and collaboration of its claims. We either regard the Bible as containing a message from God, or we admit that we have no word of God, and insofar as divine communication is concerned our God has been as mute as the dumb idols of the heathen.

That there may be no uncertainty as to my own attitude, let me state unequivocally that for me the Bible contains the word of God. It is authoritative in my life. Its stories of faith and courage thrilled my heart when I was a lisping babe at my mother's knee. Its gentle rebukes rescued me from reckless rebellion in the days of my youth, and when I refused to hearken, its stern reproof rendered my nights sleepless with the agonizing torment of a burning conscience. Its demand upon my soul tugged me from the old handmade pew in a simple rural meetinghouse to tearfully confess my faith in him "whom having not seen I love." And its command led me into the clear waters of a flowing creek to be buried with him in that act of surrender in which I pledged allegiance forever to his sovereignty over my life.

Upon those occasions when I shivered and trembled in the cold wind blowing across the cemetery, as I gazed for the last time upon the coffin containing all that was mortal of him who begot me, or of her who bore me, it was the blessed promises they had taught me in our rude, poverty-stricken home, where the mantle of love was thrown over the harsh facts of life, which dried away my tears and gave me the courage to continue the battle. And now that I have personally reached the point in my earthly pilgrimage where the sun has passed its meridian, and I face the soft afterglow while the shadows lengthen behind me, I have, like Jacob of old, returned to my Bethel to renew my faith in "the God who answered in the day of my distress and has been with me wherever I have gone." I have resolved that I will not cast away his rod and staff as I approach the dark valley. I want his word to lean upon when I . . . feel the fog in my throat,

The mists in my face,

When the snows begin, and the blasts denote

I am nearing the place.

I am fully aware of the charges which will be leveled against such artless and unreserved faith by our sophisticated society. One who thus trusts in the Father of life and the life of the Father, will be labeled as naive, simple and childish. To this indictment before the bar of human wisdom I cheerfully plead guilty, although I would prefer to substitute the term “childlike” for childish. It is precisely this attitude which must be adopted if one is to grasp the divine revelation. This is the wisdom of ignorance as opposed to the ignorance of wisdom! Before we may be filled of God we must be empty of self. God sends none away empty except those who are full of themselves!

When Jesus upbraided, for their unrepentant arrogance, the great urban centers where most of his mighty works were performed, he said, “I thank thee, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hidden these things from the wise and understanding and revealed them to babes; yea, Father, for such was thy gracious will.” When the disciples asked him to referee their verbal contest over who would be greatest in the kingdom, he set a child in the midst of them and said, “Truly, I say to you, unless you turn and become like children, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven. Whoever humbles himself like this child, he is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.”

Those who confess their inability to “understand all mysteries and all knowledge,” and, as a consequence, must resort to the age-old formula, “Speak Lord, thy servant heareth” must enter at “The Children’s’ Gate” if they enter at all. And those who stoop low enough to find access by this route, will learn that they have already bowed the knee in recognition of the Lordship of Jesus.

Jesus is Lord! This is not a mere shibboleth or vacuous cliché to be bandied about in theological dialogue or ecclesiastical discussion. It is not a mere passkey to unlock the multitude of doors and gain access to the variegated cells of a complex schismatic structure called “modern Christianity.”

Jesus is Lord! This is not a verbalization of the least common denominator discoverable as a loose tie to hold together feuding factions. It is not an island jutting out of the turbulent waters of sectarianism to afford the only solid place to which those who have made shipwreck of all other aspects of faith may repair for consultation and conference. It is the only ground of our trust and confidence, the very universe of our hope.

Jesus is Lord! This is a fact, demonstrable as all facts must be by credible testimony. The divine witness was the Holy Spirit shed abroad upon the chosen envoys of the King on Pentecost. The human witnesses were those ambassadors sent forth into an alien world. Their testimony was to reach the uttermost parts of the earth, and His abiding care was to be with them to the end of the age.

There is a difference in confessing that Jesus is the Savior and acknowledging him as the Lord. The first may be an intellectual assent growing out of an emotional need; the second is an act of commitment in recognition of sovereignty. One may be by consecrated lips; the other must be by dedicated life. To accept Jesus merely as a Savior may be purely selfish; to admit his Lordship is an act of surrender. One places man on the receiving end, the other on the sacrificial end, of the Christian concept. We accept Jesus as Savior when he hears what we say from a sincere heart; we acknowledge him as Lord when he sees what we do as an expression of faith.

Lordship creates a master-servant relationship. Lipservice can never be a test of it. His own words are adequate proof of this. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven" (Matthew 7:21). "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" (Luke 6:46). "Blessed is that servant who when his Lord comes, he shall find so doing" (Luke 12:43). When Peter asserted that Jesus had been raised up and made both Lord and Christ, the natural question was, “Men and brethren, what must we do?” (Acts 2:37).

This is the reason that in response to the Good News both belief and baptism are involved. “He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.” Since the gospel is intended to produce a community of believers bound together in a body, under a head, who is over all, these two factors are essential and valid. The belief of one fact commits us to recognition of his divine Sonship. The obedience of one act in implementation of our faith commits us to the acceptance of his lordship over our lives. It is a proof of divine wisdom that these two guard the portals of a community whose citizens must depend for their survival upon their trust in and obedience to an absent King.

It is obvious that we cannot show that Jesus is Lord unto us unless we do what he says. It is just as obvious that we cannot do what the Lord has said, unless he has spoken, and unless we know what he said. If we reject the new covenant scriptures as containing the word of the Lord, we have no other source to which we may repair to know his will. If we receive these scriptures as an expression of his will, they are authoritative—not because of their literary value, or their moral and ethical influence— but because they constitute the word of the Lord. If we do not accept them, we cannot affirm that he is Lord, because it is upon the basis of their declaration and confirmation that we confidently make such affirmation. If we depend upon the scriptures for information relating to our Lord, it would seem incongruous to reject them as a source of information for regulating our lives in that Lord.

We are aware that this simple childlike thesis is questioned by contemporary scholastics. Many of these have adopted the conclusion that the new covenant scriptures represent only a collection and compilation of the traditions of the church. They contend that the work of the church did not result from the scriptures, but that the scriptures resulted from the work of the church. It is argued, and correctly so, that the church existed prior to the new covenant scriptures. But the church did not exist prior to the word of God, for it was not the church which produced the gospel but the gospel which produced the church. Jesus said, “The seed of the kingdom is the word of God.”

Did the apostolic doctrine flow from the same fountain as the apostolic gospel? Did the bread upon which the saints were to feed come from the same source as the life it was to sustain? Were the children of God turned loose at birth to forage for themselves, or were they provided with “the sincere milk of the word?” Were the new covenant scriptures written by the church or to the church? If they were produced by the church, why did not the church also preserve as holy all of the other letters and documents then extant? If they were written to the church, by whom were they written and upon what authority? Was that authority accepted as legitimate at the time by the body of Christ? If so, upon what ground can that same body reject that authority in our day?

It will make a great deal of difference whether we regard the new covenant scriptures as the voice of the Shepherd or the bleating of the sheep; the providential provision of a loving Father or the accidental discovery of curious children. What a cruel irony of fate would result if the Bible were shown to be mere tradition and those martyrs whose bodies were burned at the stake because they resisted tradition as equal with God’s revelation, would prove to be not “fools for Christ’s sake” but simply backward idiots in their own right. It seems to me that I can envision a mighty host of spectral forms rising out of the gray mists of the ages of ignorance, pointing skeletal fingers of accusation— and condemnation— at those of us who use the rays of our own enlightenment to burn and destroy our greatest source of strength and hope.

I do not plead for rigid “patternism” nor for conformity that is either blind or bland. I do not regard the new covenant scriptures as providing a meticulous method or regimented routine for every exigency which may arise. But I do entreat that we recognize our continued need for a compass as we sail the untried ocean on our way back home. We will not demonstrate a superior wisdom by ceasing to make the written word a means to an end, nor by considering it as an end to all means. There is a difference in the compass and the pole star to which it points. The Christian concept is not one of Jesus pointing us to a book but of a book pointing us to Jesus.

In our spiritual odyssey it is not enough to fill our ears with wax or lash ourselves to the mast so we may steadfastly resist the siren song luring us to the islands of mediocrity where the sands are strewn with the bleaching bones of those who began with high hopes and ardent ambition. We must also steer safely between the Scylla of liberalism on the one side and the Charybdis of legalism on the other. In mythology one of these monsters lifted men up and destroyed them, the other sucked them under to their fate. But if safety depends upon remaining in the vessel it little matters whether we are doomed by elevation or by gravitation.

When I received from the Program Committee the gracious invitation to address you in the context of this particular session, I prayed long and earnestly for the help of the indwelling Spirit in the choice of a theme and the words with which to express my deepest concerns to you, my beloved brothers and sisters in Him “who through Christ reconciled us to himself.” As I read the words of the longest chapter in the Bible, this expression of the “sweet singer of Israel” seemed to leap from the page and burn its way into my consciousness: “Thy testimonies are my heritage forever; yea, they are the joy of my heart.”

Our enduring heritage! Kingdoms rise and fall. Civilizations flourish and fail. The sound of tramping armies shakes the earth and then fades into oblivion. Philosophers have their day and vanish from the arena. Books become best sellers and then collect dust on forgotten shelves in darkened corners. Leaders are brought into the spotlight with a fanfare and disappear into the curtained wings of life's theater almost before the echo of the trumpet dies. But the word of God lives on according to his unswerving promise, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away."

Sustained by the spade of the archeologist and supported by the searches of the archivist, the word of God lives on in spite of changing cultures and flagging faith. He speaks from the summit of Palomar through the lens of a telescope as he did from the brow of Sinai through the lips of Moses, and his message is the same, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." The still small voice heard by Elijah in an ancient cave echoes from the musty scroll of a Dead Sea cavern in our own day, and summons us anew to the unfinished task of the centuries. A stumbling illiterate goatherd can bring discoveries to light which awaken the profoundest scholars to frenzied zeal.

Our enduring heritage! My entertainment in infancy, my instruction in youth, my inspiration in manhood, my invigoration in approaching age, my illumination on the journey through the valley of shadows! Oh, may I never forget it, but love it, revere it, and through it be faithful unto Him whose word it is. And amidst the clamor of disputed claims, the shouts of sharply separated scientific scholars, and the propositions of antagonistic professors and pundits, may I never forget that it is better to know the Rock of Ages than to know the ages of the rocks.

Withdraw Yourselves

Mission Messenger (September 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

Thessalonica was a city of pride. Location, history and status all contributed to the feeling of self-gratification. But some of it was false pride.

The hot springs gushing from the earth in numerous places gave the city its original name of Therma. The rivulets from these, emptying into the sea, came in contact with the colder water and created a cloud of vapor through which sailing ships appeared as argosies of the skies. It was for this reason the body of water was designated as The Thermaic Gulf. The harbor bustled with the activity created by vessels of lading from many ports.

It was Cassander who changed the name of the city. The son of Antipater, he married the daughter of Philip of Macedon. The latter had won a great victory on the very day that a runner brought him news of the birth of the baby girl. He returned word that she was to be called Thessalonica. After she married Cassander, he was assigned the task of slum clearance and modernization in the city which had not carted away the rubble of preceding wars. Not only did he alter the city, but changed its name to that of his wife. In honor of her he issued new coinage on which the form of “Victory” was imprinted. It was no dishonor for a city to bear the name of the sister of Alexander the Great.

In our own United States of America, Highway 66 has long been recognized as the chief thoroughfare from coast to coast. Chambers of Commerce have advertised their towns along this route with the slogan, "On the Main Street of America." There is some evidence that publicity groups for various municipalities functioned even in apostolic days. If so, the advertisers in Thessalonica could have adopted the phrase, "On the Main Street of the Empire." The famous Via Egnatia, main artery through which life flowed from the heart at Rome to the remote extremities of the Asian world, passed directly through the center of Thessalonica. It was the largest and most influential city from Dyrrhachium to the Hellespont. Every pulse beat of the empire was felt as it surged through the political and economic veins of the district.

Most important is the fact that Thessalonica was a "free city." This cherished status was granted to but few places in the Greek world. Sometimes it was bestowed as a political gesture because of an illustrious past, as in the case of Athens. Again it was given as a reward for assistance to the armed forces of the empire in a period of crucial struggle, as in the case of Tarsus. This was true also of Thessalonica. After the assassination of Julius Caesar by the republican conspirators, a civil war began which culminated in a decisive battle on the plains of the River Strymon, between Philippi and Thessalonica. These plains have been called "The Deathbed of the Roman Republic." Here the imperial forces led by Augustus and Mark Antony completely overwhelmed the army led by Brutus and Cassius.

As a result, Philippi was made a military colony (colonia) and Thessalonica a free city (urbs libera). There were four distinct privileges accorded a free city. (1) The citizens were self-governing and not subject to a district administrator from Rome. They could determine their own form of government and were wholly responsible for its application. The local magistrates held the power of life and death over the citizenry. (2) No armed Roman guard was stationed in a free city and the citizens were not subjected to the sight of an occupational force. (3) No Roman insignia, either political or militaristic, could be displayed. This avoided frequent revolts and outbreaks which occurred elsewhere when the hated symbols violated places held sacred by the populace. (4) In most cases freedom from taxation (libertas cum immunitate) was granted, and descendants of original families were supported by the dole if they registered and requested it.

If time and space permitted it would be a genuine privilege to show our readers how this background is woven into the very language in Acts describing Paul's encounter in the city, and how it also provides an understanding of many of the very phrases appearing in his two epistles. However, we must forego the pleasure to be derived from such a course in the interest of a more limited pursuit. We shall begin by investigating the general effect upon the inhabitants of a city of the declaration of urbs libera.

Obviously the decree would eliminate a great deal of personal responsibility and provide much time for leisure. In a cultural environment like the one at Athens this afforded the average citizen opportunity for listening to the various philosophers, most of whom conducted their dialogues in the Forum, or marketplace. At Thessalonica, devoid as it was of such scholastic opportunities, the tendency was for many of the men to degenerate into lazy louts and loungers, ready for any excitement which might be aroused. This type of character is depicted in the references we have seen to the Thessalonians in the literature of the times, and the rabble might well be described in the words of Epimenides concerning the Cretans—"liars, vicious brutes, lazy gluttons" (Cp. Titus 1:2). This will explain what happened in Thessalonica as described by Luke.

But the Jews, in a fury of jealousy, got hold of some of the unprincipled loungers of the marketplace, gathered a crowd together and set the city in an uproar. Then they attacked

Jason's house in an attempt to bring Paul and Silas out before the people. When they could not find them they hustled Jason and some of the brothers before the civic authorities, shouting, "These are the men who have turned the world upside down and have now come here, and Jason has taken them into his house. What is more, all these men act against the decrees of Caesar, saying there is another king called Jesus!" By these words the Jews succeeded in alarming both the people and the authorities, and they only released Jason and the others after binding them over to keep the peace.

A congregation of saints exists within an environment and cannot be wholly unaffected by it. Those who compose it are also victims of their own past conditioning. This will serve to explain why Paul laid such emphasis upon the necessity of securing honest employment, holding it, and earning one's own livelihood. He did this in three ways.

(1). By personal command while with the brethren. In his first epistle he directs them to "look after your own business, and to work with your hands, as we commanded you" (4:11). In his second epistle, he says, "For even during our stay with you we laid down the rule: the man who will not work shall not eat" (3:10).

(2). By personal example in their midst. "Remember, brothers, how we toiled and drudged. We worked for a living night and day, rather than be a burden to anyone, while we proclaimed before you the good news of God" (2 Thess. 1:9). "You know yourselves how you ought to copy our example. We were no idlers among you; we did not accept board and lodging from anyone without paying for it; we toiled and drudged, we worked for a living night and day, rather than be a burden to any of you— not because we have not the right to maintenance, but to set an example for you to imitate" (2 Thess. 2:7-9).

(3). By special admonition in both epistles. "Let it be your ambition to keep calm and look after your own business, and to work with your hands, as we ordered you, so that you may command the respect of those outside your own number, and at the same time may never be in want” (1 Thess. 4:11, 12).

These letters grew out of life situations. They were written to cover actual conditions. The favors for which they express thanks were real. The behavior which was commended was genuine. The rebukes administered were not for imaginary wrongs nor the corrections prescribed for fictitious ills. We can visualize the state of the brethren from that which was written to and about them. This fact lays a foundation of a scripture which has been wrested and contorted— 2 Thessalonians 3:6.

“Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which ye received of us.”

On the basis of this passage honest dissenters have been hounded out of every faction. Every disagreement with “the powers that be” and with “those who appear to be somewhat” has been labeled a “disorderly walk” and action has been taken to “withdraw fellowship.” In our own days of factional adherence and bigotry, we misused the passage as justification for refusal to recognize our brethren in the Lord. We were wrong! We are ashamed of the spirit of intolerance which we sought to excuse by abuse of the verse. We are convinced from unbiased research that what is commonly called “withdrawal of fellowship” is not countenanced in the verse and corporate action resulting in excommunication of a brother is not even a consideration in it.

The problem of interpretation centers around the meaning of “walking disorderly.” The word for disorderly is ataktos. It occurs in this form as an adverb twice (2 Thess. 3:6, 11). It occurs in the verb form ataktein once (verse 7). When applied to the military it means “to break rank, to get out of step.” When applied to another orderly arrangement such as a school or business, it means “to play truant.” It has to do with a slack and irresponsible attitude. Dr. Barclay mentions its use in the papyri, “in an apprentice’s contract in which the father agrees that his son must make good any days on which he absents himself from duty or plays truant.”

The context clearly shows that Paul uses it to designate the idleness into which the brethren had drifted. Having reached the mistaken view that the return of Christ was imminent, they saw no further need of working. They gave up their jobs and decided to live off of the other brethren, even prying into their personal affairs and becoming busybodies in other men’s matters. Paul defines “disorderly” by showing both what it is and what it is not. In verse 11 he shows that it consists of “working not at all.” In verses 7, 8, he demonstrates that he did not behave disorderly because he did not eat any man’s food without paying for it, but supported himself by secular labor engaged in by day and by night.

To walk disorderly, in this context, is to live in idleness and sponge off of the other brethren. To read anything else into it is to ignore the setting entirely and twist the scripture to fit a preconceived idea or notion. But what should be done to a person who simply will not keep a job and earn his own bread? The teaching is plain.

(1). The brethren are commanded in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, “Withdraw yourselves from every brother who walketh disorderly,” that is, who falls into idle habits. Note that this is not congregational or corporate action. It has no relationship to public or formal discipline. It is individual. No action is taken on the idle person. Nothing is done to him. He is simply left where he is while the brethren step back from him. Observe that the one from whom they step back, or from whom they hold themselves aloof is a brother, although a lazy one who is living in idleness.

“Withdraw” is from stello which means “to gather up.” It was used for gathering up and binding one’s loose outer garment to keep it from coming in contact with that which would soil or contaminate it. It was used for furling the sails of a ship to keep them from striking together and suffering damage. It is the term which would apply when a mother called her children into the house to protect them from threatened danger. It is easy to see how it came to mean “to avoid, to hold aloof.”

The brethren in Thessalonica were simply commanded to refrain from extending hospitality to loafers and slackers. They were not to feed them for the command was that “if any would not work neither should he eat” (verse 10). If one of these dawdling drones appeared at the front door just before mealtime he was to be offered a job instead of food. If he refused the former he was to be refused the latter. One who shunned honest toil was to be shunted from the table. It was just that simple.

(2). The idle busybodies were commanded and exhorted to get a job. “That with quietness they work and eat their own bread.” The term “busybody” is especially interesting since it is a play upon words. In the original it incorporates the word for “work.” In verse 11 Paul uses the verb ergazomai, to work, and follows it with periergazomai, busybodies. Those who neglected their own work, which should have been central in their own lives were flitting and buzzing around telling others how to conduct their business. The prefix “peri” means “around” as in periphery. W. E. Vine says a free rendering of the passage would be, “Some who are not busied in their own business, but are overbusied in that of others.”

“Quietness” is from hesuchia. It implies that tranquillity which arises from within and causes no disturbance of others. The Greeks had a different word for that serenity which proceeds from without but it would not have been as appropriate here. The idle brother was to secure a job and earn his own keep, without creating problems and complications for others in the congregation.

(3). “And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed” (verse 14). “Note” is from semeioo, of which W. E. Vine says, “In the Middle Voice, to note for oneself, and is so used in 2 Thess. 3:14, in an injunction to take cautionary note of one who refuses obedience to the Apostolic word by the Epistle.”

The phrase “have no company with him” is intended to forbid the extending of hospitality. It would preclude the social gatherings to which the idle might flock and at which they would eat at the expense of others. The word “ashamed” is from entrepo, and refers to “a wholesome shame which involves a change of conduct.”

(4). Although the offender is to be noted and hospitality refused while he persists in his idleness, the record says, “Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.” Refusal to furnish food for such a person does not mean he is to be treated as a heathen. He is simply a lazy and indolent brother, who must be shunned to be saved from his course. When a man cannot be reached through appeal to his heart he may have to be reached through appeal to his stomach. So long as his head is empty and his stomach is full little can be done.

It is almost impossible to imagine how the tangled maze of disciplinary action— boycott, excommunication and congregationalism exclusivism has grown out of this passage. We can only conclude that when men seek for justification for their sectarian attitudes they will find it. The expression “Withdraw yourselves” provided the handy passage to satisfy their partisan needs and they swooped down and appropriated it as a new weapon in the arsenal of factionalism. Perhaps the King James Version is partly responsible and if some of the other versions had been used the brethren might have been saved the embarrassment of confessing their mistaken application. Here is the way it reads in The New English New Testament:

These are our orders to you, brothers, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: hold aloof from every Christian brother who falls into idle habits, and does not follow the tradition you received from us. You know yourselves how you ought to copy our example: we were no idlers among you; we did not accept board and lodging from anyone without paying for it; we toiled and drudged, we worked for a living night and day, rather than be a burden to any of you— not because we have not the right to maintenance, but to set an example for you to imitate. For even during our stay with you we laid down the rule: the man who will not work shall not eat. We mention this because we hear that some of your number are idling their time away, minding everybody's business but their own. To all such we give these orders, and we appeal to them in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to work quietly for their living.

My friends, never tire of doing right. If anyone disobeys our instructions given by letter, mark him well, and have no dealings with him until he is ashamed of himself. I do not mean treat him as an enemy, but give him friendly advice as one of the family.

Statement of Aims

Mission Messenger (September 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

The demands of justice have certain claims upon the editor of a periodical such as this. If brethren and friends are expected to continue to read what we write they have a right to know our aims and the methods by which we propose to attain them. It would be unfair to allow them to stumble along in our journalistic wake with no sense of personal direction or destination. We offer no apology for this re-statement of our purpose and prospects.

1. We are devoting our life and active service to pleading for the unity of all believers in our Lord Jesus Christ. We consider this the most essential and challenging need of our generation, simply because we are divided, but dare not remain in that condition. Unity is not an end but a means to an end. The greatest end in the universe is to bring the world into a state of allegiance to Jesus, but he makes this contingent upon the unity of those who believe in him. Since the world cannot be won to believe in Christ until those who believe in Christ are one we must unite or fail in our ultimate mission.

2. We propose to those with whom we are most closely allied, as a basis for consideration of the unity of all believers, a recapture of the spirit of restoration which characterized such men as Barton Warren Stone, Thomas and Alexander Campbell, and their contemporaries, a century and a half ago.

This is not an attempt to revive or restore their movement. It was a historical expedient adapted to the needs of its day and called forth by the circumstances of that generation. We acknowledge no slavish subservience to the movement but seek only to bow before the Christ whom the movement magnified. Many heirs of this noble experiment think they are being loyal to the first century proclamation, when they are really trying to face twentieth century reality with a nineteenth century mentality. This only increases the problems without offering any solution.

We accept all truth discovered and enunciated by the restoration fathers. But we refuse to close our minds against additional truths uncovered in our own time. We will not freeze the interpretation of the Spirit at the level of 1809, nor use the deductions of our worthy predecessors as a criterion by which to assay the value of the ore we mine from the veins in the lode of truth which death forbade them to continue to explore. It is their spirit and attitude we need to spark a new movement in our day as powerful as was the one which they placed in orbit.

3. While we no longer confuse the restoration movement in its time with the church of God which is timeless, we propose to continue within that frame of reference in our plea for unity for several reasons. Any reformer must begin where he is, because there is no place else where he can start. He must never confuse his dreams with his duty, nor confound his vision with his vows. But there is a deeper reason for our decision. We believe in the restoration principle. We accept it as vital and valid. We hold that our hope of true unity is dependent upon a proper definition and implementation of that principle.

4. Our immediate emphasis shall continue to be brought to bear upon the numerous splinter parties growing out of the restoration movement. Unity, like charity, should begin at home. The day we first divided among ourselves we lost all relevance as a "unity movement." We must undo that tragic mistake and renounce the train of errors resulting from it, else we will never regain our integrity, and will continue to divide ourselves out of existence as we have divided ourselves out of influence in many communities.

The fact that we labor primarily among the various factions of the restoration movement must not be construed as evidencing any lack of concern for others. We will, upon invitation, attend and converse with those who acknowledge Jesus as Lord, regardless of their current alignment or affiliation. We will address them in love and submit to open questioning and grilling without rancor.

5. It is our contention that within the restoration ranks we did not divide over those things which we credit with having created our catastrophic condition. We separated when we ceased to love one another. Our differences were occasions for discussion and should never have been made occasions for division. To differ is not a sin. To discuss differences is not a sin. But division among brethren is a sin. It is childish, carnal and a work of the flesh. We can differ and discuss until Jesus comes and still go to heaven, but if we cause, condone or continue division we shall all go to hell. It is as dangerous to perpetuate sin as to perpetrate it.

Our approach is not to debate every action of every faction until we reach agreement on every controversial matter. That is not our real problem. We seek to stimulate love for all of the brethren which will enable us to receive them as God received us — in spite of our ignorance, fallibility, weakness and error. Since this love must be in deed and in truth, not merely in word and in speech, we will go among all of our brethren, commending our love to them in Christ even while we cannot commend many of their ideas and practices. This does not mean that discussion of differences will be forever banned or outlawed, for that would not be feasible or desirable. It simply means that we must develop a proper atmosphere in which we may discuss without falling into the sin of division. We hold that “the more excellent way” is the only way by which our cruel rents can be repaired.

Our strategy for the recovery and repossession of the lost province of oneness is fourfold in nature and is summed up in the words— Affection, Association, Consultation and Consecration. I must begin with love for my brothers, then associate with them because I love them, then discuss problems with those with whom I am in association, and with them enter more deeply into relationship with Christ Jesus. This latter is essential to preclude our “falling out by the way” over other things that may arise to trouble us. I think these must occur in sequence, or, they must do so in my life. This is why partisan debate offers no solution. It places consultation or discussion before association. The participants are not conditioned for the encounter. They come together to debate and do not debate to come together. They meet as warring tribes and not as yearning brothers.

Debate is too shallow and superficial. Any unity which endures must be a unity in depth and that depth must be gained by penetration— the heart and life of Jesus. As men hold hands and walk more deeply into Christ they enter a realm where spiritual affinity welds them together, not upon a basis of knowledge but of faith. Dialogue is the approach of the open hand; debate is often that of the closed fist. No man can lift his brother with a hand clenched with hate.

6. Our hope of recovery from and of halting relapse into division in the future lies in our ability to recapture a proper sense of relative values. All truth is equally true but it is not all equally important. The body of truth is like the physical body. Some of its constituent elements are essential to being; others are only essential to wellbeing. The latter must never be elevated to the same category as the former.

The relationship created by the blood of Jesus is greater than any mistaken view held by anyone within that relationship. The family tie must not be severed because of the peculiarity of some of the children. Jesus did not shed his blood for our views of opinions, but for ourselves as persons. We should never allow anything for which Jesus did not die to negate or destroy that for which he gave his life. To reduce the kingdom of heaven to the level of our controversial issues dishonors Jesus by making it appear that he died to purchase a mere party to project and propagandize for some particular method, mode or means.

The value which one attaches to the relationship which we share as a family in Christ can be determined by those things which he allows to disturb or destroy it. The quality of his love can be measured by whether or not he regards persons as being of greater importance to heaven than human interpretations, deductions and opinions. We have resolved to be a brother to all of God's other children and extend to them every possible expression of love in a tangible fashion. We believe that love is the most powerful weapon to overcome hostile attitudes.

7. We seek to encourage congregations to rise above the narrow sectarian attitudes and assume a posture of courage and spiritual breadth commensurate with citizenship in a kingdom designed to be universal. This would entail rejection of all false tests of fellowship and acceptance of brethren of moral stature and integrity regardless of divergent opinions honestly held. Men who are not factious should be recognized and invited to participate in the services so that all might profit from their insights. This provides a public witness to our unity in Jesus.

Brethren who do not use instrumental music need not compromise their position nor alter their practice in order to give respectful attention to a brother from that camp of the saints which uses the instrument. Those who are not pre-millennial need not sacrifice any truth they have ever held to listen to a brother who does not concur with them on the interpretation of Revelation 20. We hold no brief for instrumental music or the pre-millennial concept but we will resist any attempt to condition brotherhood or fellowship upon either.

Bishops of congregations ought to be men of valor, unafraid of the clerical domination which has fastened upon every faction amongst us. We face two real enemies in every generation, standing athwart the road to progress in unity— the clergy and the vested interests. These have everything to lose if the saints unite, while the saints have everything to gain. Only when congregations of the holy ones adopt a “declaration of independence” and cease to be frightened by editors or controlled by forces or factors outside the congregation, will we ever be able to give the world a demonstration of unity in depth and diversity— the only unity possible to thinking men.

We urge our brethren to make congregational autonomy more than a mere factional catchword. Instead of using it as a means to debar worthy brethren it can become our greatest tool in building bridges across chasms in the community. In the final analysis all unity must be manifested locally. It will accomplish little real good to talk about it theoretically on a universal scale if it never becomes practical enough to demonstrate to the friends in our own areas. When the day comes that even a few elders will gain the courage to truly be bishops and assert their freedom from dogmatism, the factional defences will crumble rapidly. We know what it means to be with a congregation whose members are both free to speak and free to listen without fear of reprisal. What a thrill! What an adventure in the spirit!

8. If we be asked about our own course in the future the answer can be simply given. We are irrevocably committed to helping answer the prayer of the Lord Jesus Christ for the unity of those who believe in him through the apostolic message. This automatically places us in opposition to every attitude, sentiment and view which is partisan, divisive and factional. It is our intention to seek peace and pursue it, and to relentlessly oppose the sensual and ungodly spirit of the party which shatters and scatters the people of God.

We will go wherever the Spirit opens up a door for sharing with our brethren. Whatever their views as to instrumental music, the millennium, colleges, orphan homes, classes, cups, order of worship, or any of the rest of those things which have been problems to us, we shall go among them and help them to a closer walk with God even as they help us. We intend to be neither frightened by our foes nor flattered by our friends to the extent that we shall relax our battle. If we cannot help our brothers we will not hinder them.

We shall join no clique, clan or conclave. We refuse to court any sect or woo any faction. We will not be maneuvered into an alliance with any group of brethren where we will be forced to deny ourselves the privilege of association with any other group. The price of factional allegiance is too great a cost and we will not defraud our soul to pay it.

There seems to be an occasional wistful hope expressed by some that we may tire of the struggle or be discouraged by the misrepresentations and attacks of misguided partisans. We hasten to assure all such that they entertain such hopes in vain. We have enlisted for life. We intend to continue until the unseen hand reaches from the pale shadows to clutch our throat or until the pen is dropped by nerveless fingers already growing cold. We are deadly serious about the struggle to unite the forces of right and we shall press the crusade to the last disputed barricade. It is a source of rejoicing to see so many others entering the list for freedom's cause and we thank God and take courage, but if the time ever comes when we must stand alone in the war against orthodoxy and dogmatism, we shall continue it in the firm belief that we wrestle for his cause "whom having not seen we love."

End of an Era

Mission Messenger (September 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

The American Christian Review has announced suspension of publication after 110 years in the field of religious journalism. It was started in 1856 by Benjamin Franklin, and later purchased by Daniel Sommer who changed its name to Octographic Review. Another change produced the title Apostolic Review, but finally, having made full circle it returned to the original name. Katherine Way Sommer acted as editor for many years, but before her death in 1924 made D. Austen Sommer editor. When he declined she placed it in the hands of C. W. Sommer (another son) and Bessie K. Sommer (a daughter). In recent years the masthead has contained only the latter name, although much of the work has been done by Allen R. Sommer, only surviving son of Daniel Sommer.

If it should appear strange that, in these days when so many papers start and die, we should give so much space to the discontinuance of one, we offer pure sentiment as our justification. In the rough mining area where I was born, Daniel Sommer was the first representative of the restoration movement whom I remember seeing. At the time I was a barefoot boy, less than six years old. When the little congregation of 18 or 20 souls, most of them relatives, purchased an old saloon building, moved it to a new site, put a belfry on it and converted it into a meetinghouse, D. Austen Sommer was called for the first meeting.

In our rude mining shack “the Review” took an honored place beside our only other literature— the Holy Bible and the Sears Roebuck catalog. In those days the pages were newspaper size and contained an exchange column for boys and girls edited by Emily Baker. I wrote to it and there first saw my name in print. When I obeyed the gospel, although I did not then realize it, my thinking was regulated by the faction of which the paper was the recognized mouthpiece. Its editor wielded a tremendous influence. If he endorsed a man, that one had an inside track to any congregation in “the brotherhood.” If one was debarred from reporting through the paper it was equivalent to excommunication.

I do not blame Brother Sommer or the paper for my own Pharisaical or factional attitude. I do thank God for the amazing grace which delivered me from it. I am unable to think of very much worthwhile which our faction contributed to the solution of problems, despite our honesty of motive. But now that the paper has expired and become a part of brotherhood legend we say “requiescat in pace.”

The One Faith

Mission Messenger (October 1965)

Volume 27

[Abstract]

It is very difficult for most of us to grasp the real essence of Christianity. We are conditioned by environment and experience to resist its simplicity, and to try and mould and make it into a pattern to fit our preconceived notions. We live in a world of automation and systematization. We are dominated by monster machines of our own creation which have, under the guise of making life easier, robbed us of our freedom and individuality. We have become statistics instead of persons, we have numbers instead of names, we are slaves to punch cards which rule our earnings and regulate our disbursements.

It is not to be wondered at, that in such a world, we should be seduced into an attempt to reduce our most intimate relationships to standardized procedures, properly classified and codified. Nor should we be amazed that men forget that the relationships always suffer a tortuous and agonizing death, throttled by monotony and tormented by a sense of duty and a fear of forgetfulness. A man who draws up a code of marital responsibility in which he agrees to kiss his wife three times per week, on Monday, Wednesday and Friday afternoons, at 7:00 o'clock p. m., Central Standard Time, will soon have no wife to kiss. There are areas in human existence which must be left free for spontaneous expression. There are crannies of the heart which are too sacred for the prying eyes of other administrators to explore in an attempt to legislate what shall occupy them. An effort by another to thrust himself into them will serve only to shatter the fragile vessel.

Our gracious Father in heaven fully understands our needs and yearnings. He knows the manifold complexities of human personality because He made us. In all ages He has adapted His revelation to the needs and conditions of men in their own day. He sent the world of mankind to school for hundreds of years, providing able teachers in the persons of the prophets, who labored in the primary and elementary eras of the world to bring that world to maturity. In this last age He has spoken unto us through His Son.

While preparing the world for the coming of this dispensation, God acted through law. At the very outset He provided a constitution for Israel, specific in detail and meticulous in its provisions. It is evident that any commonwealth in which justification is to be attempted by law must have that law fully and completely spelled out at the very inception. The commandments cannot be given piecemeal as the people violate the spirit of the arrangement, else men will die because of ignorance of that which has not yet been given.

The advent of Jesus marked a great change. “Christ is the end of the law” (Rom. 10:4). “The law was our custodian until Christ came. . . . we are no longer under a custodian” (Gal. 3:24, 25). Law was supplanted by faith, but faith is neither a law nor a custodian. If it is Christ died in vain. “For we hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law” (Rom. 3:28). “But now that faith has come we are no longer under a custodian” (Gal. 3:25).

Christianity has always faced the same problem which has plagued society. Maturity cannot be measured by the calendar. A great many who should be mature by reason of age (or the age) reveal that they still have infantile or adolescent traits. At Corinth Paul could not address the brethren “as spiritual men, but as men of the flesh, as babes in Christ.” But he wrote, “Yet among the mature we do impart wisdom” (1 Cor. 2:6). The writer to the Hebrews faced the problem. “For though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need some one to teach you again the first principles of God’s word. You need milk, not solid food; for every one who lives on milk is unskilled in the word of righteousness, for he is a child. But solid food is for the mature, for those who have their faculties trained by practice to distinguish good from evil” (Heb. 5:12-14).

One of the basic needs of the human being is a sense or feeling of security, and from infancy until death, he acts or reacts in such a manner as to provide for it. Some of the reactions may be unconscious, or appear to be unrelated to the need but are governed by it nonetheless. The adolescent, who is conditioned to expect security in the home and as a member of the family, because of the father-child relationship, finds security in specific laws and strict enforcement. He inwardly craves restraint and secretly regards it as a token of affection. Arbitrary laws are essential to his wellbeing.

On the same basis, God’s children, having grown up in an age when they are to be treated as men, but suffering from immaturity, seek for security in a legalistic code. Unable to truly exercise the freedom to love and exist on the plane of the Spirit which is above law, they must take the provisions of grace and warp and twist them into a written code, and then exercise police powers over their brethren who are more humble than themselves, to enforce their code in ruthless disregard for the conscience of the others. This is equated with being loyal to God and faithful to the Bible when actually it is detrimental to the whole Christian revelation and utterly disruptive of the fellowship which Jesus came to create.

The Relationship of Faith

It is obvious that our relationship in this age is founded upon faith. In Christ we are justified by faith (Romans 5:1). We walk by faith (2 Cor. 5:7). We live by faith (Gal. 2:20). We receive the promise of the Spirit by faith (Gal. 3:14). Indeed it is true that “In Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision is of any avail, but faith working through love.” Any misunderstanding of the relationship of faith can be fatal to the whole Christian structure exactly as an entire building can be endangered by weakening the foundation.

This leads us to the examination of what we believe to be a palpable error in the thinking of many brethren in our day. It is manifested in their treatment of the term, “the faith,” and is especially exhibited in their conclusions concerning Ephesians 4:5, where the apostle informs us there is “One Lord, one faith, one baptism.” The “one faith” is frequently explained as being the entire collection of new covenant scriptures, and what is worse, those scriptures as an intended written code, or legalistic system.

The advocates of orthodoxy seem not to realize that the very scriptures they regard as a written code, themselves declare we have no such arrangement. One of the chief writers of the letters embraced in these scriptures, a man who wrote more of them than any other, declared that God “qualified us to be ministers of a new covenant, not in a written code but in the Spirit, for the written code kills, but the Spirit gives life” (2 Cor. 3:6). Again he writes, “But we are discharged from the law, dead to that which held us captive, so that we serve not under the old written code, but in the new life of the Spirit” (Romans 7:6). Jesus did not nail one law to the cross and hand another one down!

It is a common thing to hear the one faith described as “the system of faith including the whole New Testament.” Nowhere in the scriptures is our relationship to Jesus defined in such language. No one who speaks as the Bible speaks can justifiably employ this kind of terminology. Our relationship to Jesus is a personal relationship. We are joined to him in an intimate embrace in spirit as a man is joined to his wife in the flesh. “But he who is united to the Lord becomes one spirit with him” (1 Cor. 6:17). You cannot reduce a person to a system. In reality there is no such thing as a systematic theology or systematic Christian relationship. These are creations of men. They are responsible for most of the spiritual ills in the world.

We have no inclination to verbally assault our brethren who are guilty of trying to cling to the Judaistic philosophy of legalistic justification, and live B.C. lives in an A.D. world. Instead we feel a sense of compassion as we always do for those who still exhibit juvenile tendencies when they are grown men. We realize that all of these carried-over adolescent traits result from fears and frustrations which are unresolved in their hearts. Rather we seek to deliver them from their ingrown inhibitions and partisan impediments so they may grow up in Christ Jesus and act like men.

We have an abiding confidence in the power of truth to dispel error as the dawn drives away the darkness. We do not lose heart when months of repetition are required before our brothers gain a faint glimmer of what is being said. We are content to labor and to wait, to plant and allow God to provide the increase. It is in that spirit we again examine the expression “the one faith,” to determine its nature and content. We shall seek to provide certain guidelines for our study as we proceed.

Faith and Doctrine

1. The faith by which we are justified was fully proclaimed on the first Pentecost following the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Nothing was ever added to it as a basis for justification. It is “the faith of the gospel” (Phil. 1:27) and the gospel was announced in its fulness and perfection by the heralds of the King on that day. Those who obeyed its demands did not obey an imperfect gospel.

2. In the early days of the Way, “the word of God increased; and the number of the disciples multiplied greatly in Jerusalem, and a great many of the priests were obedient to the faith” (Acts 6:27). The faith to which the priests became obedient was the faith to which the penitents on Pentecost became obedient. There was but one faith. Thus men embraced the faith twenty years before the first letter was written by an apostle. It is evident that the collection of letters constituting the new covenant scriptures were not a part of the faith.

3. When Paul landed at Cyprus on his first preaching tour, about 48 A.D., he was summoned by Sergius Paulus, the proconsul, who was anxious to hear the word of God. “But Elymas the magician withstood them, seeking to turn away the proconsul from the faith” (Acts 13:8). This was four years before Paul wrote his first epistle and there is no indication that he ever addressed one to Cyprus. Thus it was possible for men to be obedient to the faith, and to be turned away from the faith, years before any part of the new covenant scriptures was written.

4. On that same tour which reached as far as Derbe, Paul returned through Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, “strengthening the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith” (Acts 14:22). Thus men were in the faith and able to continue in it before even one apostolic letter was penned. But the faith in which they were to continue was that which Paul had brought them. Fortunately we can learn what it was. At Antioch he referred to David and said, “Of this man’s posterity God has brought to Israel a Savior, Jesus, as he promised” (Acts 13:23). Again, “And we bring you the good news that what God has promised to the fathers, this he has fulfilled to us their children by raising Jesus” (verses 32, 33). Again, “Let it be known to you therefore, brethren, that through this man forgiveness of sins is proclaimed to you, and by him every one that believes is freed from everything from which you could not be freed by the law of Moses” (verses 38, 39).

This was the faith which was proclaimed, the faith which they embraced, the faith in which they were to continue. This is the one faith. Paul defines it as “my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret for long ages.” He says that this is “made known to all nations, according to the command of the eternal God, to bring about obedience to the faith” (Romans 16:25, 26).

5. Not one of the apostolic epistles was written to introduce men to the faith, or to induct them into it. Every epistle, without exception, was addressed to those in the faith and because they were in it. For instance, in 1 Corinthians (16:13), the sanctified in Christ Jesus are urged to “stand fast in the faith.” In 2 Corinthians (13:5) they are given the instruction, “Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith.”

6. If the apostolic epistles constituted the one faith, no congregation of saints on earth, during the lifetime of the apostles, could have the faith in its perfection or completeness. These letters were written to different congregations and individuals and were not compiled or collected until long after the apostles were dead.

7. If the epistles constituted the faith only one of the apostles could possibly have had the faith in its fulness. All of them, including Paul had been slain thirty years or more before John wrote the last of the sacred canon. Some of the apostles may never have seen or read a single letter included in the new covenant scriptures, yet all of them proclaimed the faith. Not one of them, except John, knew anything about his three letters or those addressed to the seven churches of Asia.

8. The first epistle of which we have record is 1 Thessalonians, probably written about 52 A.D., from Corinth.

Yet, the year before that, “the churches were strengthened in the faith, and they increased in numbers daily” (Acts 16:5). Before the epistle was sent the Thessalonians were in the faith, for they had “turned to God from idols to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven.” The apostle said he thanked God continually for the fact “that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers” (1 Thess. 2:13, 14).

The one faith is not a compendium of moral principles, a code of ethics, or a compilation of laws. It is not a collection of letters, even though divinely authorized and produced by agency of the Spirit. It is the firm conviction that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God and that he “was put to death for our trespasses and raised for our justification” (Romans 4:25). The very next statement is, “Therefore, since we are justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.” Upon no other basis of justification can such peace be secured.

We must honor with our attention the passages cited by the honest brothers under the mistaken view that these support their legalistic claims. In doing so we are not attacking men but simply investigating their use, or misuse, of the sacred scriptures. It is amazing how men, motivated by partisan considerations, can unwittingly bend the word of God to justify the sin of division and scandal of schism.

Like Precious Faith

It is urged that 2 Peter 1:1 condones the idea of conformity and uniformity as God’s demand, in the expression “like precious faith.” The letter is addressed “to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Savior Jesus Christ.” The like precious faith is considered to be agreement with the partisan position on such matters as instrumental music, orphan homes, cups, classes, colleges, and a host of other controversial issues. Although this will seem utterly ridiculous to real students of the Bible it must still be dealt with because of its propagation by sincere, but misguided advocates of a partisan approach to Christianity.

The second epistle of Peter was written to the same persons as the first (2 Peter 3:1) and these were God's chosen ones who were scattered throughout Asia Minor (1 Peter 1:1). They believed in God who raised Jesus from the dead and gave him glory, so that their faith and hope might be in God (1 Peter 1:21). They had purified their souls in obeying the truth and had been born again of the gospel which had been preached unto them (1:22-25). But Peter declares that in time past they were not a people, but were now the people of God (1 Peter 2:10). Peter was a Jew as were all of the other apostles. The gospel was first preached to the Jews, and later the Gentiles were admitted to the faith.

It was natural for Peter as "a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ" to address his letter "to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God." James Macknight in his Apostolical Epistles paraphrases thus, "Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to all, both Jews and Gentiles, who have obtained like precious faith in the gospel with us believing Jews . . ." The word for "like precious" is isotimos, which is a term of quality or nature. It is from isos, equal; and time, value, honor. The faith obtained by the Gentiles through the righteousness of God was in no sense inferior to that obtained by the Jews, although the latter had primacy in proclamation. It was a faith equal in value or honor. The term has not one thing to do with those in the faith agreeing upon every detail of understanding and interpretation, desirous as that might be. It is not even related to our being alike. The statement is that all who enjoy the righteousness of God have obtained the same precious faith. There is one faith for both Jew and Gentile.

It is a startling commentary on the destructive violence of the party spirit when one realizes that otherwise good and gentle men are betrayed into equating the faith which all of us share in Christ Jesus with narrow partisan tests of communion. To Peter it was a source of rejoicing that others were included in the like precious faith; to orthodox factionalists it is a matter of loyalty to Christ to use the same passage to exclude believers from their “fellowship.” Betrayed by the use of the word “like” in the King James Version the cult of the rubber stamp gleefully raises the banner of conformity over rival institutions, demanding that all who enter bow to the party mandates. One need not be a scholar of reputation to question the partisan usage of the verse. Even a reading of other versions would be enough to make the party application suspect.

“To those who through the justice of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ share our faith and enjoy equal privilege with ourselves” (New English Bible).

“To those who have obtained a faith of equal standing with ours” (Revised Standard Version).

“To those who have been given, through the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ, a faith as precious as our own” (The New Testament in Plain English).

“To those who by the beneficence of our God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ have obtained a faith equal in privilege to ours” (The Authentic Version).

The Faith Once Delivered

“Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints” (Jude 3).

It is argued by factional leaders that “the faith” here spoken of is the entire body of new covenant scriptures. In addition, each party includes in “the faith” the particular and peculiar traditional interpretation and deductions which separate and segregate it from all other believers, sects and parties. Thus when one debates the validity of cups or classes, he is contending for “the faith.” When another engages in heated discussion over support of orphan homes or Herald of Truth, he is contending for “the faith.” When another argues about the use of instrumental music, either pro or con, he is contending for “the faith.” When another goes on a radio station and delivers an attack on the pre-millennial interpretation he is contending for “the faith.” The content of the faith which was “once for all delivered to the saints” differs with each contentious party of the saints. No two have the same faith. Instead of “one faith” there are as many faiths as there are factions.

To differ with the party on the one item which is its distinctive and exclusive test of union and communion is to deny the faith and thus to bring upon one the treatment accorded to “a heathen and a publican.” If a congregation divides over the use of individual cups or glasses, one who contends for them in the opposing party denies the faith. Regardless of how much one loves Jesus and believes in him, or how pure his life and how fervent his spirit might be, he has denied “the faith” when he cannot in good conscience truckle to the edicts and pronouncements or kowtow in abject submission to those “who seem to be somewhat.”

Jude was not even speaking of the apostolic letters, much less of the fanciful, farfetched and fitful interpretations placed upon them. The faith once for all delivered had been received before he wrote his letter so it is evident the epistle of Jude was not part of it. We can determine from the immediate context the nature of the faith and the reason for the exhortation to contend for it. The word “contend” is a term of combat. It is epagonizomai in the Greek. W. E. Vine says it “signifies to contend about a thing, as a combatant.” We can ascertain the nature of the faith for which contention must be made by the character of the opposition.

The opposers were ungodly men. They had secretly infiltrated the camp of the saints. They perverted the grace of God into licentiousness. They denied our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ. Against such characters, long ago designated for condemnation, “the sanctified, preserved and called ones” (verse 1) were to battle intensely for preservation of “the faith which was once for all delivered.” It is obvious that the faith was related to the proper concept of grace and its function, and the acknowledgment of the Lordship of Jesus Christ. These were the things being perverted and denied which made the earnest contention so essential.

One can hardly think of anything more detrimental to God’s purpose or to Christ’s prayer for unity than to apply such scriptures to the differences arising between brethren. Are our brothers who differ with us about individual cups ungodly persons? Are those who do not share our ideas about classes designated for condemnation? Do those who hold a divergent view about instrumental music pervert the grace of our God into licentiousness? Do the brethren whose views about orphan homes disagree with our own deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ? The truth is that regardless of the right or wrong of any of these things they are not a part of the faith once for all delivered to the saints. To confuse them with the faith is to confound sinners and mobilize the saints for savage civil strife. It is also to reveal the meagerness of our own scholarship and the dearth of our love.

The faith delivered once for all is that which produces our common salvation. It is that which initiates us all into the majestic covenantal relationship with the Father and Son. It is that which inaugurates fellowship with Deity and adopts us into the heavenly family. It is this faith based upon grace which

